K-State senior Breanna Eveland is ahead of her national collegiate record in the women's decathlon after day one of the Audrey Walton Combined Events Carnival on Thursday. In the second ever women's decathlon to be held on North American soil, K-State assistant coach and world record holder in the women's decathlon, Austra Skujyte, trails Eveland by just 25 points after the first five events.

BKC | Sampson's Indiana deal includes penalties

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. — Indiana will pay new men's basketball coach Kelvin Sampson less if the NCAA imposes sanctions against him for recruiting violations at his former school Oklahoma.

Sampson

His salary could be reduced by nearly $100,000 for sanctions and there is a $500,000 penalty for leaving before the end of the contract in 2013, The Indianapolis Star reported in Thursday's editions.

The agreement Sampson signed with Indiana on March 29 was obtained by the paper through a public records request and is worth $10.8 million over seven years. A final contract is in the works.

The coach left Oklahoma amid an NCAA investigation into more than 550 impermissible phone calls made to recruits by Sampson and his assistant coaches. Sooners officials are scheduled to appear before the NCAA infractions committee on April 21 in Utah.

NBA | Cleveland's James sprains ankle

James

The Cavaliers listed James as doubtful — a 25-percent chance of playing — for their second-to-last home game of the regular season.

The club, which has clinched its first playoff spot since 1998 and already locked down the No. 4 spot in the Eastern Conference playoffs, did not have a morning shootaround scheduled.

James rolled his ankle Wednesday night while being fouled on a drive to the basket with 1:46 left in the third quarter. He stayed in to shoot a free throw and complete a three-point play before limping off.

K-State's Ebony Theatre Company has been selected as one of four productions in the nation to perform at the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington, D.C.

It will perform the company's latest production, "The Last Black Play," on April 22 and 23 in the Family Theater at the Kennedy Center.

The plays were judged by theater professionals during the American College Theatre Festival competitions held in January and February at regional locations across the country.

"The Last Black Play" is the only student-written, student-directed, student-designed and student-performed play chosen, a news release said.

"I feel this solidifies us as a legit organization; there are really no all-black student theater organizations like this in the Midwest," said Keenan Ramos, senior in theater. Ramos plays the main character, Isaiah, in the play.

The Ebony Theatre Company has always been an intricate part of the theater department, said Kate Anderson, director of theater and Ebony Theater adviser. The company was started at K-State during the 1970s.

"This is the first time we've had an entire production from K-State win an award like this," Anderson said.

The play follows the life of Isaiah Cantrell, a young playwright and actor at The Grey Area Theatre Company, said Nathan Jackson, senior in speech and the play's author.

For the company's last production, Cantrell writes a play that includes all stereotypes about black people. To his surprise, audiences love the play, but Cantrell is not satisfied. He attempts to sabotage the play, but his plan backfires and adds to the play's recognition.

The Ebony Theater gives minorities at K-State an outlet to watch other minorities perform, Jackson said.

"It's a chance to see good black culture and not the negative images the media may portray," Jackson said.

Jackson has won the Lorraine Hansberry National Playwriting Award for the second time. In 2004, he won for his play "Mancherios," also performed by Ebony Theatre members.

Jackson also won the 2006 Mark Twain Comedy Playwriting Award from the Kennedy Center's American College Festival, where he won a $5,000 cash award, an internship to the National Playwrights' Conference at the O'Neill Theater Center, a fellowship to attend the Sundance Theatre Lab, and a contract offer with the Dramatic Publishing Company to publish, license and market "The Last Black Play".

Candace Feldman, senior in theater and director of the play, won a directing fellowship from the Society of Stage Directors and Choreographers.

Although the Ebony Theatre Company is an independent branch of the K-State theatre department, it still has campus support from students, faculty and organizations, Feldman said.

"It shows what can happen when you put a lot of hard work and team work into something," Feldman said.

"The Last Black Play," is showing an encore performance at 8 tonight only in Forum Hall at the K-State Student Union, in honor of the play's success. Donations will be taken at the door.

"This play is for everyone," Feldman said. "It's not just about how whites and blacks don't get along, it's about relationships with all races, white, black, Hispanic and Asian."

Local group continues trend of creative, quality music

"Leviathan"
Album review by Mark Sibilla

Since I have established myself as the Collegian's primary music critic, many (mostly local) bands and artists have contacted me to review their albums. I don't mind at all; I am always open to new music, and I will take any chance I get to help the local music scene. In fact, I am rather flattered musicians would turn to me for opinions about their work.

However, reviewing local music always gives me a sense of nervousness. First, I have heard too many local bands that are derivative and rather boring. I am always worried to receive albums from mediocre artists and give them bad reviews, thus giving the artists a reason to leave flaming bags on my doorstep.

Luckily, I have (knock-on-wood) been able to avoid these problems, because all of the local bands that have contacted me are creative and worthy of praise and recognition.

It shouldn't surprise me that the album "Leviathan" by local band Shhh is so good considering all of the members previously honed their chops in other bands. Following the September 2005 split of The Ice Cream Sandwiches, three members, Bret Palmer, bass; Simon Bates, guitar and vocals; and Court Caywood, guitar and vocals; focused on a new musical project.

Courtesy Art

Shhh was the resulting band. Three more members were recruited to the band in order to account for the more complex song structures on which the band wished to concentrate. These were Nolan Miller, drums; Jake Acosta, guitar; and Paul Bruss, multi-instrumentalist.

Now with a complete lineup, Shhh began to record their first album at The Farmhouse, a studio on the outskirts of Lawrence, Kan. Because all of the band members are Manhattan residents and K-State students, the recording process was relegated to one- or two-day stints held over the weekend. Eventually, the arduous recording process was finished, and the album, "Leviathan," was completed in late February 2006.

Shhh is a fairly straightforward rock band that plays fairly straight-forward alternative/indie-rock music. What makes Shhh great is it takes its musical influences and familiar lineup and adds its own personalized flourishes that keep the band's music and sound from becoming stale.

Lucky Number Slevin proves to be lucky

"Lucky Number Slevin"
Movie review by Brendan Praeger

"Lucky Number Slevin" goes to great lengths to mimic the styles of Quentin Tarantino and Guy Ritchie. The final product may lack the originality that made "Pulp Fiction" and "Snatch" so appealing, but it succeeds in copying their visual charm, sharp dialogue, and dramatic excellence.

The film revolves around a case of mistaken identity that lands Slevin (Josh Hartnett) at the middle of a war between two rival crime bosses: The Boss (Morgan Freeman) and The Rabbi (Ben Kingsley). Slevin ends up owing money to both bosses while also being hired to assassinate The Rabbi's son.

The story never drags, and there are enough great characters that your attention never wanders. From the two crime bosses who never leave their neighboring towers to the mysterious assassin Mr. Goodkat (Bruce Willis), each character has their own motives and unique relationship to Slevin.

While the plot might seem erratic and confusing at the film's outset, everything falls together into a satisfying conclusion. There isn't a huge twist at the end of the film, like a lot of the lazy storytelling at the movies.

The film's only drawback is some of the dialogue comes off as cheesy and forced. Lucy Lui's opening scene feels more like a "Gilmore Girls" episode than a crime drama. She talks really fast, but says nothing substantial. Luckily, her dialogue improves as the romantic subplot advances.

Jazz musician to play at MAC

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Candace Evans, a Kansas City, Kan., jazz musician, will perform at 8 tonight at the Manhattan Arts Center, 1520 Poyntz Ave.

Evans is a pianist and jazz musician whose second compact disc, "So Nice," was released in 2003, according to press release from the center.

Evans will perform several different styles of music, including swing, Broadway and Latin jazz, said Penny Senften, executive director of the center.

"We get a lot of artists from Kansas City (Kan.), where there is a lot of really good talent," Senften said.

The event is part of the center's Swing City Jazz series, which began in 2002, Senften said.

Four events take place each semester as part of this series, which was established both to give local artists a place to play and to bring in the best artists from cities such as Kansas City, Kan., Lincoln, Neb., and Chicago, said Wayne Goins, director of the series.

"We just want to get the best people we could to perform here. It's been quite successful," Goins, associate professor of music, said.

"The audiences are so attentive, and they pay attention so well that you can hear a pin drop when the artist is performing," he said. "Also, the acoustics in that room are incredible. They really, really enjoy performing on that stage."

The jazz concerts are also beneficial to the audience members since they don't have to drive to Kansas City, Kan., to hear jazz music, Goins said.

Candace Evans jazz concert

When: 8 tonight
Where: Manhattan Arts Center, 1520 Poyntz Ave.
Cost: $13 for adults, $11 for military, $8 for K-State students
Tickets are available at the arts center, Claflin Books & Copies, 1814 Claflin Road, and the Dusty Bookshelf, 700 N. Manhattan Ave.

For more information, call 537-4420

Most of the Swing City Jazz events have been sold out, and they are always well attended, he said.

Richard Smith, senior in music education, said he has gone to dozens of the center's jazz concerts.

Volunteers to construct fish habitats at Tuttle Creek State Park

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Governing Association and K-State Community Service Program will volunteer at the Tuttle Creek State Park on April 22.

Jim Mosimann, Student Affairs and Social Services Committee chair, said the event is to help build fish habitats at the state park.

"It's a visual way of showing that students care about the community," Mosimann said.

He said 250 people volunteered at last year's Saturday of Service, and 75 of them were students.

"If possible, this year we'd like to blow that number away, or at least break it," Mosimann said.

Monica Parrish, project coordinator for the Community Service Program, said the group also is involved with the project, and hopes to recruit at least 100 students. Lunch is provided for volunteers, Parrish said.

"It's a lot of work to get 100 people out there, but we're working on it," she said.

Building the habitats will include pouring cement into five gallon buckets and mounting stakes in the concrete, Parrish said.

She said that the habitats provide places for the smaller fish to hide and lay their eggs.

Saturday of Service

When: 9 a.m. to 12 p.m. April 22
Where: Tuttle Creek State Park

Later in the year, another group of volunteers actually will place them in the lake, Parrish said.

She said the event is in celebration of National Youth Service Day and Earth Day.

Todd Lovin, Tuttle Creek State Park manager, said there are a variety of things that can be done during the day of service.

Lovin said students could do trash detail along the shorelines, work on a trail being constructed or split firewood.

Former Polish President Lech Walesa walks to the podium to deliver the 144th Landon Lecture. Walesa was introduced by K-State President Jon Wefald as a symbol for hope and freedom.

them. Today, the United States' empire has to lead the world. That is, unless they don't want to continue, in which case they can share with Poland. We will know what to do with it."

Through his global travels, Walesa said he has seen that no country doubts the economic and military leadership of the United States. However, he said some countries do not believe the United States models global political leadership, leaving a void in the position of a world political leader.

"I would like to make you all realize that we have witnessed not only the start of a new millennium but the beginning of a new era without borders, divisions and land," Walesa said. "We are now in the era of intellect, Internet and globalization. Globalization can be good or bad, depending on what we put into it. Our technology is becoming so advanced, it cannot be confined within borders. This generation has no alternative – we must enlarge the structure in which we are organized."

Brian Metz, junior in psychology, said he attended the lecture for a class, but he also was interested in Walesa's views.

"I thought he made good points about globalization and was funnier than I thought," Metz said. "It was definitely a good time."

of album opener "The Edge of Time," it is immediately apparent that "Leviathan" will be something special. The instrumentation is bathed in reverb as are the vocals of Caywood and Bates, which give a certain hazy timelessness to the band's sound. The lush production also helps augment the band's dense sound, but it never hinders the amazing guitar interplay throughout the course of the song.

"Memory Lane" begins with a short played in reverse before it drops the listener into the proper song. The song chugs along on the steady, insistent beat created by the rhythm guitar, bass and percussion.

One common element throughout "Leviathan" is the presence of bells, keyboards and various percussion by Paul Bruss. What could have easily been gimmicky turns out to be nothing of the sort. Instead, Bruss uses his multi-instrument talents to help supplement the songs' hooks and provide excellent accompaniment to the melodies.

My favorite song, and the album's centerpiece, is "Lost." It begins as a strummed acoustic guitar ballad until the one-minute mark when the pounding bass and shimmering cymbals enter the mix. Nothing is left out of the song, as everything from intense guitar feedback to spacy keyboards to handclaps are employed with great effect without ever becoming "too much." The song is a slow burner that continually builds in intensity and instrumentation throughout its run time until it suddenly and exhaustedly collapses into silence.

Other album highlights, on an album full of them, include the bouncy, toe-tap inducing "Next to the 'X'" and album closer "Point of View." Even the synth-pop genre exercise of "I Am on Your Side" is magnificent and much better than entire albums of current synth-driven, post-punk bands.

Many bands fail to create second or third albums as good as Shhh's debut. It is exciting to think Manhattan can lay claim to bands as inspired and enjoyable as Shhh. Ultimately, "Leviathan" is an accomplished album and highly recommended.

Shhh will play its first live show and have an album release party for "Leviathan" at 9 tonight at P.J.'s bar, 1129 Laramie Ave., Shhh will play with Emma's Mine, Aid and Pineapple Truck.

RATING | WIN offers a chance to grade K-State professors on the Web

helpful course texts were, and students' overall ratings of both the instructor and the class.

"The survey initially was kind of worked on by SGA - the one I have dates back to May 2004 – and since then we've worked closely with Mike (Burns) to refine, add new questions and add new features to it," Wolfington said.

Burns said he encourages students to evaluate all of the professors and courses they have this semester, so that next semester ICE can become a good resource for students during enrollment.

"It's exciting for us, because we are giving K-State students the ability to help other students select their instructors and courses," Burns said. "We're excited that we finally can offer that service solely to our students, because it has been something that's been on the minds of the student body for a long time now."

The issue of providing an online forum for students to voice their opinions regarding classes and teachers was one of the focuses of the Campus part of the three Cs campaign platform of Student Body President Lucas Maddy.

"We can't take very much credit for it," Maddy said. "I was just there for the very end and for the launching of it. Most of the credit will go to when Hayley Urkevich was in office and when Michael Burns was in office; both administrations put so much work into it. As far as campaign promises go, this is just one thing off the list."

Maddy said one of the great things about ICE is that it was designed solely for K-State students and provides an opportunity for communication.

"I think students are going to be excited about an opportunity to share their experiences with other students down the road and also benefit from what students before them have shared," he said.

Matt Hoag, senior in computer science, also said he thinks ICE is a good idea, but said the evaluations shouldn't focus a great deal on students' perceived quality of the teaching.

"I think it'd be more useful if it discussed more style than quality," he said.

Maddy said he has made use of the program.

"All the language is positive," he said. "This is not really grading; it's more relating your experience. It's more about fact and not so much opinion."

Since I am a Royals fan, I didn't want to admit the possibility of another 100-loss season, but Kansas City's front office has given me little hope.

Eight games into the season, the Royals are a rather predictable 2-6. A sign of things to come? Probably. Kansas City plays in a relatively strong American League Central division, and Buddy Bell's team lacks power, speed and starting pitching, most notably.

■ The Cincinnati Reds finally have a solid starting pitcher in Bronson Arroyo.

Last year, Cincinnati's pitching was awful. How do I know? Because anyone outside of Ohio would have had trouble naming three Reds pitchers last season.

Then the Reds signed Arroyo after playing for Boston the past three seasons. Arroyo, who was the Red Sox's fourth or fifth starter, has become Cincinnati's No. 1 guy.

In two starts, Arroyo has two wins, 11 strikeouts and an ERA below two. And perhaps more impressively, Arroyo has two more home runs this season than Barry Bonds.

Police arrest man on robbery charges

By Jonas Hogg and Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kendrick Barber, Salina, was arrested at 5:55 p.m. Thursday in connection with an April 6 robbery near Aggieville.

Moldrup refused to give details of the investigation but said it was "due to keen investigative police work that they were arrested."

Moldrup was equally reluctant to reveal whether the police thought there were more suspects at large saying only, "not at this time."

When arrested, Barber had a wallet and cell phone that had been taken during the April 6 robbery.

Barber was charged with three counts of aggravated robbery. Bond was set at $50,000.

Last-minute filing options available

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The deadline to file taxes or extensions is today, two days later than usual.

Pat Peterson, office manager at H&R Block, 622 Tuttle Creek Blvd., said the date change is because of the weekend.

"The 15th falls on a Saturday this year," Peterson said. "Because it is not during the week, they (the government) give them one business day after that."

There are a few options for last-minute tax filings, Peterson said.

"(Students) could go online and file," she said. "Another option is to go into a tax service office and have them file it for them."

One thing, Peterson said, is to double-check the figures before filing.

"Those that are filing should make sure they have all their information, and it's entered correctly on the form," she said. "If they are doing it by hand, checking the math before submitting is always a good idea."

Kansas, Missouri Sri Lankans celebrate homeland's new year

By Adam Monroe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Sri Lankan Student Association celebrated the Sri Lanka new year with a potluck meal and games on Saturday at Tuttle Creek State Park.

"Our calendar has its new year on April 14," said Wijith Munasinghe, president of the association and graduate student in statistics.

The calendar used in the United States, known as the Gregorian calendar, is based on the cycles of the earth around the sun. Sri Lanka's calendar is Hindu and based on the moon's cycles.

"We have a hundred or so different food items out here today," said Indike Ratnayake, organization vice president and graduate student in civil engineering.

"On the 14th, there are specific times to cook and to eat," Munasinghe said. "It's based on astrology."

There were several games during the day that were intended for both children and adults.

"We will be having a balloon-blowing contest, an eating contest, playing pin the eye on the elephant and having a sack-racing competition, among other things," Munasinghe said.

In Sri Lanka, the main festival is in the capital city, Colombo.

"It is really a celebration week," Ratnayake said. "It's similar to Thanksgiving. It gives people a chance to go home, get together and socialize."

Prabha Manuratne, graduate student in English, said she enjoyed the event.

"It feels good to speak the language again," Manuratne said. "It has been fun being around the people here."

Wijith Munasinghe, graduate student in statistics, left, kicks the leg of Azmy Sahabdeen, Liberty, Mo., resident, as they both search for the tree where they can put the eye on the elephant.

The hazardous chemical suit of a Manhattan Fire Department firefighter is washed off after a clean-up of an ammonium-hydroxide chemical spill in a lab on the first floor of King Hall on Friday morning. The fire department was called to help clean up the spill because the chemical's vapors were toxic.

Chemical spill forces hall evacuation

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An ammonium-hydroxide chemical spill in King Hall forced the evacuation of the building's first floor at about 9 a.m. on Friday.

"We don't know exactly who was in the room when it happened," Ken Klabunde, professor of chemistry, said. "There were storeroom workers, undergraduate and graduate students who were in the lab mixing solution, when bottles of ammonium hydroxide broke and spilled onto the floor. This chemical vapor can be deadly, but none of them were hurt."

Since most of the employees had gone home for the weekend, the Manhattan Fire Department instead cleaned the spill, said Steve Galitzer, director of environmental health and safety.

"Even though no one was hurt, we still took all precautions," Galitzer said.

The chemical spill department used a product called Fast Act, a powder made to soak up chemical spills by absorbing harmful vapors in the air and on the contaminated surface, Klabunde said.

Ammonium hydroxide can corrode the lungs if inhaled and can irritate skin.

Galitzer said the spill was serious enough to take precautions and procedures.

"There is a level of ammonium hydroxide that is toxic, so we didn't want to take a chance," he said.

How to avoid spills

- Train all workers on proper procedures and the effects of chemical spills.
- Don't leave containers unattended while filling them with water or chemicals.
- Anticipate accidents; have a plan and know what to do if contamination occurs.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS NEWS HIGHLIGHTS

Pope calls for peace

VATICAN CITY — In his first Easter message as pontiff, Pope Benedict XVI on Sunday urged nations to use diplomacy to defuse nuclear crises — a clear reference to worries over Iran — and prayed that Palestinians would one day have their own state alongside Israel. On Christianity's most joyous day the pontiff also prayed for Iraq's relentless violence to cease.

Rumsfeld defended

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld did not intimidate members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff during planning of the Iraq war as some retired generals have charged, a former chairman said Sunday. The Pentagon circulated a one-page memo late last week detailing the defense secretary's frequent contacts with numerous military and civilian advisers.

Identity not released

ORANJESTAD, Aruba — An announcement that police made an arrest in the disappearance of teenager Natalee Holloway left many islanders wondering Sunday who the suspect is — and whether the arrest marked a real breakthrough in the almost year-old case. Aruban authorities only would say late Saturday that the person arrested is 19 years old and has the initials "G.V.C."

Huggins signs 7-foot-3 center as 1st recruit

K-State men's basketball coach Bob Huggins announced the signing of top-50 high school recruit Jason Bennett to a National Letter of Intent on the first day of the spring signing period on Wednesday.

Bennett is the first player to ink with the Wildcats since the introduction of Huggins as the Wildcats' coach on March 23. Bennett joins junior college forward Kenny Williams as the new additions for the 2006-07 season.

A 7-foot-3, 265-pound center from Jacksonville, Fla., Bennett is the tallest player ever to sign with K-State.

MOUSSAOUI SHOWS NO REMORSE

ALEXANDRIA, Va. – Al-Qaeda terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui told a jury deciding whether he should live or die that he is willing to kill Americans "any time, anywhere."

Moussaoui testified at his sentencing trial Thursday that he had "no regret, no remorse" over the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and is disappointed that additional attacks were not carried out.

IMMIGRATION LAWS SPUR WALKOUT

DODGE CITY, Kan. – Several hundred workers briefly walked off the job at a Dodge City meatpacking plant Tuesday after company officials disciplined employees for missing work to protest proposed federal immigration laws a day earlier, union leaders said.

Just before the lunch hour, about 600 workers left the line and filed into the Excel Corp. cafeteria, saying they would not work if the company sanctioned some employees for attending Monday's immigration rally, an official with United Food and Commercial Workers Local 2 said.

IRAN CLAIMS URANIUM ENRICHMENT

KUWAIT – Iran has successfully enriched uranium for the first time, a landmark in its quest to develop nuclear fuel, hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Tuesday. Although the president insisted his country does not aim to develop nuclear weapons, the statements seemed certain to ratchet up tensions with the West, which is trying to persuade Tehran to halt its nuclear program.

Speaking in a nationally televised speech, Ahmadinejad called on the West "not to cause an everlasting hatred in the hearts of Iranians" by trying to force Iran to abandon uranium enrichment.

KANSAS AMBER ALERT A HOAX

INDEPENDENCE, Kan. – A 16-year-old girl's story of being kidnapped at gunpoint from her family's driveway and held in a white van for hours was a hoax, authorities said Thursday.

Stelting

Police and FBI agents said Kelsey Stelting acknowledged Thursday morning that it never happened and said she instead spent the day alone not far from town.

In reality, officials said, she jogged to an area southwest of Independence, called 911 to report that she had been abducted and then stayed there alone.

MUMPS OUTBREAK CONTINUES

TOPEKA – State health officials on Tuesday insisted Kansans shouldn't become unduly alarmed by an outbreak of mumps that has climbed to 48 reported cases in seven counties.

By 2:30 p.m. Tuesday, KDHE had received reports of 48 cases of mumps from Douglas, Shawnee, Geary, Johnson, Leavenworth, Norton and Saline counties.

Douglas County is the hardest hit with 37 cases. Kansas usually sees no more than three mumps cases a year. Last year, none were reported.

DEATH COUNT CLIMBS IN IRAQ

BAGHDAD, Iraq – Four more American soldiers were killed in Iraq on Wednesday, the U.S. military said as the U.S. death total for the month surpassed the total for all of March. More than 40 Iraqis also died, including at least 22 in a car bombing near a Shiite mosque northeast of Baghdad.

SafeRide grant falls short of needs

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Fee Bond Proposals

Part 5 of 6

SafeRide was allocated $142,464 by the student fee bond surplus review committee.

SafeRide initially asked for $600,000 in its project proposal, said SafeRide Director Amy Guerich.

"It is disappointing that we did not receive the full funding, because we worked really hard," said Guerich, senior in family studies and human services. "But as a SafeRide coordinator I have to learn to make do with what we have."

Guerich said the $600,000 would have been used to buy eight 12-passenger vans and cover the operating costs of the vans for three years.

"Almost every semester we have to go to the Privilege Fee Committee and ask for an emergency allocation," she said. "The extra money from the $600,000 would have gone in a reserve account to help pay for the maintenance of the vehicles."

Guerich said the money also would have helped reorganize the program. Instead of contracting SafeRide to cab companies, Guerich said she wanted to make SafeRide into a nonprofit organization.

"This way the vehicles would be owned and operated through the non-profit organization," she said. "We have had several problems with cab companies, and we feel we could serve students better this way and have more control of the program."

Guerich said SafeRide will not purchase the additional vans because it did not receive the full amount for which is asked. Instead, she said the money will be used to fund SafeRide.

"We only get $68,000 a year from privilege fees, and we need $130,000 to operate," she said. "So this additional money would basically go into funding SafeRide."

Ana Miller, bond surplus fund committee member, said the committee did not allocate the full amount to SafeRide because it wanted to provide funding for a one-time purchase, not something that would need additional funding in the future.

"The money we did give them was to supply them with the passenger vans," Miller, freshman in business administration pre-professional, said. "We want to fund something for a specific year."

Chancy Montera, bond surplus fund committee member, said the committee wanted to grant some money to SafeRide since it is a service that can benefit all K-State students.

"We really tried to pick proposals that would benefit all students at one point, and we all felt that SafeRide could do that," Montera, junior in marketing, said. "This is a service that a lot of students depend on to get home safely."

Guerich said she will look for other ways to update and renovate the SafeRide program. Guerich said some changes will happen soon because SafeRide's contract with its current cab service provider will end in May.

"We are going to rewrite the contract to fit the needs and the system we want to provide," she said. "We need to provide a safe ride home for students."

Zoo's Easter event educates kids

By Bhagavathy Umamaheswar
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sunset Zoological Park had its annual EGGstravaganza Saturday to honor egg-laying animals.

"Today, we are trying to educate people about the habits of egg-laying animals like turtles and flamingos," said Dianne Paukstelis, marketing director at Sunset Zoo.

The event featured activities like pop quizzes and face painting, and children were encouraged to get a hands-on feel for the egg-laying habits of turtles.

Volunteers at the zoo also stood near various animal exhibits holding animals like Madagascar hissing cockroaches and boa constrictors, which the audience could feel and hold.

EGGstravaganza is an annual event, and the focus of all the activities planned was to educate children.

The zoo has about 65,000 visitors per year, and its educational programs reach about 35,000 people every year.

"We target young families, especially women in the age group 25 to 35, because they are generally in charge of organizing fun activities for the children," Paukstelis said.

In addition to EGGstravaganza, Sunset Zoo also has several projects underway.

"The flamingos are all 3 years old, which is their reproductive age," Gulker said. "They generally nest in groups, and we've seen some pairing."

Sunset Zoo also is in the planning phase of a large expansion called the Capital Campaign.

"We need to raise about $1.5 million for an educational building," Scott Shoemaker, director at Sunset Zoo said. "The facility will have classroom and educational tools and models for our children's outreach program."

The zoo has a variety of animals, including snow leopards, chimpanzees, a Siberian tiger and a cheetah.

Melissa Hall, Manhattan resident, said she and her family visit the zoo about twice a month.

Hall said visiting the zoo is a good way to get out of the house and learn about animals the children generally read about in class.

"My children go to zoo camp and enjoy the educational programs organized at the zoo," she said.

Fine arts grad student wins ceramics award

By Kelsey Childress
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Brandon Lutterman, graduate student in fine arts, won the 2006 Rosen Group NICHE Award in the sculptural ceramics category for his piece "Unearthed."

"This award, in my eyes, is finally saying that I have been recognized for all of my hard work as a student," said Lutterman, who teaches Ceramics I. "I am just realizing that everything is important to enable the artist to get better known in this world."

This prestigious award, which recognizes American and Canadian talent, has professional and student categories, along with an "Arts Educator of the Year" award. The awards began in 1989, and the winners' artwork is published in NICHE magazine.

To enter the contest, Lutterman said he sent in a brochure and slides of his artwork. The deadline to enter is in September of the year preceding the award year.

"There are two criteria for the student awards: technical mastery, both in surface design and form, and a distinct quality of unique, original and creative thought," said Daniel Waldman, public relations manager for the Rosen Group.

"In terms of Brandon's piece, his work demonstrated these criteria above and beyond any of the other entries."

Lutterman said his work as an artist began in 1998, when he was a student at Minnesota State University in Mankato, Minn.

"(I) always felt the need to create and be a maker; I loved working with my hands all growing up," Lutterman said. "('Unearthed') is one of my favorite pieces. It is what caused a large reaction within my own interests, giving me the motivation to continue on with this series of ideas."

In addition to winning the NICHE award, Lutterman also has his artwork on display until Saturday in the Strecker-Nelson Art Gallery, 406 1/2 Poyntz Ave.

"Our policy is normally to not show student work except for an award exhibit honoring the graduating MFA candidate in ceramics," Jay Nelson, part-owner of the gallery, said. "Brandon is an exceptional exception."

Lutterman worked with Nelson in the art gallery for the de-installation and installation of ceramic artwork. His pieces are being sold for $150 to $1,200 at the gallery, which is open Monday through Saturday from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m.

"Working with Nelson led me to the opportunity to exhibit my work once my Thesis Exhibition was over," Lutterman said. "These works all stemmed from the idea of "Unearthed," the piece I received this award for."

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

Brandon Lutterman, graduate student in fine arts, holds "Solitude," one of his ceramic sculptures, in his studio. Lutterman recently won a Niche Award, which recognizes creative achievements of American and Canadian craft artists in a variety of media.

Lutterman said he gets his inspiration from nature and memories of places he has been. He said his pieces have been shown in galleries in Minnesota and Kansas, along with being placed in several competitions at the national and regional level.

"Brandon is showing (at the gallery) not because of his prices or how many pieces of art he had available," Nelson said. "He is showing here because of the conceptual nature of his work having to do with the natural world and his concern and love for that, and because he expresses these ideas with originality and in a way reflecting his knowledge of ceramics and his commitment to producing high quality craft."

5 students threaten teacher

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OLATHE, Kan. – Five middle-school students have been charged in connection with threats against teachers.

Two 13-year-old girls, both from Shawnee, were each charged with one felony count of criminal threat in Johnson County District Court. They allegedly threatened to kill a teacher over a grade in a Jan. 17 posting on an online journal Web site.

Three 14-year-old boys were charged in two separate incidents in which a liquid substance was placed in a teacher's coffee pot.

District Attorney Paul Morrison said filing charges against the students, who attend Trailridge Middle School in Lenexa, a suburb of Kansas City, Mo., was appropriate.

"We're trying to make a statement," he said. "Teachers have a right to feel safe in their classrooms."

Authorities did not release the names of those charged Friday because of their ages.

The felony charge against the 14-year-old boy involved Internet messages threatening a teacher's life, coupled with allegations that a substance had been placed in a teacher's drink, Morrison said.

TO THE POINT

SafeRide needs funds to expand, not just continue

SafeRide is an important campus service used by many students. However, SafeRide's frustrating busy signals and long waits could be alleviated somewhat by even more funding.

The $600,000 SafeRide originally requested from the committee would have been used to buy eight 12-passenger vans. More vans, and the money to maintain them for three years, would help SafeRide meet the demands students place on the service.

SafeRide funding from privilege fees does not meet the operating costs of the program. Privilege fees fund $68,000 of the $130,000 operating costs, but instead of allowing SafeRide to expand, the bond surplus money only will allow the program to continue.

SafeRide is a worthwhile program that deserves enough funding to operate properly. Student and community safety is of utmost importance and efforts to increase that safety deserve help. In order for SafeRide to properly assist students, the program needs to be able to do more than simply exist; it needs to expand.

If we expect programs to grow we must fund them accordingly. The committee's allocation is a good start and its example should be followed.

Grow up

Let go of high school drama, feats; college requires maturity

OWEN KENNEDY

For some of us, it means the last instance of being held by the chains of our parents. For others, it means marching band and easy classes.

But in college, saying someone's attitude or demeanor is "high school" is synonymous with one word: immaturity.

High school didn't prepare me for much, but I can't say I have bad feelings toward my experiences during my time there. However, seeing some recent occurrences and practices at my high school, and the high school life in general, has changed my view of high school.

Someone close to me who attends my alma mater has come across some problems at the high school level. She doesn't fit the mold of Rachel McAdams' fake and wicked character in "Mean Girls," so, needless to say, she isn't the most popular girl in her respective institute of higher immaturity.

She isn't an athlete or drama queen, so high school isn't exactly her paradise. But nonetheless, she has made the best of what the school has given her. She takes pride in her clubs and in her academics. But again, in high school, these aren't the "in" things.

Since the school has refused to offer her the same advantages as the wealthy, teacher-favored, plastic-fake "women," she has taken pride in the things she does well.

This is why she was ecstatic when she was invited to join National Honor Society. All she had to do was complete the application and all would be well – or so she thought.

When the acceptance letters were delivered, she didn't receive one. She got a letter that said, "Sorry, you're not involved enough."

Involved? She tried out for every extra-curricular activity possible, only to be turned away because she "just didn't fit in." She wanted to be involved, but the school said "no." So is it her fault she doesn't give into the immature way of life we in college mock every time we mention Hilary Duff or the Olsen twins?

Luckily, she only has another year at Mean Girls High School. She'll come to college and do some growing up, just like most of us did. But those who believe high school was the best years of their lives have a lot more growing up to do when they get to the realm of higher education.

I did a lot of growing up my first semester of college, and yeah, I was home-sick from time to time, but I never once said, "Man, I wish I was back in high school." It was fun, but it wasn't the best time ever.

Most of us have been at a party where some guy is wearing his high school letter jacket and won't shut up about how popular he was in high school and how many passing yards he had his senior year. OK, Uncle Rico, you were a big deal in high school; get over it.

If your best pick-up line doesn't involve talking about leading your high school basketball team in scoring, I implore you to share the knowledge and wisdom you've obtained in college with friends who are not yet in a higher institution. Maybe your friends won't end up being the creepy old guys at high school parties who never were able to let go.

Couric shatters glass ceiling with anchor job

There are a few feminine firsts yet to be achieved, like a woman vice president, a woman president, a woman surgeon general and a solo woman evening news anchor.

The last one, the woman anchor, is about to occur for the first time in history. Think Ron Burgundy but without Ron.

Katie Couric has taken an anchor job with CBS Evening News and will become the first solo woman evening news anchor on network television, and everyone is in an uproar.

MEGAN GREEN

Turning on the television during evening news broadcasts, it is impossible not to see at least one story about the Couric phenomenon.

Couric, 49, has an impressive résumé. She's been a reporter at CNN and a Pentagon correspondent at NBC, not to mention a co-anchor on the "Today Show." So why all the problems?

My guess is because she might become the most influential newscaster in the country, and she's a woman. It's a change in the norm.

I am thoroughly impressed with Couric and her courageous efforts to take women one more step higher. She took a pay cut – not a large one, as she still makes $15 million a year – and it has been rumored she will not change her girl-next-door image for a more conservative evening news audience.

She's stood through numerous statements from critics saying she will not be a good anchorwoman, will not be a good reporter and surely will fail. She's heard the bitter comments from most of the male staff at CBS, but despite all that, she's still decided to take the job. She continues to be here and continues to go strong. And I am excited.

I think the Evening News needs to be re-vamped. According to Newsweek, the newscast has only 7.7 million viewers per night, which keeps it in last place, and reaches mostly viewers older than 60. Bringing in a female icon like Couric will be great not only for the Evening News, but also for evening newscasts all across the nation.

Imagine the many other times someone has made a decision and the rest of the country says "whoa," – for instance, reality television.

It was debated for a while and now it is a staple of American television. I am not trying to parallel the Couric move to reality television, but I think every time something different happens, many react negatively, no matter how interesting, or how good, the idea is.

Yes, it's completely different than anything we have ever seen, but in most cases, different is good, and Americans embrace different.

I think everyone will begin to see that moving Couric to the Evening News is a good idea. It'll put a new perspective on everything newsworthy.

Think about how often Couric has shown actual emotion during a newscast. It's great. It shows a human who simply is telling other humans the truth and has some feeling about it. It's my best friend telling me something has happened and knowing she is not lying to me about it, because I can see in her face she believes it. Everyone trusts Couric, because she is real.

I highly doubt Couric will fail in her new position. She is one of the most successful morning news anchors and has risen in each position she has held. I know she will rise even higher in such a historical position. She's helped to open the door to many other female reporters, as well as to women in general. I congratulate Katie Couric on her new job and her new stature in society and history.

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new venue across the United States is showing pornographic films: college classrooms.

Institutions of higher learning, including New York University, the University of California at Berkeley and the University of Iowa, all have added pornography studies classes to their course catalogs.

According to a March 26 article in Time magazine, a wide variety of academic disciplines now offer classes in this area, including film, law and women's studies departments. The focus of each class varies; one may focus on pornography's influence on society, while another might examine its philosophical effects.

Barb Smith, instructor of journalism and mass communications, said most of these classes probably study pornography from a social science and cultural standpoint.

"These classes are important in the sense that social science studies have been inconclusive on the effects of porn on society," she said. "There are many mitigating factors that affect a person's behavior, not just one variable."

One controversial decision facing pornography studies instructors is how much, if any, pornographic material should be shown in the classroom.

Scott Hemenover, assistant professor of psychology, teaches a psychology course on sexual behavior that includes a unit on pornography. Hemenover said the appropriate use of pornographic materials in the classroom depends on the nature of the course.

"It sounds reasonable that if your course deals with pornography, erotica or adult material, you have to show some," he said. "But it can't be gratuitous – it must have a well thought-out goal or purpose."

Smith, who briefly discusses pornography in her law of mass communications class, also said showing some pornographic material might be necessary to effectively teach a class on pornography.

"A picture is worth a thousand words," she said. "It's very hard to describe something clearly and accurately if you don't have a photo or a film clip to look at."

Smith said the Supreme Court's loose definition of obscenity could make it difficult for professors to distinguish legal from illegal pornographic material.

The Court defines obscenity as material that appeals to a prurient, or vulgar, interest. Whether a film or photograph is obscene is determined on a local basis, which Smith said can differ from one region to the next.

"A video could be shown in New York and not be considered obscene, but the same video could be shown in Utah and be found obscene," she said. "You don't necessarily know until after it's shown whether or not a court will find it obscene."

Cole Harper, junior in preprofessional business administration, said he thinks many students at K-State would be interested in taking a course on pornography.

"It's an interesting and controversial enough topic that lots of people would take it," he said.

Harper said that while he thinks this type of course could cause controversy between university and government officials, it could be educational for students.

"People need to know what's out there and how to deal with it, not just the stereotypes of porn," he said. "I just hope people wouldn't take the classes for the wrong reason. For the right reasons, it could be very helpful."

Country's flaws correctly changed through nonviolent means like voting, speaking out

Editor,

I am proud to live in the United States. I feel grateful to be able to do what I want to do when I want to do it. However, as much as I love this country, I can still recognize that there is something fundamentally wrong with it.

I follow the laws we are told to live by; I just don't agree with all of them. We live in a country where we are still not afforded all the rights we should be afforded. I'm tired of reading news articles informing me that yet another state has created a law that tells me who I can marry. These laws inform me that a marriage is composed of one man and one woman. So I ask myself, "What should I do about this injustice?"

Do I try to violently start a revolution? My guess is that people would follow my lead, but that doesn't make the actions right. Instead, I try to lead a nonviolent lifestyle. I vote; I protest; I speak out when injustices occur, and I tell people my story.

Since change happens slowly, I probably won't live to see the day when I acquire the rights I should have been allowed since birth. But for me it's a dream deferred, not a dream ended. I have hope that my children will live in a peaceful world where they are given the rights they deserve. What else do we have left but hope?

Americans' freedoms not instinctual, derived from secular, religious means

Editor,

Kody Cooper starts off his latest editorial with a somewhat clear claim that freedoms, and moral rights in general, can only be derived from scripture. Unfortunately, he then regresses into what seems to be the result of a binge-drinking thesaurus that regained consciousness only long enough to alliteratively regurgitate a mix of trendy words and obfuscated talking points.

As just shown, while this makes for some lovely rhetorical flourishes, it also hampers cogent discussion. This could be some excitingly modern, nay, post-modern rant against the true horrors of magnetic poetry, but I'll take it at face value.

Kody cites C.S. Lewis's conception of the Tao, a universal moral law encoded into the minds of man, as central support. Unfortunately, Kody fails to note that C.S. Lewis specifically said this conception was contained in many forms – "Platonic, Aristotelian, Stoic, Christian and Oriental alike" – and non-instinctual.

It doesn't necessitate the acceptance of Christian dogma, especially not the fundamentalist interpretation espoused here. Additionally, we can see conceptions of the good resembling the Tao arrived at from purely secular means, such as Kant's work more than two centuries ago. A devout Christian, Kant knew we needed a logical foundation to work out our moral code's implications.

Beneath the scare-tactics and cherry-picking of Supreme Court opinions, Kody's central argument does not hold. Freedom does not require religion, but instead allows it to flourish. Because of the rights codified in our constitution and safe from a mere majority's whims, everyone can enjoy that freedom.

Poorly lit areas need improvement to support K-State's claim of safe, home-like campus

Editor,

Doesn't K-State claim that it's one of the safest universities in the United States? As much as each student pays to attend K-State, should we feel safe to walk on campus at night?

For me, living in the residence halls, I feel I have the right to walk on campus at night and not be afraid because some areas are poorly lit. I feel the university should be doing all it can to provide me with a safe environment, and I am not satisfied.

Old Claflin is a one way road/walkway that connects the residence halls to campus. It's a very poorly lit area surrounded by trees, shrubbery and a creek. It's a very intimidating area to walk through at night.

We're told K-State is supposed to feel like home, but I feel safe at home, not here. Crimes on campuses nationwide are rising, including K-State, yet we students are still subject to walk down these poorly lit streets.

This is a problem that K-State staff needs to take care of immediately. I want to be able to walk on campus at night and not feel threatened. I feel we all deserve that.

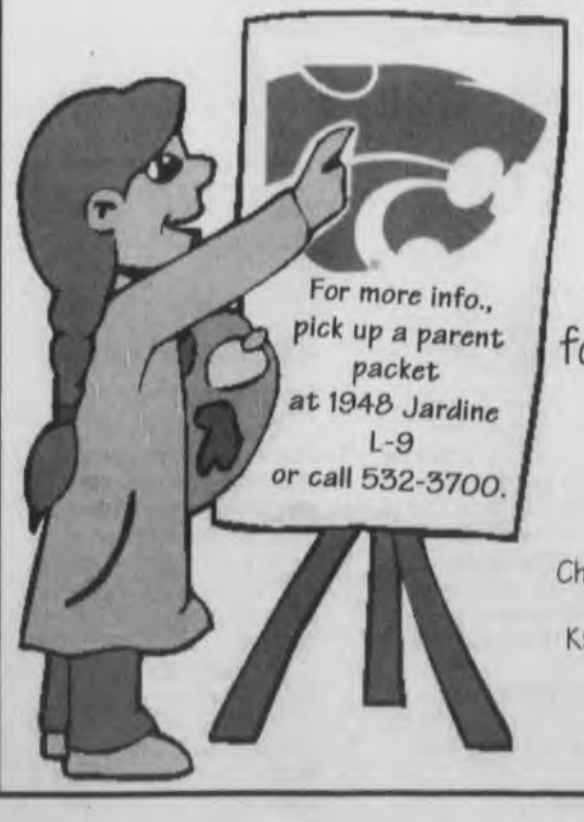
Actions meaningless if forced by government; citizens' choices must be made freely

Editor,

Kody Cooper thinks it's legitimate for the government to crack down on people who violate his idea of absolute Christian morality even when their actions harm nobody.

I'm not sure what he intends to accomplish with this government regulation of morality, since anyone familiar with Christianity will quickly realize that passing laws against immoral acts does nothing to make people more Christian – nor does it make them more moral. If you do the right thing only because you're afraid you'll go to jail, you're not being moral, just practical. And no amount of outwardly Christian behavior is enough to make you a Christian if you don't accept Jesus.

Regardless of what else we believe about morality, we should all know that our choices don't have any meaning unless they're free. If forcing people to act Christian was good for them, God could have done it himself. He didn't.



Maybe conservative Christians should follow his lead.

K-State football coach Ron Prince talks with players during practice Saturday in the indoor practice facility. K-State will play the annual purple versus white spring game Saturday.

Wildcats near spring exhibition

By Cedrique Flemming
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The last practice open to the public before the April 22 annual Spring Game was Saturday.

The practice originally was scheduled to take place at Snyder Family Stadium but was moved inside the Indoor Football Complex due to the threat of inclement weather.

Coach Ron Prince said he is glad his players can adapt well to changes and understand how to listen to coaches who are helping to improve their game.

"I'm really pleased with everything that the players are doing and especially their high level of concentration," Prince said. "We have tried to change the environment on them a little by moving practice and playing music indoors, which is all a part of teaching them how to stay focused, and I am happy with where that's going."

Prince talked about a lot of positions, but one he pointed out as making vast improvements is the defensive line. He said he is pleased with how the line is coming together, and he is excited about the way freshman Eric Childs and sophomore Ian Campbell rush the quarterback.

During drills, the four defensive linemen who started and took most of the repetitions were senior Blake Seiler, junior Steven Cline, Childs and Campbell.

Campbell said the transition from last year to this year is easier on defensive linemen because there is not as much to learn, and he said he is looking forward to the Spring Game to show the fans and coaches what he is capable of doing.

"Not much has changed for us; we are just trying to focus on executing each play," Campbell said. "Now we want to have a good couple of practices on Monday and Wednesday and get rested up so we can put on a good show Saturday."

The Spring Game will consist of two teams: the White Wildcat team coached by defensive coordinator Raheem Morris and the Purple K-State team coached by offensive coordinator James Franklin.

Prince said the two coaching staffs will participate in a draft on Thursday to select their teams. He said he will be the commissioner of the draft and will void any draft selections or trades he deems unfair.

"It'll be a lot of fun," Prince said. "I want to make sure the chemistry throughout the roster is adequate and really improving, and that's the reason for chopping and mixing up a lot of different players.

"I'm sure the performance may not be as clean as we would like, but I really think in the long run this will pay us dividends."

Prince said no player is set at any

Golfers set for Big 12 tourney

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The women's golf team will travel to Lincoln, Neb., today though Wednesday to take on the rest of the Big 12 Conference for the league title.

The teams will play at the Country Club of Lincoln, a par-72 course. Although the women played in Lincoln earlier this year at the Chip-N-Club Invitational Sept. 26-27, they played at the Wilderness Ridge Golf Course.

Coach Kristi Knight said none of the women have played this course.

"It's similar to some of the places we've played at Kiawah Island (S.C.), Florida and Wisconsin," she said. "It's a golf course they'll be able to play."

Several factors will contribute to the team having a good round, Knight said.

"The main thing the whole team needs to understand is even though golf is the same sport, you aren't going to get the same opportunity," she said. "Weather and hole locations make a difference. They just need to play what the course gives them that day.

"That's the thing that makes golf the interesting and challenging game that it is. You never master; you always strive to get better."

Knight said the women aren't dwelling on the course.

"They are working hard here in Manhattan, and when they get to the tournament, they just have to trust their instincts and play," she said. "I want them to enjoy the competitive opportunity, enjoy playing a good golf course and compete. Don't try to force things to happen."

In the last tournament, the Susie Maxwell Classic April 9 and 10, K-State placed fifth as a team, and sophomore Michelle Regan placed 10th overall.

Regan said placing high helped her mentally.

"It was a confidence boost knowing that I can compete at a higher level," she said. "I feel I am peaking at the right time."

The main goal, Regan said, is to make a good showing.

"We are looking forward to having three good team scores, so we can qualify for (NCAA) Regionals and get into the postseason," she said.

Sophomore Hailey Mireles said she is confident about the team's chances of qualifying.

"We've had two decent tournaments, and hopefully, we can build on those and play well as a team," she said.

Mireles said she is excited about the possibility of playing in the NCAA Regionals.

"We haven't gone as a team for a couple of years, and it would be great if we could go this year," she said.

Knight said she isn't worried about Regionals yet.

"We just have to be ready to play Lincoln Country Club on Monday," she said. "Whatever it presents, that's our only concern.

"This team has improved, and we do have a chance to go to Regionals. I don't know if we will, but the main thing is that we've improved so much from a year ago."

K-State wins 1, loses 1 to Tech; curfew forces 3rd-game tie

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A travel curfew halted Saturday's contest between K-State and Texas Tech after 10 innings and preserved an 11-11 tie in the series finale.

The Wildcats (23-9-1, 3-8-1 Big 12 Conference) and Red Raiders (25-14-1, 6-7-1 Big 12) split the previous two games, with Texas Tech winning Thursday's game 4-2 and K-State rolling to 16-5 victory Friday at Dan Law Field in Lubbock, Texas.

Saturday's tie was only the second in Big 12 Conference history and the first for K-State since 1982. The game was called after 10 innings to accommodate K-State's travel schedule.

In the top of the ninth inning, K-State broke a 7-7 tie with three runs against Texas Tech pitcher Dustin Richardson, notable for his role on ESPN's Knight School. Sophomore Matt Marasco drove in two runs with a single, and the Wildcats added another run on a throwing error. However, Texas Tech's Kyle Martin sent the game to extra innings with a three-run homerun in the bottom of the ninth.

In the 10th inning, senior Brandon Farr singled and scored on an error to give K-State an 11-10 lead, but Martin answered again with an RBI single in the bottom of the inning.

Senior Joe Roundy led K-State on Saturday, going 3-for-6 with two RBIs. Farr's single pushed his career-best hitting streak to 16 games.

Roundy's two-out grand slam highlighted a nine-run second inning for the Wildcats on Friday. The Wildcats churned out 16 runs and 16 hits in support of starter Adam Cowart, who surrendered four runs in seven innings and picked up the win. Farr led the Wildcats with three hits, and Roundy drove in five runs.

K-State pounded out 11 hits but managed just two runs in Thursday's loss. Junior Jared Goedert and sophomore Cris Tapia had RBI groundouts in the sixth inning, and Farr went 3-for-4 at the plate.

The Wildcats return to action Tuesday when they travel to Wichita State. First pitch is set for 7 p.m.

Golfers shoot worst final-round score

By Cedrique Flemming
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The par-72, 7,235-yard Traditions Golf Club course in Bryan, Texas, got the better of the Wildcats on Saturday and Sunday at the Aggie Invitational.

K-State began the final round in sixth place but fell into a tie for eighth after shooting the worst final-round team score of any of the 12 teams participating.

The Wildcats finished at a 52-over-par 916 (302-305-309), and coach Tim Norris said the combination of high winds, green speed and tough pin placements made the course play extremely difficult.

"This course is very demanding, and we just weren't quite at the top of our game," Norris said. "I can't fault the effort, but it doesn't matter how hard you try, if you are not hitting the shot where it needs to be, then it will be pretty tough to shoot a good score on a course like this.

"This was good preparation for the Big 12 (Championship) because it gives the guys an idea as to the kind of conditions and type of demanding layout a course like this has."

Host school Texas A&M entered the final round with a 15-stroke lead over Texas Tech and placed all five of its golfers in the top 10 individually, but the lead was squandered when Texas Tech fired a final round score of 12-under 276, and A&M only could manage a four-over 292.

A&M finished the tournament in second place with a total of five-over 869, and Texas Tech took home the team championship after firing a four-over 868.

Texas Tech's Oscar Floren helped his case as the Golfweek/Sagarin No. 13-ranked player in the country when he fired the low round of the tournament (66) in the final round to take home the individual title by three strokes over Baylor's No. 5-ranked Ryan Baca.

Floren was the only player in the field to shoot at least two rounds in the 60s, and he finished with a seven-under 209 (75-68-66).

K-State senior Tyler Cummins paced the Wildcats with a 12-over 228 (76-73-79), which put him into a tie for 26th.

MLB | Mets off to fastest start in franchise history

NEW YORK — The New York Mets are already looking ahead after beating the Milwaukee Brewers 9-3 Sunday to set two franchise records for best starts to a season.

Delgado

Atlanta is coming to town, and the Mets are looking for a fast start against their NL East rivals.

New York is feeling good after taking two of three from the Brewers to improve to 9-2, its fastest start ever.

The Mets also set a franchise mark by winning their first four series of the season.

Xavier Nady drove in three runs with a home run and a sacrifice fly, and Carlos Delgado hit a three-run homer against the Brewers, who snapped New York's seven-game winning streak with an 8-2 win Saturday.

David Wright, leading the National League in hitting with a .421 average coming into the game, had a single and double and scored twice for New York.

PGA | Baddeley wins 1st PGA Tour event

Baddeley

He called on that faith hours later Sunday on the same hole, repeating part of a New Testament verse as he stood over the winning 6-foot par putt in the final round of the Verizon Heritage.

Baddeley won his first PGA Tour title, rallying with two late birdies and finishing off Jim Furyk with a scrambling par on the 18th.

NBA | Wizards clinch playoff spot

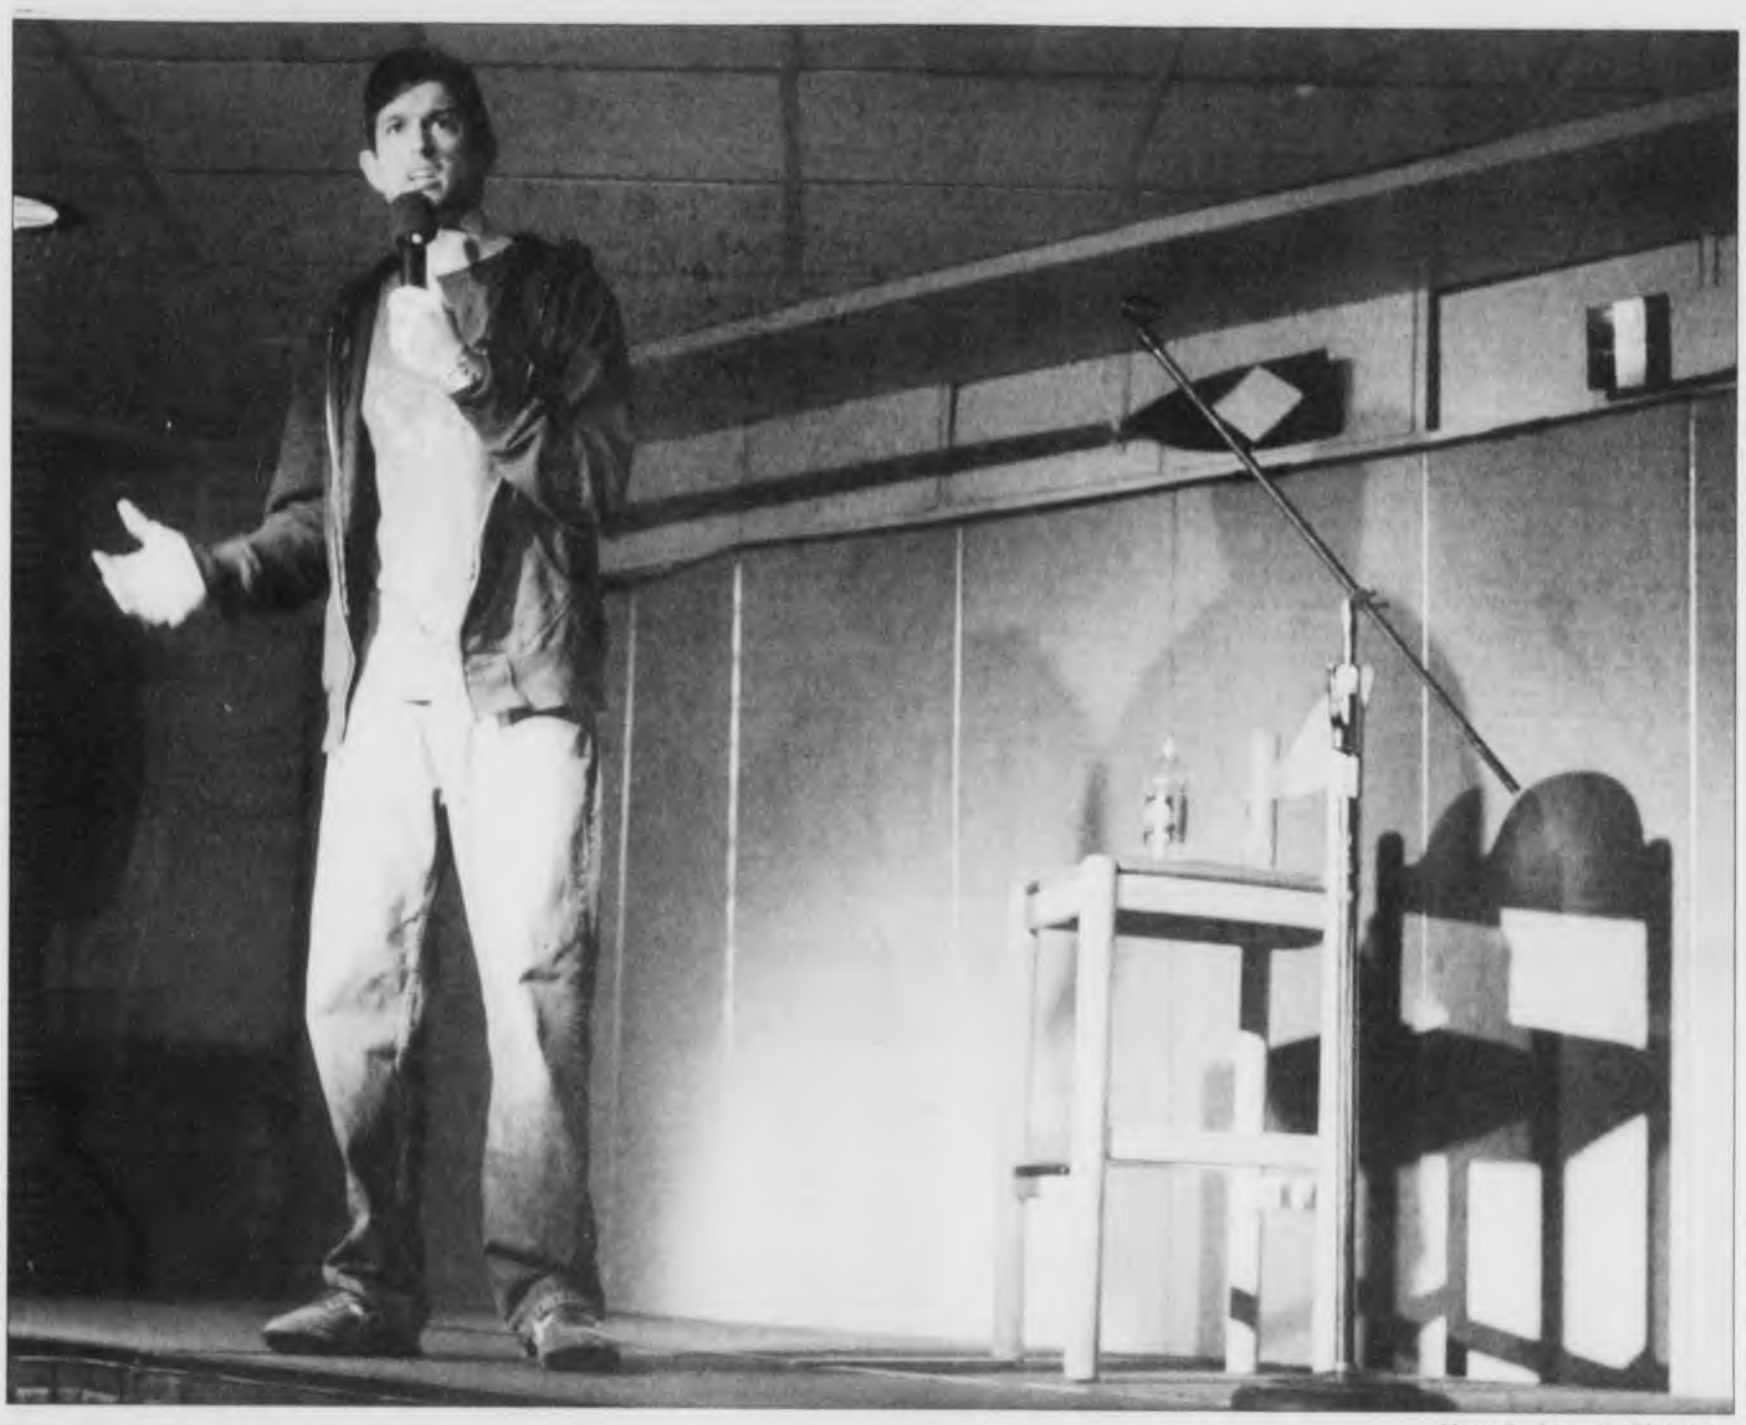
WASHINGTON, D.C. — Gilbert Arenas and the Washington Wizards are headed back to the playoffs, finally securing a spot by beating their possible first-round foes.

Arenas

Arenas scored 35 points Sunday, leading Washington past LeBron James and the Cleveland Cavaliers 104-92 to end a five-game losing streak and clinch consecutive postseason berths for the first time since 1988.

Antawn Jamison added 16 points and 11 rebounds for Washington, and Caron Butler added 21 points after being out for five games with a right thumb injury.

Butler sparked Washington with constant energy at both ends, and his 3-pointer at the buzzer ending the third quarter put the hosts ahead 88-62.



NHL | Thrashers still alive for final playoff spot

ATLANTA — The Atlanta Thrashers have never made the playoffs. Unless everything falls into place the last two days of the regular season, they'll be sitting home again.

The franchise appeared to be one of the most improved teams after the lockout and played admirably down the stretch.

The Thrashers, who have won four straight and are 6-1-1 in their last eight games, still find themselves three points behind Tampa Bay for the final playoff spot in the Eastern Conference.

Kristian Vallee is no stranger to the stand-up comedy arena. He has performed at four Kansas universities during the last two weeks and has been on "Premium Blend," "The Tonight Show" and "US Comedy Arts Festival."

Former teacher regales crowd with stories of students, relationships, politics

By Lauren Rohrer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One time, I had an eighth grade student that threatened to kill me when I was teaching. He wrote it in the 'Weekly Goals' section of his planner. The cops came and asked me if I felt threatened, and I told them that he hadn't met any of his weekly goals all semester – I wasn't worried. Now, if the smart girl that turned her homework in like a week early wrote it down, I would be a little freaked out.."
— Comedian Kristian Vallee

It was jokes that kept the K-State Student Union Station full Friday night. The Union Program Council featured comedian Kristian Vallee as part of its AfterHours program.

Vallee was selected to perform after his act impressed K-State representatives at the National Association of Campus Activities Regional Showcase in Tulsa, Okla., Sara Morton, co-chair for UPC, said.

"We don't bring in many comedians, and we are really excited to have Kristian here," Morton said.

Vallee, originally from San Diego, Calif., said he has visited four colleges in Kansas in the last two weeks including Washburn University, Wichita State University and the University of Kansas.

"I love college audiences because there are usually a lot of education majors who can relate to my material," Vallee said.

Vallee said he received his degree in English from the University of California at Irvine and taught junior high for four years before he became interested in comedy. He said he draws on his teaching experiences for much of his show.

Vallee said he was recently featured on Comedy Central's "Premium Blend," "The Tonight Show" and the 2003 "US Comedy Arts Festival" in Aspen, Colo., where he was interviewed by writer/director Kevin James.

"I would love to do more TV, and there is a Comedy Central special in the works," Vallee said.

"You guys all realize that, no matter what your political affiliation is, your president is retarded, right? I mean the guy would have declared war on hurricanes last year if he could have," Vallee said.

Vallee also expressed his enthusiasm for video games.

"Parents say that video games are violent, but it's not like they are trying to pull one over on the parents. The game is called 'Grand Theft Auto,' not 'SpongeBob's Happy Fun Drive,'" Vallee said.

Lindsey Motley, senior in dietetics; Hillary Manion, freshman in psychology; and Ben Motley, sophomore in pre-professional construction science and management, laugh at a joke made by comedian Kristian Vallee on Friday evening during the Union Program Council's After Hours.

"I thought it was excellent for the UPC to sponsor. You could tell that the students enjoyed poking fun at teachers. We had a really great time," Rikli said.

In the show, Vallee features a letter from a former student. "Now that my former students see me on TV, I get some interesting letters from eighth graders who remember me," Vallee said.

Morton said she was pleased with the success of the event.

"We've been really lucky with the acts we've brought in this year and also have some amazing things coming up," Morton said.

Family struggles with normalcy in dark comedy

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Dimly Perceived Threats to the System," a dark comedy about family dynamics and sociological values, was performed in the Purple Masque Theatre April 13-15.

The play, written by playwright Jon Klein, is about a supposedly average family of three that struggles because its members feel they don't fit into society's definition of "normal," Debbie Swann, the play's director, said.

The three main characters are members of the Hauser family: Josh, played by Cary Klataske, freshman in history; Josh's wife Marlys, played by Rebecca Butler, graduate student in speech; and the couple's 13-year-old daughter Christine, played by Laura Koger, freshman in theater.

The Hauser family deals with problems stemming from anxieties and insecurities, such as loneliness, dissatisfaction and feeling unloved.

They all try to deal with their problems individually, without communicating to one another, because they feel if they admit their problems, they've failed as a family unit.

The play is divided into scenes that resemble snapshots into each family member's life. Because each character is dealing with so many insecurities, sometimes they perceive other characters as saying things that aren't happening – which is signaled by a change in the color of the lighting.

These moments of false reality involve the primary character's biggest fears, desires and anxieties, such as when Josh keeps thinking his attractive producer, played by Rachael Fox, junior in theater, is trying to seduce him.

The play ends with a speech by Marlys to her husband and daughter, telling them they must come together and behave like a family or she will leave. Josh and Christine smile at her, and the family eats breakfast.

Swann, senior in theater, said the show has been a good experience.

"We sold out (Friday), and that was really exciting. We really try to promote to not just K-State students, but the Manhattan community, so it's great when they come out and support us," she said.

She said the group of student actors, designers and crew members began rehearsals in February.

Swann said she hoped audiences responded to it in a positive way.

"Theater, above all else, should be fun," she said. "If it's not fun, we're not doing our jobs."

Lacy Thompson the actress who portrayed Dr. Grey, said she really enjoyed the process of working on the production, and she was proud of the outcome.

"I've heard a lot of people say some of (the theater department's) best work is done in the Purple Masque," Thompson, junior in theater, said. "It's been a really good time."

Audience members who watched the show Saturday night laughed at the characters' antics and seemed to receive the show well.

"It was really good -- it was a different take on family," said Rachel Novotny, sophomore in open-option, who attended the play Saturday. "The fact that they had so much going on, and they kind of had to learn to deal with that; I really enjoyed it."

The Da Vinci Code | SONY PICTURES

Religious group request 'Da Vinci' disclaimer

The conservative religious group Opus Dei has asked for a disclaimer on the upcoming film based on the best-selling novel "The Da Vinci Code."

Opus Dei, portrayed as a murderous, power-hungry sect in the novel by Dan Brown, wrote in an April 6 letter to Sony Corp. that a disclaimer would show respect to Jesus and to the Catholic Church.

"Any such decision by Sony would be a gesture of respect toward the figure of Jesus, to the history of the Church and to the religious beliefs of viewers," Opus Dei wrote in the letter, which was posted on its Italian Web site.

"The Da Vinci Code" contends that Jesus married Mary Magdalene and had descendants and that Opus Dei and the Catholic Church were at the center of a coverup.

Pitt, Jolie consider Namibian baby name

A local governor in Namibia said Angelina Jolie and Brad Pitt told him they will have their baby in his country and are considering giving the child a Namibian name, a newspaper reported Sunday.

Jolie

Samuel Sheefeni Nuuyoma, the governor of the Namibian province where the couple is staying at a heavily guarded lodge, said he had breakfast Friday with the two stars, according to The Sunday Times of South Africa.

He said Jolie had made those choices because "she loves Namibia."

Namibian immigration officials confirmed earlier this month that the couple and five other people arrived in Walvis Bay on a chartered jet from Paris, prompting speculation their baby will be born in Africa.

The couple has been shielded from reporters by heavy security at a secluded beach resort near Walvis Bay, in an area where Namibia's desert sand dunes descend spectacularly to the sea.

Former gymnast tumbles for K-State cheer squad

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Never tell Jen Mayekawa cheerleading is not a sport.

While the members of the squad might be smiling on the sidelines, Mayekawa said hours of blood, sweat and tears go into perfecting the repertoire of cheers and difficult tumbling passes crowds have come to expect.

"The amount of dedication and physical stamina required for cheerleading is highly underestimated by many people," Mayekawa, sophomore in modern languages, said.

Mayekawa said she was once a skeptic herself.

She began training as a gymnast as soon as she could walk and competed until an injury forced her to quit the sport at age 16. She said she never considered joining the cheerleading squad until one of the coaches approached her as she practiced tumbling passes at the gym last year.

"She said the team could use someone with my experience, and asked if I'd like to try out," Mayekawa said.

Intrigued by the offer, Mayekawa said she decided to accept and shocked her family when she made the team after several days of grueling tryouts.

Mayekawa's mother and former gymnastics coach, Naomi Mayekawa, said her daughter's decision to be a cheerleader is still a source of constant teasing.

"Gymnasts, in general, don't have a lot of nice things to say about cheerleaders," Naomi Mayekawa said. "They think of them as wanna-be gymnasts. All through high school, Jen said she would never do cheerleading, but after she was forced to quit gymnastics, it gave her a way to use all of her tumbling training."

Although she had only a few days to learn the required cheers and routines for the game, she said the fan response was great.

"It wasn't nerve-wracking; it was exciting," she said. "I felt lucky to be a part of the football game and perform in front of all of those people."

Molly Hoss, junior in biology, is on the cheerleading squad with Mayekawa. Hoss said she enjoyed getting to know her and watch her grow as a member of the team.

"She didn't know much about cheering at the beginning of the year," Hoss said, "but she always does everything as positively as she can. It's been great to see her improve throughout the year."

After getting to know the members of her squad, Mayekawa said she realized cheerleaders are different from the bubbly stereotypes she often saw in movies and on television.

"There's this misconception that cheerleaders are a bunch of airheads who jump around during games," she said. "There are so many intelligent, down-to-earth members of this squad that people never get to see because of these stereotypes."

Despite the time commitment, multiple injuries and all of the grueling practices, Mayekawa said she is enjoying her cheerleading experience.

"It's definitely very tough, and very demanding," she said. "But the difficulty of cheerleading is part of the package. I just feel totally blessed for my time spent on the squad."

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Jen Mayekawa, sophomore in modern languages, practices cheers Thursday night in Bramlage Coliseum. The cheer squad is preparing for the Spring Game on Saturday.

Pope calls for peaceful nuclear talks

By Frances D'Emilio
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

VATICAN CITY – In his first Easter message as pontiff, Pope Benedict XVI on Sunday urged nations to use diplomacy to defuse nuclear crises – a clear reference to worries over Iran – and prayed that Palestinians would one day have their own state alongside Israel.

On Christianity's most joyous day – which happened to fall on Benedict's own 79th birthday – the pontiff also prayed for Iraq's relentless violence to cease.

From the central balcony of St. Peter's Basilica, Benedict reflected on the globe's troubled regions shortly after he celebrated Easter Mass in St. Peter's Square, which was packed with 100,000 pilgrims and tourists on a breezy, hazy day.

"Today, even in this modern age marked by anxiety and uncertainty, we relive the event of the Resurrection, which changed the face of our life and changed the history of humanity," Benedict said in the traditional papal "Urbi et Orbi" message – Latin for "to the city and to the world."

On Easter, Christians celebrate a core belief of their faith – that Jesus rose from the dead following his crucifixion. Orthodox Christians will celebrate Easter on April 23.

Benedict made note of recent developments that have raised fears Iran might be working toward building a nuclear arsenal.

"Concerning the international crises linked to nuclear power, may an honorable solution be found for all parties, through serious and honest negotiations," Benedict said without naming any country.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad recently said his country had successfully enriched uranium using 164 centrifuges, a significant step toward large-scale production of material that could be used to fuel nuclear reactors for generating electricity or to build atomic bombs.

Iran insists it only wants the peaceful use of nuclear power, but Western nations suspect Tehran wants to develop weapons and are demanding a halt to enrichment activities.

Pilgrims marking Easter also filled the streets of Jerusalem's Old City. The alleys were more crowded than in recent years, reflecting a drop in Palestinian-Israeli violence.

The Latin Patriarch of Jerusalem, Michel Sabbah, who is the leading Roman Catholic official in the Holy Land, celebrated Mass in the dark, incense-filled Church of the Holy Sepulcher, built on the spot where many Christians believe that Jesus died on the cross.

After leading black-robed priests into the church singing the Lord's Prayer, the Palestinian-born patriarch lit worshippers' candles, which gradually illuminated the painted dome ceiling erected in the Crusader era.

"This is like a dream come true for us to be here in the Holy Land," said Rona Arida, 29, a Philippine worker in Israel, after praying with her friends at the church. "I prayed for all of my family back home."

In Washington, the Rev. Franklin Graham, the son of minister Billy Graham, tied the sacrifice of Jesus to the sacrifice made by military personnel in an Easter sunrise service at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

"The greatest battle we face in this world is the battle for the souls of men and women," Graham told about 400 people gathered, including about a half-dozen wounded soldiers.

At the Vatican, Benedict was interrupted by applause when he said of Iraq: "may peace finally prevail over the tragic violence that continues mercilessly to claim victims."

"I also pray sincerely that those caught up in the conflict in the Holy Land may find peace, and I invite all to patient and persevering dialogue, so as to remove both ancient and new obstacles," the pontiff said.

Junior Jacob Voegeli started the first three games of the season at center last year but did not suit up for practice on Saturday.

Sophomore guard John Hafferty started all 11 games at left guard last year and said his starting is one reason why his transition is taking a little longer than some of the men who didn't play as much last year.

"The transition is a little hard for me because the initial steps when the ball is snapped is different, and I'm not used to it," Hafferty said. "The guys who did not get as much playing time aren't as used to moving a certain way in game situations, but I feel like these three weeks I have improved my game immensely.

"We struggled at times last year, and we feel like we are becoming 'the line' instead of a bunch of individuals blocking, and I think that this is going to be our year to shine."

Cummins said the Wildcats weren't the only team that struggled, but he understands this course was a good test with the Big 12 Championship right around the corner.

"We did OK the first day as a team," Cummins said, "but then we just struggled, along with a lot of the other good schools, which just goes to show you how hard the course was playing.

"The courses are only going to get harder, so now we just have to keep working and get ready for next week."

Senior Ben Kern, who won the ASU Thunderbird Invitational on April 8 and 9, did not play as well as he did last week and could manage only a tie for 29th after firing a 13-over 229 (75-77-77).

Freshman Robert Streb tied for 33rd after shooting a 15-over 231 (77-75-79); freshman Joe Kinney tied for 39th after carding a 16-over 232 (78-80-74) and sophomore Kyle Yonke tied for 50th after firing an 18-over 234 (74-80-80).

Kinney said he played poorly and had a couple of unlucky breaks on the course, but said he is confident the team will be ready for next weekend.

"I think it was kind of tough coming off of last week because we played really well," Kinney said. "But having a bad week like this will get us that much more ready to go and try to redeem ourselves."

Jody Portuese, owner of Bluestem Financial Management, 969 S. Manhattan Ave., said by this point in the tax season, there is an obvious alternative.

"If they haven't done them yet, call a professional preparer," she said. "They would probably ask to file an extension, but don't wait until the last minute.

"Better to pay a little extra over an extension than to stress and not file at all."

For students who plan to file at home, Portuese said to check for deductions that might have been missed.

"If they are going to attempt to do it themselves, do all of the education tax breaks that they can," she said. "Having their parents claim them as dependents is another way to get deductions."

Cheryl McKinnon, postmaster at the Manhattan Post Office, 500 Leavenworth St., said post office hours will not change to accommodate last-minute filers.

"We won't be able to extend the hours at all," she said. "The last pick-up is at 4:30 p.m., and it will be postmarked on the 17th."

For some it's Darren Sproles, the little halfback with a big heart who led the Wildcats to their first-ever Big 12 Conference football title.

For others, it's one of the basketball greats like Jack Parr or Bob Boozer, who took K-State to the Final Four. For many, it's Bill Snyder, the legendary coach who put K-State athletics back on the map.

But there are some unsung heroes without whom none of these achievements would have been possible.

Those heroes are the men and women of the K-State grounds crew.

Michael Martin, equipment operator and head groundskeeper for the men's baseball team, said he worked for the grounds crew since he was a K-State student.

"I worked here as a student all through college," Martin said. "I was working here over the summer, and the boss that had this position before me left to take a spot on main campus. I stepped in temporarily and then was hired."

Martin said he worked on the grounds crew for one and a half years as a student, and has worked full-time for six years.

Like his predecessor, Martin said he continues to hire students for his grounds crew, which now is composed of eight students.

In a typical day, Martin said he and his crew water and drag the infield, trim the infield grass, paint lines, repair damaged field areas, pick up trash, mow the outfield and do other tasks to get the field in optimum condition for the team.

"It doesn't feel like work," Martin said. "I love it."

Martin said one of his favorite things about his job is deciding what designs to mow in the outfield grass.

Cheney to give rally for troops

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Vice President Dick Cheney will attend a rally at 2:30 p.m. today at Fort Riley's Cavalry Parade Field.

The vice president's appearance comes on the heels of the redeployment of a number of Fort Riley troops from Iraq – a fact that will play heavily on his appearance, said Stephanie Perrin, assistant media relations officer for Fort Riley.

Cheney
VICE PRESIDENT

"He really wants to come and thank the 3rd Brigade," she said.

Cheney's visit comes less than three months after President Bush's Jan. 23 Landon Lecture at Bramlage Coliseum.

Entrance to the event is being restricted and will be limited to soldiers, soldiers' spouses and children over the age of 12, Fort Riley civilian employees and special invitees.

Restrictions are due to limited capacity and security concerns, Perrin said.

According to a White House press release, the vice president is expected to land at 2:05 p.m. at the Manhattan Regional Airport and then will proceed to Fort Riley.

The press release did not detail what the vice president's appearance will entail.

Commission to discuss rezoning land

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The City Commission will meet at 7 tonight to discuss the rezoning of an industrial Eureka addition south of the Flint Hills Job Corps Center.

City Commissioner Jayme Morris-Hardeman said the meeting will be low-key, without many controversial issues.

Morris-Hardeman said she thought the most discussed item for the meeting would be the reading of ordinances annexing and rezoning the Eureka addition.

Morris-Hardeman said the Eureka addition would turn an agricultural area to an industrial park.

She said she thought the issue might be controversial for community members because an addition to the land could increase flooding in the area.

"The concern people have with that is the drainage," she said. "I definitely want to make sure drainage issues are addressed."

City Commissioner Tom Phillips said the Eureka addition has been discussed before, but because the land is flat, landowners have been concerned about the chance for increased flooding.

"We'll expect the developer and their engineer to make sure that

K-State Challenge Course allocated $200,000

Student Fee Bond Proposals

A series featuring the project proposals for surplus bonds.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Challenge Course was allocated $200,000 by the student fee bond surplus review committee.

The Challenge Course initially asked for $115,000 in its proposal, said Grant Groene, chair of the bond surplus fund committee.

"We thought this funding would alleviate the cost of using the course for student groups," Groene said. "We gave them the $85,000 to spread out and use to lower the cost for students."

Groene said this would not lower the costs for community groups or other groups not affiliated with K-State.

"The whole point of the course is to develop teamwork and trust between groups," he said.

Emily Lehning, project coordinator, said she asked for funding to help construct the Challenge Course.

"The gift from student government is the first initiative we have in place and now we are getting to see our plans come alive," said Lehning, assistant dean of New Student Services.

Plans for the Challenge Course are broken up into three phases, Lehning said. Phase 1 is the construction and installation of the different elements needed to build the actual course. Phase 2 is the addition of associative features including a shelter and gathering place for users of the course. Phase 3 is expanding the course.

Lehning said the funding she asked for was to cover the expenses of phase one.

"I think this challenge

67 killed in bus crash

VERACRUZ, Mexico — A vastly overcrowded passenger bus veered off a highway emergency ramp and crashed through a metal barrier Monday, plunging more than 650 feet into a ravine in eastern Mexico. At least 67 people were killed, including four children. Four people were injured in the wreck, that occurred as the bus traveled on steep, mountainous roads.

2 Duke players indicted

DURHAM, N.C. — A grand jury issued sealed indictments Monday against two members of the Duke University lacrosse team in connection with allegations that a stripper was raped last month at a team party, a source close to the case told The Associated Press. The source said he did not know which players were indicted or what charges they faced.

Staff shake-up

WASHINGTON, D.C — President Bush's new chief of staff, Josh Bolten, said Monday it was time to "refresh and re-energize the team," and he told senior White House aides who might be thinking about quitting this year to go ahead and leave now. Taking charge in a time of crisis, Bolten laid down his pointed directive at his first meeting with top presidential aides.

A series of interviews with soldiers in Iraq

K-State students and alumni serving in Iraq answer questions about their experiences. Interviews done by Sean M. Matthews, SFC, US Army, Infantry and junior in mass communications, who is serving in Iraq.

By Sean M. Matthews
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Name: Darrin J. Yuhn Sr.
Rank: 1st Sgt.
Age: 39
Civilian occupation: Land surveyor, Kaw Valley, England; Junction City.
Years in the military: 21 years, eight with active duty, 13 with Kansas National Guard
Hometown: Riley, Kan., 14 years
Active student or alumnus: Alumnus
Year graduated: December 1996

Q: What is your duty position?
A: 1st Sgt.

Q: What is your job here?
A: Organize duty rosters, handle soldier issues: morale, mail, food, equipment, housing and discipline. I am the senior enlisted person, responsible for the health and welfare of a 100-plus-man infantry company.

Q: What did you think about when you found out your unit was being deployed to Iraq?
A: Nothing in particular, it was only a matter of time before we were activated.

Q: Besides your family, what do you miss the most from back home and why?
A: Besides my family, there's not much I miss. I am a pretty simple man who doesn't need a lot of things. I have a place to sleep and to eat. The basic necessities are all that I really need. I do, however, miss the ability to enjoy the occasional beer now and then.

Q: How is your family coping with the situation of your being deployed?
A: I am one of the lucky ones. I have a strong wife who can handle things on her own. She's been doing this with me for about 19 years, so she knows full well what to expect. My civilian job takes me away from home on a routine basis, so time gone is nothing new to my children as well.

Activist addresses leadership void

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There is a leadership void in the African-American community, said Jeffrey "Cousin Jeff" Johnson, a hip-hop and civil rights activist, when he spoke to a group of about 70 people at the K-State Student Union Little Theatre Monday night.

Johnson's speech was a part of Alpha Week, an annual celebration for Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity.

Abdul Yahaya, senior in civil engineering and president of Alpha Phi Alpha, said he hoped the presentation would help make people politically active and aware for the upcoming elections in the fall.

"Alpha Phi Alpha will have a campaign this fall to get more people registered to vote," he said. "This should help it kick off."

Johnson was introduced as an activist who began his career during college when he became the first black president of his school's student government.

He also has been featured on Black Entertainment Television.

Throughout the lecture, Johnson emphasized his belief that, in the African-American community, there is a "leadership void."

He listed three areas where he believed social and political issues should be addressed in a more active manner.

Those areas included the black church, electorate, and organizations.

He mentioned examples such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Urban League.

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Jeffrey "Cousin Jeff" Johnson, speaker on hip-hop and civil rights, addresses a crowd gathered in the K-State Student Union Little Theatre Monday night. Johnson was the keynote speaker for Alpha Phi Alpha's annual Alpha Week.

Johnson said he believed young people need leadership the most.

"The young generation is looking for leadership from hip hop artists," he said. "But anyone who thinks they are role models are crazy. I like Kanye (West), but I wouldn't want him raising my kids."

"Express honestly who you are," he said. "Don't avoid doing that just to make someone who doesn't understand you uncomfortable."

Akilah Mahon, junior in finance, said she was inspired by Johnson's message.

"He helped me to realize we need to reach back into the community," she said. "We need to start at the bottom and work up – you can't use a hip hop singer, because their motivation isn't within the community."

Mahon said that as next year's president for the Black Student Union, she has received several ideas to enhance the activities of the group.

"These ideas are really going to help us with our on-campus mentoring program," she said. "We are hoping to utilize upperclassmen to help out."

Yahaya said the keynote speaker was one of the many events that Alpha Phi Alpha sponsored this week.

Yahaya said the group will also be sponsoring After Hours in the Union and a presentation that will highlight the appreciation of women.

"We will have many events during the week to increase campus awareness of our group," Yahaya said.

SafeRide to hire new coordinator

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The SafeRide Program, offering a safe alternative from drunken driving or other threatening situations, will hire a new coordinator next week.

SafeRide Coordinator Amy Guerich, senior in family studies and human services, is graduating this spring and said she is excited about helping choose a new student to take over her responsibilities.

Guerich said she is looking for someone who could learn quickly, be dedicated to the program and bring new ideas in marketing.

Guerich said another responsibility of the coordinator is to be able to maintain relationships between the university, local bar owners and the Student Governing Association.

Guerich said the past year has required time to research ways the program could be more serviceable to the student body.

"When I came, my thoughts were to promote SafeRide and make it more used," she said. "I would really want to see someone dedicated to the program and making SafeRide a top priority. It's been challenging as we faced difficulties with the cab companies and securing funding."

At the beginning of her time with SafeRide, Guerich said she understood the time and commitment necessary for the program to succeed, and wanted to provide new ideas to try to increase the effectiveness of SafeRide.

While Guerich said she averages five to seven hours a week, she said she also works hard to make the program successful.

"I just work hard to make sure the students are being served," she said.

Karen Pence, assistant dean of human ecology, said she has worked with Guerich in the College of Human Ecology ambassadors and has seen her as a good leader with good ideas.

"She's very organized, and plans well and is disciplined," Pence said. "She's also good at delegating. She doesn't have to do it herself."

Gayle Spencer, coordinator for the Office of Student Activities and Services, said Guerich has worked well as coordinator of SafeRide and stayed on task with her responsibilities.

"She's done a great job," she said. "She's tried to stay on top of the cab company."

For the next coordinator, Spencer said she is looking for a student with strong communication skills and a willingness to work for the program.

Over the last year, Spencer said the SafeRide services have not changed much, but she said she hopes the program will continue to improve.

"The utilization is about the same," she said. "We do want to do some different things to work better for students."

Beach land donation continues tradition of art museum funding

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nearly 6,000 acres of Ellis County land was sold for almost $3.5 million by the KSU Foundation, according to a March 30 report in the Hays Daily News.

The land had been donated to the KSU Foundation by Ross and Marianna Beach, said Lorne Render, director of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

Render said when the KSU Foundation sold the land, the money went to the KSU Endowment Fund for the museum.

The Beaches wanted the money to go to general operating, exhibition programs and educational programs at the museum, Render said.

Julie Lea, vice president of communication and development for the KSU Foundation, said the donation of land is one of the many ways people can donate to the university.

KSU Foundation is a not-for-profit funding arm for the university where donations can be made, Lea said.

"If donations were given directly to the university, then they would go to the state funds," Lea said.

She said other ways to donate to the KSU Foundation besides writing a check or giving cash include donating a person's assets from their retirement plan, life insurance or real estate at the end of their lifetime.

People can ask to have the money go wherever they request, Lea said.

The donation of the land isn't the only contribution the Beaches have made, said Gary Hellebust, president and chief executive officer of the KSU Foundation.

"The Beaches have a long relationship with K-State," Hellebust said. "They have a long history of support, through their leadership and time given."

Hellebust said the couple began supporting the interest in the museum when it was built and were the lead donors for the $7 million building project.

Being the leading donors, they got to name the museum, Hellebust said.

He said Ross decided to name the museum after his wife for their 50th wedding anniversary.

Hellebust said the couple also has made major contributions to the museum's new additions, as well as substantial gifts to the museum's endowment fund.

"They are wonderful people," Hellebust said. "They are the absolute epitome of philanthropic support for the university."

TO THE POINT

Other projects more worthy of surplus funding

The Bond Surplus Review Committee announced its final six project proposals to the public March 1.

The committee allocated a total of $1,487,464 from a bond surplus fund of $1.5 million. The projects include audio and visual enhancements to McCain Auditorium, a fire suppression system for the K-State Student Union, funds to SafeRide, a Google search appliance for Hale Library, renovations to the International Student Center and a K-State Challenge Course.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

The challenge course project proposal initially requested $115,000, but the committee granted it $200,000, stating that the additional funding would alleviate the cost to student groups for using the course.

While K-State students will be able to use the challenge course at a discounted rate or for free, the majority of the student body will have no need to use the course.

The bond surplus proposal committee should have allocated more funding to other project proposals.

SafeRide initially requested $600,000 for its project. The Bond Surplus Review Committee decided to grant the project $142,464, however.

The committee reasoned it should only grant money to projects that required a one-time allocation.

There should have been more allocations made to other project proposals and less allocated to the future K-State Challenge Course.

Inventors should focus technology on solving daily difficulties

JACI BOYDSTON

For the past several centuries, scientists and inventors have come up with one invention after another to make our lives easier.

For example, communication with people across the country was once limited by the speed at which a horse could travel – it's now an instantaneous event. Although scientists have solved the problem of long-distance communication and many others, there are still plenty of inconveniences of modern life they should turn their attention to in the next hundred years.

SPELLING

Microsoft Word has spell check. Why don't we? You would think the sheer number of bad spellers over the years would necessitate a human spell check more efficient and less bulky than a pocket dictionary. Digital spelling devices, while a step in the right direction, are still inconvenient and nerdy. How about a pen that automatically corrects spelling and grammar mistakes?

COOKING

A microwave can create low-quality food quickly. An oven can create high-quality food slowly. How far are we away from a device that can produce a delicious Thanksgiving dinner in 30 seconds?

BATHING

Don't get me wrong, I encourage bathing for all members of society. But think how much time the average American spends grooming and cleaning over the course a lifetime. Depending on how high-maintenance you are, bathing and grooming rituals take between 10 minutes and one-and-a-half hours each day. Just think – if there were some kind of electric device that could get a person completely clean with the push of the button, we'd each have an extra chunk of time to ourselves each day. We could finish up some homework, work out or, more likely, watch an extra half-hour of trashy reality TV.

POTTY-TRAINING

Although I've never been confronted with this particular challenge, I can't imagine the time and energy it takes to teach a 2-year-old who can barely speak how to use the big potty. If all that effort could be harnessed into a more productive endeavor, like curing cancer or teaching horses to talk, we'd be a lot closer to a cancer-free world filled with talking horses.

Maybe someday there'll be a prenatal drug that causes children to be born potty-trained.

CHECKING SPORTS SCORES

How many times have you watched whatever was playing on ESPN, just waiting for the score of a particular game to scroll across the screen?

Did you ever get to find out the score to that game, or did they cut to commercial right before it would have appeared? That's what I thought. I'm sure in a few years, when the computer and the television have merged into a single entity, this problem will be alleviated. Until then, we'll have to make do with scrolling scores and ESPN.com.

TAKING OUT THE TRASH

Throwing it away is easy, but bagging it up and taking it out to the dumpster or the curb? Surely we could come up with something better than that – how about trash cans that serve as direct portals to recycling facilities or ones that convert garbage to energy for heating and powering the home?

There are many other problems the scientific community could be tackling right now, these are just a few suggestions.

In a few years, with a little luck and some dedicated inventors, we could all be cooking 30-second feasts, using trash to power our homes and bathing with magic wands. After that, what else would we need?

Accomplishments should be basis for pride

JONAS HOGG

I need some pride. Being a straight, white male of Christian ancestry does not entitle me to much of it.

Pride, it seems, sprouts from multiculturalism, or manufactured diversity or some such. Being neither multi- nor cultured, I find myself prideless.

What to make of various breeds of pride?

Black pride, gay pride, Hispanic pride are all fine and good, though no one dare mention white pride without tying it to a joke about southern whites.

If we wish to have our cake and eat it too, this seems a good tactic: denounce racial, religious and sexual classifications as stupid and artificial (which they are) while simultaneously declaring such classifications as necessary and important for individual and group identity.

For what reason is this a cause for pride or shame?

I possess eyebrows and a uvula; these were installed by the same genetic material that determines skin color, yet they are of minor importance. I have yet to hear of uvula-pride, at any rate.

Many of the arguments one hears teeter upon mutual histories of mistreatment and oppression. Yes, there are without question times when people possessing dark skin were treated horribly – at times by those with white skin.

Similarly, there are times when those with light skin mistreated others with light skin, and times when dark-skinned people mistreated light-skinned people.

If we were to examine it thoughtfully we could surely realize that almost everyone in history has been treated poorly by everyone else in some form or another, and in doing so we could say, "let us not treat each other poorly anymore, regardless of pigmentation."

But exclusive pride groups are not concerned with a continuity of the species so much as separation. I could not, for instance, declare myself possessing Asian pride, for obvious reasons. If I attempted to do so I would either be reviled or ridiculed.

Such proclamations are, by nature, exclusionary.

I cannot have gay pride, because I am not gay; it is an exclusive club to which I have no access. Yet, if pride is "a sense of one's own dignity or value," then to associate it with an arbitrary trait such as homosexuality, is to view that trait as preferable to the alternative.

Certainly, I have no reason to pride my straightness – it is not something I have accomplished. It is simply the way I am. I do not have pride in my attraction to starry nights. For what reason should I pride myself in my attraction to women, or were I gay, the lack thereof?

Similarly, we supposedly take pride in the accomplishments of those with whom we share heritage.

Do I have greater claim to the work of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. than I do of Mohandas Gandhi due to, again, pigmentation?

It seems they are both people who have contributed enormously to the world in which we live. To compartmentalize accomplishments in such terms is to reduce their value.

We should heave this notion of arbitrary pride; it is not something the capable should truck with. Pride isn't measured by pigment, book or partner; defining it as such signals an abyss of accomplishment.

Exhibit celebrates advances in cancer research

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Julie Gibbs said she could remember when a cancer diagnosis was equal to a death sentence.

"When I was a child, and my parents would tell me that someone had cancer, it was like you were saying goodbye to that person," Gibbs, graduate student in fine arts, said. "It was a sure thing that their health would gradually get worse and worse, and they would die."

Now, however, Gibbs said, with the advent of improved medical technology, cancer is becoming an illness from which many people recover.

"Cancer is becoming an illness that is more and more contained, we're dealing with it proactively," Gibbs said.

This idea of containment became the central theme to "Cancer Contained," a ceramics exhibit Gibbs curated.

She produced pieces for the exhibit, along with seven of her classmates.

"One thing that all of us deal with in the ceramic department is containers, whether they're vessels, or pitchers, or cups, or bowls," she said. "We all include them in our art."

Gibbs said she got the idea for the exhibit while viewing a quilting exhibit at the center earlier this year.

"I approached my classmates – and there are a good number of us this semester – and I talked with the cancer center, and they loved the idea," she said.

The exhibit opened on April 4 and will run through April 27.

Gibbs said the decision to display this month was made because this is when the center has the highest amount of foot traffic.

"They have events going on, and a lot of people coming in from all over the country to share research," she said.

Gibbs said she would like for the exhibit to draw attention to the center, because it is a great resource on campus that many students probably do not know about.

"We would love to have students come through and learn more about the great things the center is doing," she said.

Gibbs said the artists had the option to provide two pieces of work.

According to a K-State Media Relations press release, the artists contributing to the exhibit are Sunny Schultz, Lazare Rottach, Machiko Yamazaki, Todd Matteson, Reed Fahnestock, Elizabeth James and Brandon Lutterman, all graduate students in fine arts.

"We have a wonderful space, with lots of walls and lots of light," Galitzer said.

Galitzer said she has enjoyed having both the quilt exhibit from the fall and the ceramics exhibit on display at the center.

"We love having the art here and providing the space to the students," Galitzer said. "I think it's wonderful."

Ceramics by the artist Lazare Rottach, graduate student in fine arts, are displayed in the K-State Center for Basic Cancer Research. Rottach's work, along with other graduate students' work, is being displayed in the cancer center until April 27.

What do you do to pass the time or unwind to keep your mind off of duty in a war zone?
A: The same things I would do had I been at home: sleep, watch a movie, read a book, yell at my troops when they screw up.

Q: What has been your most memorable moment here?
A: I don't have one particular moment.

The best thing I would say is that I saw my company become a fine fighting force that would equal any active duty unit.

Q: Has your opinion about Iraq changed since you've been here?
A: No.

Q: Do you think the news coverage presents an accurate account of the Iraqi conflict?
A: No, not enough good things come out of the media.

They concentrate mostly on the bad, and the fact that we deal with the people on a daily basis in a positive way is not always shown.

A: No, not enough of the positive is made public.

Q: Do you think the election process will work for Iraq and the Iraqi people, and do you think Iraq will ever achieve some democratic form of government?
A: Only time will tell. We've been at this democratic process for over 200 years, and our system still has its problems.

Q: What are your personal experiences with the Iraqi people and how do you think they perceived you?
A: Me and my soldiers deal with the people on a daily basis. Some like us being here and others don't.

Those that have had a bad experience, and it may not have even been with the U.S., are naturally going to dislike us. I dealt with that every day while I was stationed in Germany as well.

Q: Do you agree with all of the decisions made by President Bush concerning the situations in Iraq? Why or why not?
A: Whether I agree with them or not is not an issue. I am and have been a soldier for 21 years any legal decisions that have been made are things that I have to follow. And no, I am not some "blind follower." I take issue with things within my scope and don't bother with anything that doesn't concern me or my men.

Q: Do you believe the pressure put on President Bush by the American people is fair, now that you are serving in Iraq? Why or why not?
A: It is quite easy for someone who has their freedom to say we shouldn't be here. If I'm not mistaken, we had help gaining our own freedom from oppression. That's what I see us doing over here. Those that haven't served, whether it's here or anywhere else, do not deserve to have an opinion on military matters. Keep in mind that we serve in an all-volunteer army, and that each soldier knew he had a chance of coming over here.

Q: What is the morale of your troops and peers, and if low, why?
A: The morale of my soldiers is good. It's gotten better since arriving in theater. They know their mission and what is expected of them.

Q: How do you feel about the drawdown of troops in Iraq?
A: Not too good. We have to do more with less.

Q: How much longer do you think we will be in Iraq?
A: If you consider the fact that we are still in Germany after 60 years, I think we will have a presence for a long time.

Q: When the United States finally pulls out of Iraq, do you think Iraq will remain an ally of the United States? Why?
A: When you consider all the good we have done, I don't see why they wouldn't.

Q: How has being deployed changed your outlook on the future?
A: This isn't my first trip over here, and I doubt it will be my last.

Q: When this is over, do you think it was worth it?
A: That would depend on whether or not we are allowed to complete the mission, and not let politics get in the way.

Mexican bus plunges into ravine; 67 die

By Miguel Hernandez
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

VERACRUZ, Mexico – An overcrowded bus speeding home from a religious festival veered off a highway emergency ramp and crashed through a metal barrier Monday, plunging more than 650 feet into a ravine. At least 67 people were killed, including four children.

Four people survived the plunge from the highway, considered one of the 15 most dangerous in Mexico. The bus had already traveled for more than 10 hours as it returned from an Easter gathering in the western city of Guadalajara to the passengers' home state of Tabasco, on the Gulf Coast.

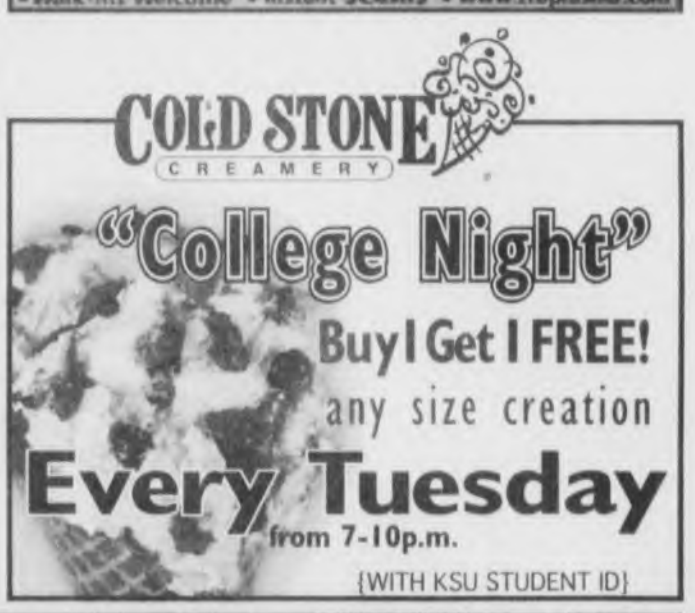
Rescuers ended their search for victims after recovering 63 bodies, state attorney general official Rosa Elvira Gonzalez said. She said four people died at hospitals. Officials did not say if the driver survived.

The bus, equipped to hold 46 passengers, was carrying 71, some of whom were standing, said Federal Preventive Police Cmdr. Reinaldo Ascencio Cavazos. He said the owner of the bus was detained for questioning.

Ascencio said the passengers belonged to two religious groups, the Guadalajara-based Light of the World and Pentecostes.

In Guadalajara, Light of The World spokesman Sara Susana Pozos said those killed were not members of her church.

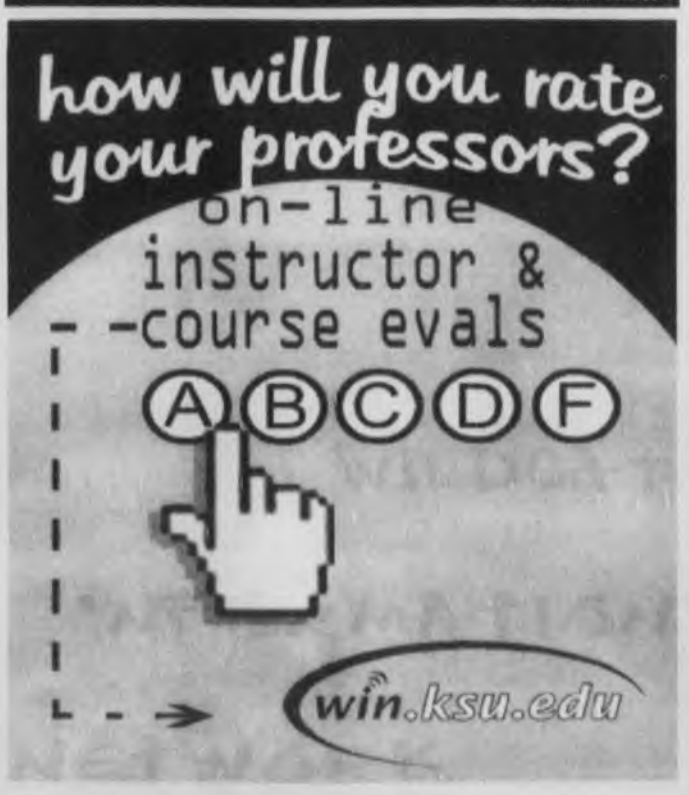
Pozos said police might have been confused because some of the female bus passengers wore long clothing and carried Bibles, like many of those faithful to The Light of the World.



Police did not immediately know what caused the crash, but said the driver had been trying to maneuver into a lane designed for vehicles that have brake or other mechanical failures as the bus descended a winding mountain road. The bus fell between 650 and 820 feet, authorities said.

The bus was thought to be traveling at 68-70 mph. Buses often are required to limit their speed to 60 mph.

The Light of the World church has seen its share of deadly accidents. In 2002, a bus carrying church members tore through a toll booth and crashed into a cement wall.



3 athletes, team make regionals

Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The 27th Annual Sun Angel Classic proved to be a success for K-State, as three athletes and one relay team qualified for the NCAA Midwest Regional Saturday in Tempe, Ariz.

Sophomore Morgan Bonds took second in the 800-meter run with a personal-best time of 2 minutes, 8.33 seconds, qualifying her for regionals. Bonds' 4x400-meter relay team – which consists of juniors Monique Coleman and Marnyka Honeycutt and freshman Emily Dittemore – also qualified for regionals after a third-place finish with a time of 3:39.43 in the event.

Senior Shunte Thomas entered the regional ranking after placing third in the 400 with a 52.93-second clocking, and freshman Liliani Mendez tallied a personal-best 4:48.94 in the mile, qualifying her for the regionals, as well.

Lack of fan support hurts cities

MATTHEW GIRARD

Lately, the citizens of cities with professional sports teams are increasingly irritating.

On Thursday, NBA Commissioner David Stern addressed the issue surrounding improvements to Key Arena, which is home to the Seattle SuperSonics, saying that Seattle is, "not interested in having the NBA there," in an Associated Press article.

Stern and Sonics owner Howard Schultz went to Washington lawmakers to ask for approval of a sales-tax package to help renovate Key Arena, or build a new home for the Sonics, but lawmakers said they won't consider a sales-tax this year.

This, of course, leaves the door open for the Sonics to leave town and find a new home.

Earlier this month, the citizens of Jackson County, Mo., voted against a sales-tax increase that would have given Kauffman Stadium and Arrowhead Stadium a rolling roof. The rolling roof would have allowed both the homes of the Royals and Chiefs to host – among other things – Major League Baseball's All-Star game and the National Football League's Super Bowl.

The good folks of Jackson County did approve renovations for the "K" and Arrowhead, but not to house some of professional sports' most watched events.

I understand that no one ever wants to pay more taxes, and it seems as though those money-hungry owners just want more money, but the citizens of these cities are taking what they have for granted.

I have never voted for a sales-tax increase for a new stadium, but growing up in western Kansas, the closest pro-teams were five hours away, in either direction.

It was an all-weekend trip just to go spend a few hours at a game.

Why not bring more exposure to your city and your team with such events as the Super Bowl or the All-Star game?

The fractions of a cent increase that would come with a new stadium or renovations to upgrade a facility to host such events would pay off in the end with the revenue brought in by the events.

The situation ultimately hurts the fans.

If an owner or a league commissioner feels a city isn't willing to do whatever it can to help a certain team, that team could find a new home.

There are plenty of cities around the country that are willing to greet a professional team with open arms, while the fans of the "leaving" teams are left wondering what happened.

Budding rivalry

K-State hopes for 4th straight win over Wichita State

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is looking for its fourth-consecutive win over in-state rival Wichita State when the Wildcats travel to Wichita to take on the Shockers at 7 tonight at Eck Stadium.

Senior Brandon Farr said the chance to beat a well-known program like Wichita State (27-13, 6-6 Missouri Valley Conference) four games in a row is exciting for the Wildcats (23-9-1, 3-8-1 Big 12 Conference).

"It's definitely a mark that we are trying to reach," Farr said. "Playing that caliber of team, everybody knows them and they are a well-known program and that's what we want to be. If we can go out there and get a fourth win against them, hopefully that's another step in the right direction for us."

A win against the Shockers at Eck Stadium would also mark the first time since 1978 the Wildcats have won consecutive games in Wichita. K-State downed Wichita State 6-3 in Manhattan on March 14.

Coach Brad Hill said K-State will have to be ready for its mid-week contest with Wichita State and the Wildcats' fifth-consecutive road game.

K-State at WSU
When: 7 tonight
Where: Eck Stadium, Wichita
Radio: KMAN - AM1350

"To me, it's another game," Hill said. "It's like a Big 12-type game and you better be ready to play."

The Shockers come into the game riding a three-game sweep of Missouri State and boast the Missouri Valley's best pitching staff with an ERA of 3.06 and the conference's third-best hitting team with a batting average of .290.

Hill said the Shockers speed on the base paths will be a focal point for the Wildcat defense.

"Their team speed is something to be concerned about, but the big thing will be not giving them any freebies," Hill said. "You can't walk them and do things like that. We have to make them earn everything they get."

K-State will counter with the Big 12's second-best hitting team with a team batting average of .326. The Wildcats also have cranked out 13 hits per game over their last five games.

The Wildcats also have the league's top two hitters in seniors Joe Roundy and Barrett Rice. Rice leads the league in hitting with a .434 batting average, while Roundy is a close second with a .423 batting average.

Although K-State has swung the bat well, Farr said K-State still has some work to do.

"When you're getting that many hits, you expect to score a lot of runs and I think we've kind of struggled with runners in scoring position," Farr said. "We're swinging the bats well, but we've still got some work to do with runners in scoring position."

The Wildcats split their series with Texas Tech this past weekend with a 4-2 loss on Thursday, a 16-5 win on Friday and an 11-11 tie on Saturday.

The tie was the first for the Wildcats in 24 years.

Despite Saturday's game ending in a tie, Farr extended his hitting streak to 16 games with a hit in the 10th inning – a sight his mother wasn't pleased to see.

"I saw my mom this weekend and she got on me because I told her I was growing my facial hair out until my hitting streak was over and going into Saturday, I hadn't got a hit going into extra innings and I ended up getting one, so the facial hair is still going," Farr said.

K-State's Eli Rumler makes a throw to first base during K-State's game against Texas last week. K-State will try to sweep Wichita State for the second-straight season when they travel to Wichita tonight.

Cats drop 2 in a row against Texas

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's tennis team suffered two losses last weekend at the hands of Big 12 Conference foes.

On Saturday the Wildcats (9-9, 5-5 Big 12) lost to Texas A&M (11-2, 7-2), 6-1. K-State then traveled to Austin, Texas, to play the University of Texas, losing 5-2.

"It was a tough weekend on the road for us," coach Steve Bietau said. "We were beat up and the conditions were tough with it being hot down there."

Dropping two in a row is tough to handle, Bietau said.

"Our team has pride and they don't like getting beat like that," Bietau said.

Da Valle defeated Tiffany Clifford of Texas A&M (6-2, 4-6, 1-0), giving K-State its only point on Saturday. On Sunday she beat Texas' Kelly Baritot (1-6, 4-3, 1-0).

"She is becoming more and more solid as the season goes on," Bietau said. "We knew she had some weapons, but it was just a matter of her getting tougher mentally and physically."

Da Valle has grown up as a tennis player, Bietau said.

"Her maturity level has gotten a lot better," Bietau said. "She is becoming easier to coach, as well."

The highlight of doubles play was Simosa and freshman Katerina Kudlackova defeating the Longhorn duo of Kelly Baritot and Kendra Strohm, 8-7.

"They put together a more complete performance than they have in the past," Bietau said.

"The more she played the worse she moved," Bietau said.

Kvaratskhelia is known for her movement on the court, Bietau said.

"The ability to run is the cornerstone of her game," he said. "So it was hard for her to get going."

Senior Jessica Simosa makes an overhand return against Missouri earlier this season. K-State lost both matches this weekend, against Texas A&M and Texas.

FBC | Spring football game to air on 8 stations

The 2006 K-State Purple and White Spring Football Game, scheduled for Saturday, can be heard live on eight radio stations across the state of Kansas and in the Kansas City Metro area, the K-State Sports Network announced Monday.

Prince

A special Purple-White pregame show will get kick off the broadcast at 5:30 p.m. Game time is 6 p.m.

K-State Sports Network officials also announced that head football coach Ron Prince would be taking part in the broadcast as a color analyst during the first half.

WGLF | 4 named to Academic Big 12 1st Team

Four K-State women's golfers were named to the Academic Big 12 First Team as announced by the Big 12 Conference on Monday. Juniors Katy Heffel and Helene Robert and sophomores Hailey Mireles and Kali Quick were all honored on the list of 41 student-athletes. Only Nebraska and Oklahoma had more nominees named to the first team.

RUN | Cheruiyot, Jeptoo give Kenyans sweep

Cheruiyot

It was an outstanding day for the Americans, too.

U.S. runners Meb Keflezighi, Brian Sell and Alan Culpepper came in third, fourth and fifth, 23 years after the last American winner, Greg Meyer.

But Cheruiyot pulled away for the best showing in Boston. His time of 2 hours, 7 minutes, 14 seconds was a second better than the winning time fellow Kenyan Cosmas Ndeti in 1994.

MLB | Pujols homers in 4th consecutive at-bat

Albert Pujols tied a major league record by homering in four consecutive at-bats when he connected in his first time up Monday night.

The St. Louis Cardinals first baseman hit his ninth home run of the season off Pirates starter Paul Maholm to straight-away center field with So Taguchi on first base to give the Cardinals a 2-0 lead in the top of the first.

Pujols hit three home runs Sunday, including a game-winning two-run shot to beat the Cincinnati Reds, 8-7.

BKC | Gay, Thomas announce going pro

Connecticut forward Rudy Gay said Monday he will forgo his final two years of eligibility and enter the NBA draft.

Gay

The 6-foot-9 Gay averaged a team-best 15.2 points a game this past season, and is projected to be a lottery pick.

LSU freshman Tyrus Thomas announced at a news conference Monday that he will enter the NBA draft and sign with an agent.

Thomas has been informed by NBA officials that he is projected as a top-five pick in the upcoming draft, ESPN Radio's Doug Gottlieb reports.

$summer $avings

Whether selling stuff online or cutting back on gasoline, there are several easy ways to earn extra cash this summer

Easy money.

Like any college student, I am always looking for ways to earn quick cash. Here are some things I have done this past year to keep my bank account full.

ANNETTE LAWLESS

With these tips, perhaps you, too, can learn how to properly budget and avoid surviving on ramen noodles alone. Not only are some of these suggestions good for your pocketbook, but some of these tips are also healthy alternatives for your lifestyle. This summer, think about your savings and opt into cost-friendly alternatives to your lifestyle.

1. SELL STUFF YOU DON'T USE

If you're a packrat like I am, there are probably hundreds of things sitting around your apartment you could deal without. And with the semester coming to a close, this is a great time for students to sell used textbooks. For those who typically sell books back to local vendors, you might want to consider selling books online. To get the most cash online, try selling your textbooks around July or August, as loads of students vie for your books before school begins.

Old clothing, appliances, compact discs and movies are a few items around the house to sell. Rule of thumb: if you haven't used it in the past three months, it's time to get rid of it. This will allow you to upgrade furniture and clothing, keeping you in style.

Some new college-based auction sites like www.uflipit.com allow students to sell items for free.

If the average student spends $300 on five textbooks, and if the student sells two of those books online for $50 each, that alone can save the student $100.

What you spent: $300 on five textbooks
What you save: More than $100, selling two textbooks online

2. GET FREE INTERNET

For the next four months, the average household will spend more than $100 on high-speed Internet alone. I question the necessity of the Internet in the average student's life. Students should consider removing the Internet in their households and using free local Internet services. On campus, for example, there are several access points available. In other cities, I recommend checking out a local library or coffee shop for a free Internet connection.

This will allow students not only to save $100 of their budgets, it also will help students manage their time, considering how distracting the Internet may be.

What you spent: $30 a month, totaling about $120 for four months
What you save: $120

3. CUT THE ALCOHOL IN HALF

Herds of K-State students go down to Aggieville every weekend. While going out all the time might seem like fun, I am sure a good chunk of their money could be saved by some booze budgeting.

The average college student spends nearly $300 a month on discretionary items – expenses that include restaurant and entertainment expenses – according a recent Harris Interactive Poll. Most of these items are alcoholic beverages.

The average student spends $20 a week on takeout food and drinking at the bars. While this might be the highlight of many students' social calendars, there are several inexpensive alternatives to a night on the town. You could stay at home with your friends and watch a movie or have a small party, even with alcohol included. Note that purchasing liquor at a bar is likely to be more expensive compared with purchasing the item at the store.

As long as you factor what you need into your budget and, consider to, at least, cut that budget in half, you are likely to be surprised with the results.

What you spent: $20 a week, averaging $320 for four months
What you save: $160 for four months

4. DONATE PLASMA

A simple way to earn money with little time and effort is a plasma donation. When people donate plasma, a needle is placed in the vein and the blood is pumped into a device that separates the plasma and blood components, according to the American Red Cross Web site, www.redcross.org. Plasma is useful for scientific research, and groups like ZLB Plasma Services in Manhattan offer money for plasma donations.

ZLB Plasma Services, 1130 Garden Way, pays $40 for a person's first two plasma donations. Thereafter, donors can earn $20 to $30 for a single donation. Compensation varies, depending on how much one can donate. A single donation can take up to an hour, especially for first-time donors.

All plasma donors through ZLB Plasma Services must be 18 years old, weigh at least 110 pounds, be in good health and meet proper identification and residency requirements, according to its Web site.

What you spent: Nothing
What you earn: $40 for the first two donations, with one donation per month, totals to $100 for four months

5. WALK, DON'T DRIVE

With gas prices on the rise, drivers should plant to spend more this summer.

Recent reports from the Department of Energy state Americans can expect to pay about 25 cents more per gallon this summer, as Kansas gas prices will increase to more than $3 per gallon. And if students expect to save cash during the summer, they should factor in the gasoline expenses.

Shell Group reports that the average person drives 2,000 in-city miles in a four-month time frame, spending at least $250. Limit your in-city car use, and consider opting into alternatives like a bicycle. Riding a bicycle is a healthy alternative for you and the environment.

By cutting your in-city miles in half, you could save at least $125. For those who aren't willing to trade in their four-wheeled vehicles for two-wheeled vehicles, Shell Group recommends regular car maintenance. This way, people can maximize vehicle performance, which will save them cash in the end. For additional tips gas-saving tips, go to www.shellstations.com.

What you spent: $70 on gas per month, averaging $280 for four months
What you save: $140 for four months

Cruise, `Da Vinci' set to kick off summer

Last year's first big May releases: The historical snoozer "Kingdom of Heaven" and the forgettable comedies "Kicking and Screaming" and "Monster-in-Law."

This year's summer lead-ins: "Mission: Impossible III," pitting Tom Cruise against supervillain Philip Seymour Hoffman; "Poseidon," a remake of "The Poseidon Adventure" directed by Hollywood's king of the sea, Wolfgang Petersen ("The Perfect Storm"); the animated "Over the Hedge," an animals-against-humans comedy from the makers of "Shrek"; and "The Da Vinci Code," reuniting Tom Hanks with director Ron Howard.

Many Kansas minorities not included in reported test scores

By Roxana Hegeman
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA – The mission statement posted on the Web site of Metro-Boulevard Alternative High School touts its commitment to the federal No Child Left Behind Act, which was designed to make sure children of all races got a good education by monitoring their academic progress.

It states: "To 'leave no child behind' we will create an alternative environment where all students have the opportunity to learn."

But an Associated Press analysis of test scores reported under No Child Left Behind shows Metro-Boulevard school considers none of its students' test scores by racial subgroups.

Neither do four other alternative or special schools in the city: Metro-Midtown Alternative High School, Metro-Meridian Alternative High School, Alcott Academy and Morris W. Levy Special Education Center.

In Kansas, those schools are exempt under a loophole that excludes the scores of racial subgroups if each race's enrollment number falls to less than 30 students. Two years ago, the state raised the cutoff for students with disabilities to 40. The state is now analyzing data to see whether to raise the cutoff for all students to 40, said Alexa Posny, former deputy commissioner for the state's division of learning services.

Educators contend not including those scores would give a more statistically sound picture of how individual schools are performing, but excluding so many minority students may undermine the basic premise of the 2001 No Child Left Behind Act: to hold schools accountable by ensuring that all children, regardless of their race, were actually learning.

The mechanism to do that was testing their progress by subgroups as whites, blacks, Asians, Hispanics and American Indians.

The exclusions are particularly acute in rural Kansas because smaller schools typically have fewer minorities.

"I don't really think that Kansas is purposefully trying to exclude students nearly as much as trying ... to make accurate and true classifications. In any statistical method the larger the group of students, the more reliable the statistics," said Steve Batt, director of research and assessment at USD 259.

Kansas is closing the gap among academic proficiency levels of its racial groups, Posny said. The gap between reading proficiency levels, for example, between black and white eighth graders has narrowed from 32 percent in 1999 to 20 percent last year.

Last year about 81 percent of white eighth graders in Kansas were proficient in reading, compared to about 61 percent of black students, she said.

In 1999, the reading gap between the races showed nearly 73 percent of white eighth graders were proficient in reading, compared to 40.5 percent of blacks.

Students must be tested annually in grades three through eight and at least once in high school, usually in 10th grade. This is the first school year that students in all those grades must be tested, though schools have been reporting scores by race for the tests they have been administering since the law passed.

To calculate a nationwide estimate, The Associated Press analyzed the 2003-04 enrollment figures the government collected for those grades – the latest on record – and applied the current racial category exemptions the states used.

Overall, AP found that about 1.9 million students – or about one in every 14 test scores – aren't being counted under the law's racial categories.

Minorities were seven times as likely to have their scores excluded as whites, the analysis showed.

Less than 2 percent of white children's scores are not being counted as a separate category. In contrast, Hispanics and blacks have roughly 10 percent of their scores excluded. More than one-third of Asian scores and nearly half of American Indian scores aren't broken out, AP found.

2 Duke players receive sealed indictments

By Tim Whitmire
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DURHAM, N.C. – A grand jury issued sealed indictments Monday against two members of the Duke University lacrosse team in connection with allegations that a stripper was raped last month at a team party, a source close to the case told The Associated Press.

The source, speaking on condition of anonymity because the grand jury proceedings are secret, said he did not know which players were indicted or what charges they faced.

The grand jury adjourned around 2 p.m. Monday, handing up indictments a short time later to Superior Court Judge Ronald Stephens. A filing at the courthouse said the judge had sealed at least one indictment, citing a state law that allows an indictment to be "kept secret until the defendant is arrested or appears before the court."

A 27-year-old black woman told police she was attacked March 13 by three white men in a bathroom at a party held by the lacrosse team.

The racially charged allegations have led to near daily protest rallies. The school canceled the highly ranked team's season and accepted the resignation of coach Mike Pressler after the release of a vulgar and graphic e-mail that was sent by a team member shortly after the alleged assault.

Defense attorneys have urged District Attorney Mike Nifong to drop the case, saying DNA tests failed to connect any of the 46 team members tested to the alleged victim.

Nifong has said 75 percent to 80 percent of rape prosecutions lack DNA evidence. According to court records, a medical examination of the woman found injuries consistent with rape.

Defense lawyers and members of the district attorney's office had numerous conferences in the hallways of the courthouse Monday morning. At several points during the day, Nifong declined to comment when asked about the case.

At Duke, the university's chief spokesman said the school knew little about what had taken place in court.

"We are aware that the district attorney made a presentation to the grand jury today, but we have no knowledge about the contents of his presentation," said John F. Burness, senior vice president for public affairs and government relations.

appropriate for that week's game.

"With (the game being on) TV last week, we decided to put the KSU letters in the outfield," Martin said.

Although Martin insists his job isn't work, it might be easier next season when the infield grass and dirt are replaced with field turf.

Field turf is necessary for several reasons, said Charlie Thomas, assistant athletic director for facilities operations.

"With grass the infield gets beaten up a lot more," Thomas said. "Turf gives a more consistent surface."

Jim Muller, manager of facility operations for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, said upkeep of grass is difficult and field turf will need less maintenance.

Martin said the turf will cover the infield and the warning track. He also said other universities use the turf, and that it should not affect a player's ability to slide.

Additionally, a turf infield will allow the baseball team to practice outside more often than it could with a grass infield, Muller said.

Muller said the turf will be similar to that of Wagner Field. It consists of a monofilament fiber that is rooted in a mixture of sand and rubber. The only real upkeep required will be brushing the field periodically to reduce static electricity and ensure an even distribution of sand and rubber.

The new routine will be second nature for Martin and his crew as they already are responsible for the grooming of the football field.

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Martin said he is excited about having a turf infield.

"Being in the Big 12, competing against teams from the south that are able to get on their fields in December and January, (K-State) really needed a surface to provide (the players) with a consistent play," Martin said. "Putting in field turf will allow the baseball team to be outdoors in January and February and will give them a better chance of competing with the southern schools."

Bush staff plans revamp

By Nedra Pickler
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. – President Bush's new chief of staff, Joshua Bolten, said Monday it was time to "refresh and re-energize the team," and he told senior White House aides who might be thinking about quitting this year to go ahead and leave now.

Taking charge in a time of crisis, with Bush's poll ratings at their lowest point ever and Republicans anxious about the November elections, Bolten laid down his pointed directive at his first meeting with top presidential aides.

He did not ask for anyone's resignation, and none of the senior aides stepped forward to say they would go, White House press secretary Scott McClellan reported later. But Bolten has Bush's full authority to make changes to the president's staff, and McClellan said he would expect announcements soon.

One of the first jobs to be filled is that of budget director – the position that Bolten left to become chief of staff. The job of domestic policy adviser at the White House is open as well. Further changes are clearly on the horizon, and Bolten gave top aides the option of leaving first.

"He wanted to make sure he had the team in place that is going to be here for a minimum of the remainder of the year," McClellan said. "And he said if people are thinking about leaving, that now is the time to come to such a decision."

Bolten told the staff that he was assuming his new job at a challenging time when the United States was engaged in a war on terrorism. With U.S. casualties rising in Iraq, Bush faces sagging public support, Republican angst about the midterm election and struggles with a Congress that has been resistant to some of his top priorities.

"Josh talked about how this is a time to refresh and re-energize the team and for all of us to renew our commitment as we go forward," McClellan said. Republicans outside the White House say they expect changes in Bush's lobbying staff and perhaps in the communications office, as well as in the Cabinet.

McClellan said Bolten's invitation was specifically for the White House staff, but that the president will "be looking to Josh for his advice and counsel" when it comes to possible changes in the broader administration. To quell speculation about Donald Rumsfeld, Bush issued a strong statement of support for the embattled Pentagon chief last Friday.

On Monday, Bolten was on hand as Bush toured Europa Stone Distributors in Sterling, Va., to promote his tax plans with another Cabinet member who is the focus of shake-up rumors – Treasury Secretary John Snow. Bush did not say anything publicly about Snow's future, but waved the secretary to his side during the photo op so they would be in pictures together.

Bolten has had closed door meetings with some top presidential advisers and plans more, McClellan said.

storm water will be adequately addressed," he said.

Morris-Hardeman said the addition cannot be developed in a residential area, and the area could be a good choice for the addition.

"It's a very positive thing for use, as far as location," Morris-Hardeman said.

Another item on the city commission agenda is a resolution authorizing the negotiation for the sale of special obligation bonds for the Downtown Redevelopment Project.

City Commissioner Mark Hatesohl said the item was just another step to take for the project to be completed.

In other business, the commission will:

- Hear the first reading of an ordinance rezoning the proposed Kimball townhouse addition
- Resolve setting the date for a public hearing establishing a Transportation Development District.

course is an excellent opportunity for students to come together," she said. "And we think the experience of the challenge course would be excellent, especially for the new students in the community."

Lehning said she thought the University Experience and the Introduction to Leadership classes would benefit from using the course.

"This could help generate more idea sharing and more learning in these classes," she said.

Lehning said the additional money allocated by the committee will help keep the course affordable.

"(The extra money) was a great surprise," she said. "We are hoping to use that to help create a workable fee structure so students will receive a discounted or free use of the course. Ultimately we want it to be affordable for everyone."

Lehning said they will consider cutting costs for students before considering cutting costs for non-student groups.

"This is student money that initiated the course and we want students to have a reduced cost," she said.

Molly Hamm, sophomore in English and bond surplus fund committee member, said the committee granted the course funding because they felt it would be a great addition to services available to students.

"A lot of students can use this for team building activities and currently people have to go to Rock Springs (Kan.) for this type of course," Hamm, said. "This way, we will have a course on campus that will be easily accessible for students and will be able to attract outside people for additional revenue."

Vice president commends Fort Riley's advances at rally

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The war on terror is a worthy cause, and troops stationed at Fort Riley help the United States fight for that cause, Vice President Dick Cheney said at a rally at Fort Riley on Tuesday.

The event marked the first visit to Fort Riley by a member of the executive branch since Franklin Roosevelt in 1943.

The rally, which was restricted to soldiers, their spouses and children over 12, Fort Riley civilian employees and special guests, took place on the Cavalry Parade Field.

At around 2:15 p.m., a cannon fired the customary 19 times to indicate the vice president had entered the military base, and, after initial remarks by 24th Infantry Division and Fort Riley commander Maj. Gen. Dennis Hardy, Cheney took the podium.

The vice president's 15-minute speech focused heavily upon Fort Riley's missions abroad and follows the return of the 1st Armored Divisions 3rd Brigade from Iraq, which was completed in January.

"Fort Riley is on the leading edge of the military transformation," he said. "You know how to take the fight to the enemy and get the job done right."

The vice president addressed many of the units present individually, much to the great pleasure of the units' members, who voiced their enthusiasm with the Army's signature "hoowa" when their unit was mentioned.

After the recognitions, the vice president touched on a variety of issues, such as the transformations produced

Leaders mull smoking ban

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan businesses might be faced with new regulations on smoking in public.

Manhattan City Commissioner Mark Hatesohl said there will be a city commission work session on May 9 where commissioners will meet to draft a possible ordinance.

"We will hopefully come up with an ordinance that is enforceable," he said. "It will show up on the August primary."

Hatesohl said the soonest an ordinance could take place is late fall or early next year.

City Commissioner Jayme Morris-Hardeman said she is in favor of an all-out ban of smoking in Manhattan businesses.

"I would like to pass an ordinance that bans smoking in all businesses," she said.

Morris-Hardeman said she sees health as the base for her feelings about a smoking ban. The people who work at businesses, such as restaurants or bars, that allow smoking are unfairly subjected to the smoking, she said.

Morris-Hardeman said through her background and experiences with Court Appointed Special Advocates, she has realized that parents and teenagers don't always have a choice of where they work. She said many people are unfairly subjected to the dangers of smoking.

Hatesohl also said he would like businesses to ban smoking.

"I like the idea of there being less smoke in public places," Hatesohl said.

He said he would prefer to see the businesses voluntarily change smoking policies rather than the government enforcing it.

"I don't like the idea of the government hammering it in and telling people how to run their businesses," he said.

If Manhattan residents want businesses to be smoke-free, Hatesohl said he wants the residents to encourage businesses and policies to change.

Justin Stach, cook at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant and Saloon, said he is opposed to an ordinance that would outlaw smoking in businesses.

"It depends on how far from the businesses the ban would be," Stach said.

If people could still smoke on the patio, the ban might not be as bad, he said.

Stach said he thinks businesses will lose customers if the ban goes into effect.

"People won't go out as much," he said. "They'll start going to more house parties instead."

Stach said he thinks it should be up to the businesses to choose to become non-smoking or have non-smoking sections.

Morris-Hardeman said she hasn't heard any well-founded

2 mumps cases feared at K-State

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two K-State students might have the mumps, a Manhattan health official said Tuesday.

Kathy Dickey-Wilson, clinic supervisor for the Riley County Health Department, said there are four potential cases in Manhattan, but one from Geary County came to Manhattan for medical attention. She said the cases will not be confirmed until the end of the week and warned against misinterpreting reports of mumps cases that have not been confirmed.

"Unless we have blood or urine, or a swabbing to confirm it, it's still suspect," Dickey-Wilson said.

She said the disease's symptoms include fever, sore throat and swelling from the tips of the ears to the tip of the jaw and can lead to meningitis and encephalitis in rare cases.

Vaccination against measles, mumps and rubella – the MMR – is required for students to enter kindergarten in Kansas. Dickey-Wilson said the vaccine is expected to be effective in 85 to 90 percent of inoculated persons.

Construction widens K-18 exit

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Construction to improve the entrance of the Union Pacific Railroad Depot will be completed later this week.

The construction has reduced traffic sections of both Kansas Highways 18, near the depot, and 177 to one lane.

The construction started Tuesday of last week, and by Friday, Rob Ott, city engineer, said the project was completed halfway.

Ott said, weather permitting, he thinks the construction will be completed later this week.

Ott also said one of the concerns with the exit off K-18 is the narrow turning radius of about two feet. Ott said the radius will be increased to about 35 feet.

"Basically, what we're doing is improving the turning radius," he said.

Ott said things were going well with the construction the last time he checked.

Terry DeWeese, director of Parks and Recreation Services, said the depot will be more accessible after construction is complete.

"They are making it wider to make it easier to turn in and turn out," DeWeese said. "It used to be a straight shot. Now it will be easier going and coming."

Teens plead not guilty

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Two Platte City teenagers charged with threatening to conduct an armed attack on their high school to mark the seventh anniversary of the Columbine High School killings made their first appearance in court Tuesday. An associate circuit court judge entered not guilty pleas for Trevor P. Fattig and Sean M. Amos, both 17. Each is charged with a felony count of making a terroristic threat and are being held on $15,000 bond.

2 Duke players arrested

DURHAM, N.C. — Two Duke University lacrosse players were arrested on rape charges Tuesday in a scandal that has rocked one of America's elite campuses and raised explosive questions of race, class and the privileged status of college athletes. The two players were promptly booked and released on bail. District Attorney Mike Nifong said a third player could also be arrested.

Rumsfeld won't resign

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Vowing not to bow to calls for his ouster from several retired generals, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Tuesday their grievances are a natural fallout from his push for dramatic changes in the military. He also discounted any suggestion that the generals' complaints reflect widespread dissent in the officer corps.

Unpaid tickets lead to fees

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Parking tickets are similar to library fines, Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said.

"If you don't pay in two weeks, there will be a late fee," Abbott said. "If you owe money, you can't do certain things like get your grades, sign up for classes or get your transcripts."

Abbott said the number of unpaid tickets is unknown, because it continually fluctuates. Parking Services periodically will go through and look at what is and isn't paid, but the number is never certain, he said.

Abbott, said the rules and regulations of Parking Services are established to ensure no student gets an enormous number of parking tickets.

"If you get five tickets, or three late ones, you are considered an excessive violator," Abbott said. "We don't want them to have $500 in tickets; we just want them to park properly."

Once a student becomes an excessive violator, Abbott said his vehicle can be wheel-locked, at which point he must pay a fine to have it removed.

"I've never had any parking tickets because I don't mind walking," Matthew Martinez, junior in biology, said. "I just park where nobody else parks and know the times when people leave. It's not that hard to walk a little further."

Martinez said he believes Parking Services does a fair job at regulating but can be a little tough on the number and kinds of tickets it hands out.

Other students' opinions are a little different.

Annie Hirt, freshman in early childhood education, said she has received six or seven tickets. She has received most of them for parking in the wrong lot for a few minutes while running to her room to get something.

"I try to pay tickets right away, because otherwise, I'll just forget about it," Hirt said. "I think they get a little ticket-happy though. Maybe once a person gets one, they like coming back and giving more and more until they pay it off."

Abbott said he is used to criticism of Parking Services but said sometimes it is out of his control.

"It's an enforced situation," Abbott said. "The Council on Parking Operations makes these determinations. We simply have to let them know not to park in certain places, but in the end, it's their decision."

Abbott said he believes it is not a problem of students not understanding the rules but choosing not to follow them.

"I believe we do a good job of getting the data out," Abbott said. "It's just owing a little money; it's better than arresting and hauling them off to jail."

Copper wire stolen from tunnel

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Someone got wired at K-State's expense.

Sgt. Don Stubbings of the K-State Police said the department is investigating several thefts of copper wire in quantities worth thousands of dollars. He said the copper likely is being taken to recycling centers and traded as scrap for money.

Stubbings said a piece of copper wire more than 1,000 feet long was removed from an underground tunnel in the past few weeks. Its value was $2,387, he said.

Someone also stole several hundred dollars worth of copper wire from the university that was in storage and marked for reuse.

Howard Wilson, owner of Howie's Recycling, 625 S. 10th St., said his company is buying used copper for between $1.10 and $1.60 per pound, depending on how clean it is. He said he wouldn't buy copper he believed to be stolen, but there is only so much he can do.

"I don't have any way to know if it's been stolen," Wilson said.

The longer piece of wire ran between Anderson Hall and the Power Plant on campus, said Dale Boggs, associate director of facility building maintenance. He said the part taken ran from Hale Library to within Anderson.

Boggs said the braided copper wire, about one-half inch thick, used to be part of a telephone system but had been effectively abandoned inside the underground tunnels. He said whoever stole the wire would have had to go inside the tunnels, which is illegal in itself.

Stubbings said there have been other notable instances of theft at K-State this semester, and he expects them to be more common as the semester ends. He said students are less concerned with keeping track of their things due to the approach of final exams and project deadlines.

"Thieves know that," Stubbings said, and they exploit it.

He said he often sees increases in reports of theft in the final weeks of a semester.

One common target, Stubbings said, is portable digital music players, especially iPods. He said there have been eight iPods reported stolen this semester.

Stubbings said other targets include laptop computers, which students often leave out while studying in groups, and other electronics. He said an LCD projector worth more than $2,000 was stolen from an office in Ackert Hall recently.

"Students should be careful who they are buying used iPods or computers from," Stubbings said, adding that a student could be charged with possession of stolen property if he knew he could be buying purloined goods.

He said students should try to mark their books in a way that doesn't decrease the resale value.

Steve Levin, manager of the K-State Student Union Bookstore, said the best way to mark a book is to pick a certain page and circle the page number on it. He said this allows a person to identify a stolen book if recovered and not affect its buy-back price.

Also, Levin said, a thief can erase or mark over a name on the cover, but a marked page would go unnoticed unless someone knew exactly where to look.

New IDs increase student security

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many students going to the K-State Student Union Staterooms said they have been in and out quickly when picking up new identification cards.

"I walked in, and it took about 10 seconds," Nathaniel Edwards, freshman in mechanical engineering, said. "It didn't bother me at all, because I got to miss class."

Edwards said his old ID card was falling apart, and he was glad to have a new one with which to replace it.

Most students seem comfortable with the concept of picking up their new ID card, said Craig Johnson, assistant director of operations at the Union.

Johnson said new ID cards have not been issued in nine years, except the new cards given to incoming freshman and transfer students.

"The purpose of the new cards is to change the ID number on them," Johnson said. "Our ultimate goal is to stop the use of Social Security numbers as ID numbers. There has been recent legislation put in place so that Social Security numbers cannot be displayed on these cards, so that is a deadline we have been working toward."

"I waited in line for five seconds, and it took about two seconds once I got in," Deric Hook, senior in mechanical engineering, said. "It's better to have the extra security of not having your Social Security number on the card, and I like the extra precaution."

If students are not available to pick up their cards on the assigned day, they can come back next week.

Johnson said there are restrictions this week, as the staff expects a large number of students, but starting Monday, students can come to the ID center in the Union at any time.

Johnson said students who want to see the new features on the cards can visit the services section on the Union Web site at www.union.ksu.edu.

OPINION

TO THE POINT

Make opinions on smoking known to leaders

Manhattan businesses soon might join the non-smoking ranks of Lawrence and Salina. There is a possibility that area businesses could be forced to adopt a no-smoking policy or partial-smoking ban.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

The City Commissioners, however, share conflicting views on exactly what type of ban should be enforced. On May 9, the commissioners will meet to discuss Manhattan's options.

One commissioner, Mark Hatesohl, said he wants the Manhattan community to be involved in the decision of what type of ban, if any, should be implemented.

It should be the businesses' and residents' decision about whether smoking should be allowed in places owned and frequented, he said.

Therefore, it is time to speak out. If you want to be able to light up in publicly owned places or are sick of unwillingly smelling smoke while you're out, this is your opportunity to put your rear in gear.

Attend the City Commission meeting on May 9, and voice your opinion, call City Hall at (785) 587-2404 or visit the commissioners' Web site at www.ci.manhattan.ks.us. The people of Manhattan should be involved in this decision. Even contacting a business and letting them know your opinion is a step in the right direction.

Invisible children

Uganda's unseen youth suffering from neglect

When a wondrous Clay Aiken sang "If I was Invisible ...", critics pondered what life would be like "If Clay could sing ..."

Still, in our most fantasying moments, we all ponder the invisibility hypothetical. We need not look far for conjectural consequences – from "The Invisible Man" to "The Lord of the Rings," invisibility often comes with a degree of madness.

KODY COOPER

The documentary film "Invisible Children" about the youth of Uganda portrays an invisibility-madness complex that is not mere fantasy.

The children of Uganda aren't invisible because of any magic cloak or ring, but because their suffering is ignored by those who have the power to help.

And that very negligence on our part compounds the madness.

Landlocked in Eastern Africa south of Sudan and west of Kenya, Uganda has been torn by civil war for many years. Today, the north is afflicted by a guerrilla insurgency led by the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA).

The murderous brutality of these cultish rebels has earned them the State Department's distinguished title of "terrorist organization." The rebels are infamous for random rampages of murder and rape, leaving the population indignant and weary.

With their ranks dwindling, the LRA has taken to a new recruitment method to sustain its faculties: Abducting children.

The LRA literally snatches up kids as they sleep – 20,000 to 50,000 have been abducted to fight as soldiers. Little Ugandans between 5 and 14 years old are the primary targets.

They are old enough to fire an AK-47, yet young enough to be kidnapped, tortured, brainwashed and forced to fight.

Child-like innocence is replaced by brainwashed bloodthirstiness as the rebels indoctrinate children to become ruthless killers. If the kids resist soldiership, they are shot.

"Sleeping tight" is a dream for Ugandan children. The fear of abduction is so acute that little Ugandans nightly commute en masse exodus from their villages to the towns in search of somewhere safe to sleep.

These "night commuters" walk every night for miles seeking refuge. They arrive in hordes to sleep on filthy dirt and concrete floors underneath the verandas of hospitals and the edifices of bus parks.

An entangled mass of legs, arms and ragged blankets, these "mass beds" are more analogous to "mass graves."

Little boys and girls who should be playing soccer and dress-up are becoming child soldiers and sex slaves. "Fear" cannot even begin to describe the psychological state in which they live.

Can we tolerate this gross injustice?

You and I may or may not share similar religious or political viewpoints. That is irrelevant. No one disputes that human beings are called to take care of one another. For all of our ignoble bickering, we should reassess ourselves.

Whereas kids in Uganda wake up fearing violent death, we wake up in the United States fearing only that we have forgotten the name of the person we just slept with.

What can be done then?

First, watch "Invisible Children." Next, visit www.invisiblechildren.com. If your heart is broken for these kids, then join the Global Night Commute on April 29.

Like the youth of Northern Uganda, thousands of young Americans will converge on their cities the night of April 29 to sleep. Dozens of K-Staters will be spending the night on the lawn of Topeka's Capitol Building.

Come; help end the madness. Tell the world that the helpless little ones of Uganda aren't invisible.

Groups of people should not be stereotyped

Maybe it is time for me to put my foot in my mouth and admit that I was wrong about something.

KELSEY CHILDRESS

I know many people think I am wrong about a lot of things, but this is one of the few things about which I am not willing to argue. I'll simply accept defeat and hope all the bad things that were said can be forgiven.

There are a lot of things in this world about which people can complain, but usually, one has no right to complain unless they try to change what bothers them.

Disrespecting a certain group of people, or more accurately, stereotyping groups of people into a certain mold, is no way to live a fulfilling life.

There will always be certain social groups or cliques that people file others into, no matter their personality or solidarity of character.

During my freshman year, my car was hit in the K-State Student Union parking lot by a boy who claimed he had to leave for a 'meeting.' He then lied to his parents, his insurance agent and the police about what really happened and blamed the car wreck on me.

My car was totaled; his was barely scratched, but he got away with nothing. Through some coincidences, I learned he was in a fraternity.

Since then, I had a thing against frat boys.

It wasn't just the car wreck, but the parties where (I thought) they objectified women and in class where they acted arrogant. Overall I believed they cared little about school, only coming to college for the drinking.

Luckily, I was proven wrong by a certain man about five months ago, who is now my boyfriend. He showed me how incorrect I was, and ever since, I have realized I need to reassess my bias about those in the greek community.

This year I have met and befriended many of my peers who have taught me so much about how I had misjudged their character.

The men I have met since November have shattered what I thought about fraternities. They are intelligent, funny, nice and they take care of one another.

Sure, they have the occasional drama, but doesn't every group of friends?

From these friends, I have learned to let go of any stereotype or pre-conceived notion I ever had. These guys do not drop date-rape drugs in girls' drinks, they go to class, and most of all, they are some of the nicest guys I have ever met.

In a world where people are sometimes taught to discriminate and place bias based on personal choice or looks, it is good to know there will always be individuals that break the mold and show themselves to be wonderful and amazing people.

Why do athletes walk so freaking slow?

Is it because they think they're cool? Or because they're so sick of being so fast all the time?

Want to speak Spanish? Spell socks out loud in an accent and you'll get: Es O Si Que Es! Don't you feel cool now?

So there's a really hot Dell guy that came over to fix my roommate's computer. And I think we should marry him — since we stared at him the whole time.

What kind of person takes the time to send 35 comments to the Fourum, then complains about it? Oh, yeah, that was me and the other three coolest people alive.

My friend can resist alcohol but not Sudoku. That's powerful stuff.

Remember: "i" before "e", except after "c", and when sounded like "a" as in "neighbor" or "weigh," and on weekends and holidays, and all throughout May, and you'll always be wrong no matter what you say.

Collegian coverage of diversity events prepares students to enter changing world

Editor,

I want to thank the Collegian staff and your faculty adviser Kim Baltrip for an outstanding year of coverage of diversity, multicultural and international events at K-State.

When I saw the great article Monday about the Sri Lankan Student Association featured on the front page, I knew that I had to write to thank you on behalf of all of us who had been asking the Collegian in past years for better reporting about the diversity that does exist here at K-State.

This excellent coverage of our diversity helps all students who will be going out into a rapidly changing and more globally competitive world.

I am a K-State alumnae from 1978, and I don't think I have ever seen better news and feature reporting in the Collegian than this past year.

So congratulations to all of you for your very hard work. And here's to hoping this continues for the next academic years.

Gospel of Judas falls short of requirements; fake work cannot be used to rewrite history

Editor,

This is in response to Kelsey Childress' misleading, un-informed article that appeared in the Collegian April 12.

The Gospel of Judas is not a gospel and was not written by Judas. It comes from the Gnostics, a sect of heretics with many strange beliefs. It was rejected from the New Testament because it met zero of the criteria required of books that were accepted, including a known author, circulation among the churches and alignment with known apostolic teaching. This is why the other "lost" gospels cited weren't included either.

Let me give a parallel of what the Gospel of Judas amounts. It's more than 200 years later, but let's say I decide to write a book pretending to be Benedict Arnold. I write it, and inside of it, I disclose that George Washington had conspired with me to betray him. I then bury this book I just wrote, and it is discovered 1,800 years later.

In this future where the book is discovered, the story of Arnold's betrayal of Washington is well-known and well-documented. Upon discovering my "gospel," however, there are people like Kelsey that demand it be used to rewrite history. No matter that it was really written by me, 200 years after the incident, claiming to be Arnold. All that matters to her is that it is a really old writing, so it must be equal with all other really old writings. That would be "preposterous," though, just as it is to give authority to Judas' "gospel."

Support Empty Bowl sale to benefit hungry citizens

Editor,

My name is Kelly Maze, and I am a student here at K-State. I am coordinating the project Empty Bowls, a community and university collaboration, organized by the Women's Center and the Campaign for Nonviolence. Project Empty Bowls was started to help provide our local citizens, who often go to bed hungry, with warm meals. Empty Bowls is a nationwide project that is now established in our community.

With the generous help from the K-State Potters Guild, Manhattan High School ceramic students and citizens who participated in the Manhattan Arts Center's Bowl-a-Thon, there are beautiful, creative bowls available to buy this week at Mercado Gourmet Grocery, 1222 Moro St., in Aggieville and at the Women's Center Kiosk in the K-State Student Union.

This Thursday, April 20, bring your Empty Bowl to Texas Star Café, 606 N. 12th, and get your bowl filled with free soup from 5-8 p.m. One hundred percent of the profit goes to small, local kitchens that cook and serve free meals each week. These bowls are yours to keep as a reminder of the hunger in the world and in our own community.

Don't let this opportunity for you to be a helpful force in our community pass you by.

Women were surgeons general in '90s

Editor,

Megan Green's column on April 17 states that a woman surgeon general is one of the few feminine firsts yet to be achieved. Perhaps she should research Antonia Novello and Joycelyn Elders. The first was the United States surgeon general from March 9, 1990, to June 30, 1993, and the second was the United States surgeon general from September 8, 1993, to December 31, 1994. Are research methods still taught in mass communications? It would seem not.

Study finds zoo visitors spend little time viewing animals, even nearly extinct species

Editor,

Zoos tout their educational endeavors, but like the person who visits Sunset Zoological Park to "get out of the house," zoos are little more than easy distraction.

Dale Marcellini, a curator at the National Zoo in Washington, D.C., conducted a study of zoo visitors in which he and several colleagues watched, tracked and listened to more than 700 people over the course of a few summers.

His study concluded that zoos are little more than backdrops for people's other preoccupations. The visitors' conversations dealt not with the animals but with their own lives. When people did remark on an animal, the most common words Marcellini recorded were derogatory.

The study found that almost 60 percent of visitors' time was spent walking from place to place, almost 10 percent was spent eating, and other chunks of time went to resting, bathroom breaks and shopping.

People spent less than eight seconds per snake and one minute with the lions. Pere David's deer, expected to be extinct when the last captive deer dies, rated a mere 27 seconds.

It's not just visitors who are disinterested. Even a former director of the renowned Zoo Atlanta, for example, said of the animals, "They're the last thing I worry about with all the other problems."

Wildcat pitchers struggle against Shocker offense

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

WICHITA – K-State struggled from the mound Tuesday night against Wichita State, seemingly unable to find a groove throughout the ballgame.

Freshman Todd Vogel started the game for the Wildcats but lasted only two innings, throwing 36 pitches. He gave up four runs, three earned, to fall to 1-1 on the season.

Vogel exited the game in the bottom of the third after WSU second baseman Damon Sublett scored off a hit from Hill to give the Shockers a 4-2 lead.

Senior relief pitcher B.J. Kissel pitched in the seventh inning, allowing only one hit. He said he felt good about Vogel's performance and is confident Vogel will learn from the experience and come out better next time.

"It's a tough thing for a young kid to do. I mean, this is a pretty intimidating place to come pitch," Kissel said. "Especially to start, after you've only started a couple times. But it's a good growing experience for him, and you know he's trying.

Coach Brad Hill said Vogel's youth and inexperience were an issue in Tuesday's game, but he thought it was a good learning opportunity.

"This kid's got to go out and learn to develop. He's a part of our future, and this is an opportunity for him to go out there and see what he can do," Hill said.

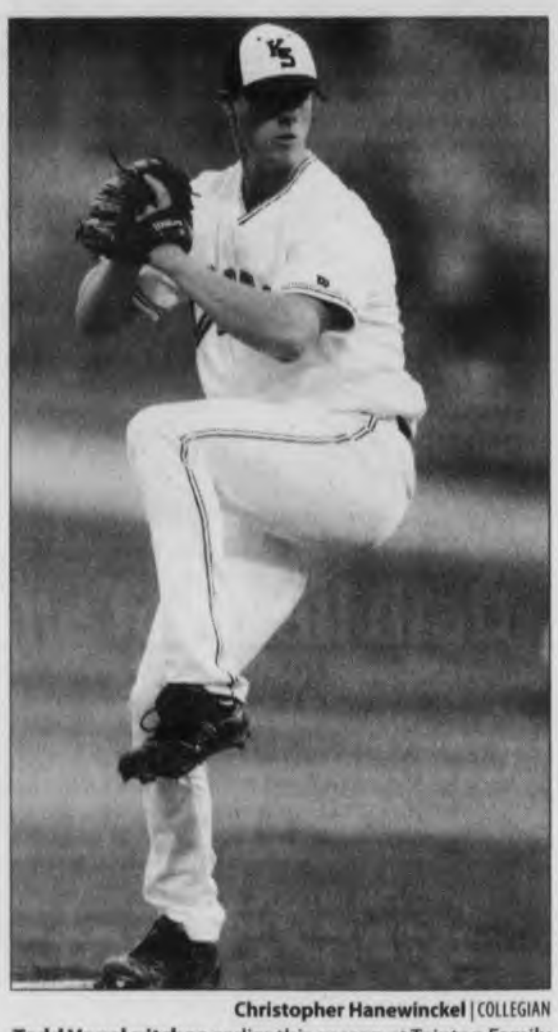
Junior relief pitcher Brett Ames took the mound in the third, and, with help from the Wildcat defense, produced three-straight outs in the fourth inning.

The Shocker batters took control once again in the fifth, however, with a triple from Hill, racking up another two runs to lead the Wildcats 5-2.

Freshman Trevor Hurley replaced Ames in the bottom of the sixth and threw a total of 16 pitches. The Shockers did not score any additional runs, but Hurley was replaced in the seventh inning by Kissel, who also pitched only one inning. Sophomore Daniel Edwards replaced Kissel in the eighth and closed out the game for the Wildcats.

Although the Shockers didn't post any runs after the sixth, the Wildcat pitchers never quite seemed to fall into a steady rhythm, but senior catcher Brandon Farr said that wasn't necessarily a big problem.

"We were trying to get some young guys some work, guys who hadn't been getting as many innings on the weekend," Farr said. "So that was the initial plan either way. So it worked out where a guy would struggle, but we had a guy ready to go."



Hill said the Wildcat pitchers were running low Tuesday after last weekend's series against Texas Tech.

"We're just coming off of a weekend where we had guys who needed to rest, otherwise we would have thrown some other guys out there," Hill said. "(Freshman Ben) Hornbeck pitched a lot, (freshman Justin) Murray pitched a lot this weekend, and those are guys that usually pitch in relief for us. But I think it's more important for them to rest for this weekend."

Hill said depending on how they respond, the younger Wildcat pitchers could take their struggles from Tuesday's game and make them a positive experience.

Kissel said the most important factor for relievers to remember in situations like Tuesday night's game is how they can keep the team in the game.

"The worst thing we can do is come in there and not throw strikes," Kissel said. "Basically, we want to come in and make sure the ball's put in play and try and give us a chance to come back in later innings. That's our job every time – to keep the ball in the strike zone, make them put the ball in play and let our defense work for us."

Bats fail K-State in 7-3 loss to WSU

By Cedrique Flemming
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

WICHITA – K-State was outhit, out-pitched and out-scored 7-3 by Wichita State on Tuesday night in front of a season-high crowd at Eck Stadium.

There were 5,657 fans in attendance to see K-State muster only four hits to Wichita State's 14.

Coach Brad Hill said Wichita State played solid baseball and was the better team Tuesday.

"They really swung the bats extremely well tonight," Hill said. "They could have had a lot more runs than 14.

"We never could string together any at-bats, and we just kept getting spread out, which cost us."

Tuesday night's game was K-State's fifth-straight road game, and the loss dropped the Wildcats to 23-10-1 on the season, while the Shocker win improved their record to 28-13.

Wichita State scored three runs on four hits in the second inning, and K-State answered with two runs of its own in the top of the third, with the help of two Shocker errors.

Wichita State answered in the bottom of the third with two more runs to take a 5-2 lead, which was all it needed, but the Shockers tacked on two insurance runs in the fifth.

K-State only could tally one more run, which came in the sixth inning, and was the last scored by either team.

Freshman pitcher Todd Vogel gave up four runs, three earned, on six hits in two innings of work and took the loss for the Wildcats, dropping him to 1-1 on the season.

Ames allowed four hits while surrendering three runs, two earned, in three innings.

Shocker pitcher Kris Johnson improved to 4-0 on the season after giving up only two runs, both in the second, and only two hits. He struck out four batters.

K-State senior relief pitcher B.J. Kissel pitched the seventh inning and allowed only one Shocker hit.

Kissel said it was good for the Wildcat hitters to see a pitcher of Johnson's caliber because Johnson is as solid as the pitchers the Wildcats face every weekend against Big 12 Conference opponents.

"Kris Johnson is an exceptional pitcher, and he really did a good job tonight," Kissel said. "It's good for our hitters to see a pitcher like that midweek, because a lot of times we don't see the top-quality pitching in midweek games, like we normally see in the Big 12.

"I think it helps to see an arm like Johnson's midweek to get us prepared to face the guys at KU."

Freshman Trevor Hurley and sophomore Daniel Edwards both pitched an inning of relief for K-State, giving up only three hits and striking out two batters.

Shocker sophomore Matt Brown went 4-for-4 with two runs scored to lead Wichita State, and sophomore Tyler Hill went 3-for-4 with two runs scored and two RBIs.

K-State junior Jared Goedert was the only Wildcat with at least two hits, going 2-for-4 on the evening.

Senior Barrett Rice, who is currently the leading hitter in the Big 12, went 0-for-3 with one RBI, snapping his 12-game hit streak. He hit safely in 26 of his last 28

ANTHONY MENDOZA

Spring football games are rarely exciting.

Sure, there might be the occasional big hit or a five-yard run up the middle, but for the most part, they are what they are. A glorified practice with spectators hoping to draw some conclusion of what the upcoming season has in store for them.

Thursday, the annual snoozer will get a shot in the arm. An injection of something new – banter between fans of who is the most valuable player K-State has on its team.

Unfortunately, the fans do not get a vote, but defensive coordinator Raheem Morris and offensive coordinator James Franklin do when they hold the first Spring Game draft, to be commissioned by coach Ron Prince on Thursday night.

I'm sure neither coach will take my advice when selecting players to fill out their roster, but I am going to give them my top-five picks, anyway.

1. BRANDON ARCHER, LINEBACKER

I know Prince said he has not watched any film of last year's team, but it hasn't taken him long to become enamored with the three-year letter winner and leading tackler for the Wildcats the last two seasons.

"At this point, Brandon Archer, how much more is he really going to show me?" Prince said after Saturday's practice. "I really want to know who's going to come in and be the next Brandon Archer for K-State."

Archer is the No. 1 choice because he is the best player on the best unit for K-State. If it wasn't for Marcus Watts' breakthrough season at safety last year, Archer could well be on his way to a third-straight year as defensive MVP.

This season, he might just have to settle for team MVP.

2. JORDY NELSON, WIDE RECEIVER

He might not be the slickest dresser off the field, but Nelson was the flashiest receiver K-State had last year. He led the Wildcats in receiving yards (669), receptions (45) and touchdowns (8). All this came on the heels of a position change, when he switched sides of the ball, moving from his secondary position at the end of the 2004 season.

3. THOMAS CLAYTON, RUNNING BACK

Sure, this might be a little high to take Clayton, but you really don't have a choice going into this game. All indications are Parrish Fisher will not be playing on Saturday and likely will be spotted on the sidelines on crutches. Then there is sixth-year medical red-shirt Carlos Alsup. His health is always a concern, and seeing him without pads on during Saturday's open-practice will force the hand of one of the coaches to take the best available player from the injury-plagued unit.

4. JUSTIN MCKINNEY, DEFENSIVE BACK

Looking past the linebackers during Saturday's practice, the other player who stood out was the second-year defensive back. He has a certain swagger to him that all defensive backs must possess in order to remain confident in a position where you are alone and exposed each play.

Athletically, there are not many that can touch McKinney on this year's roster. He is a physical corner; one that

TRK | Eveland named Big 12 Athlete of the Week

Eveland

K-State senior Breanna Eveland earned her third career Big 12 Athlete of the Week honor and first of the 2006 outdoor season, the Big 12 Conference announced on Tuesday afternoon.

She earned the citation by breaking her own North American-area, American, national collegiate and K-State records in the women's decathlon on April 13 and 14 at the Audrey Walton Combined Events Carnival with 7,064 points.

The product of Grand Rapids, Mich., registered one discipline win, in the pole vault, during the two-day event. The clearance of 14-01.25 set a new Walton Stadium record, registered 1,108 points and tied her K-State school record in the event.

GLF | Yonke, James earn Big 12 academic honors

Yonke

Senior Jonathan James and sophomore Kyle Yonke were among 26 individuals to be named to the Academic All-Big 12 Conference First Team, the conference office announced on Tuesday. It is the first time either golfer has been named to the all-league team.

BKC | Recruit Williams might change plans

Williams

St. Petersburg Community College forward Kenny Williams signed with K-State last fall when Jim Wooldridge was still head coach, and after Bob Huggins signed on in March, Williams expressed excitement about playing for Huggins. However, Williams' plans might have changed, Brian Gates, recruiting expert, reported Tuesday.

"I would say at this time Kenny is not going to be at Kansas State," St. Petersburg coach Ernest Crumbley said. "He is exploring what options are available to him now. He has some schools that he would be able to transfer to."

NFL | Chiefs add cornerback Chris Johnson

Johnson

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Chiefs signed free-agent cornerback Chris Johnson on Tuesday, as the team searches for a starter to play opposite Patrick Surtain.

Terms of the two-year deal were not announced.

Kansas City has been looking for help in the defensive backfield after releasing Eric Warfield and Dexter McCleon last month, when it looked like the Chiefs were going to be several million dollars over the salary cap. The NFL and its players' union eventually reached a new labor deal.

MLB | Bowden arrested, charged with DUI

A Miami Beach police report said the 44-year-old Bowden refused to take a breath-alcohol test after he was stopped at 2:22 a.m. Monday. He then failed field sobriety tests.

Ghostface album provides listener fix

"Fishscale"

★★★★★

Album review by Mark Sibilla

I'll admit it – I'm a user.

But I am picky; I like quality stuff: raw and uncut.

Unfortunately, I've been going through withdrawal for the past couple of months. Don't get me wrong, there haven't been any real droughts – there have been plenty of releases to tide me over until the next big shipment – but there hasn't been anything that could compare to the purest Peruvian white.

Leave it up to Ghostface Killah to come through and deliver the goods.

I had to go down to the docks for this one, but the trip was worth it. This is the stuff, man; a key of pure "Fishscale" (slang for high-quality cocaine).

The former Wu-Tang Clan member recently released "Fishscale," his fifth solo album, and he makes his case as, quite possibly, the best rapper in existence today.

In a career filled with excellent solo albums, Ghostface Killah one-ups himself and creates not only the best album of his career, but the best rap album to be released in quite some time.

At 35, Ghostface sounds hungrier and more ambitious than rappers who are 10 years younger. During the entirety of "Fishscale," Ghostface spews his rhymes with an amazing intensity and gives all that he has to every word and track.

His stories of drug deals and seedy characters have an impeccable eye for detail and emotion, and on the tracks where Ghostface spits surreal, his imagination and wordplay is unmatched. And no one sounds better rapping over obscure '70s soul samples than Ghostface.

Following a short introductory skit, "Fishscale" opens with the track, "Shakey Dog." Ghostface spins a yarn about a robbery attempt gone awry. He describes everything from a gang suspiciously eyeing him and his accomplice on the street to the onions on the T-bone steaks in his mark's apartment. The scenery is so vivid you can smell the ozone hanging in the air after their guns are fired.

The track segues into "Kilo." It sounds like a bizarre version of a song from an episode of "School House Rock." Over a track of hazy horn lines and the sound of cocaine being cut and sniffed, Ghostface and guest Raekwon explain how to bag and sell coke. The chorus contains soulful female voices singing about how to measure kilos:

The beat for "The Champ" is created by Just Blaze and confirms why he is one of my favorite producers in hip-hop today. It is a classic boast track where Ghostface proves his vitality over squealing guitar, drugged-out strings and powerful horns. Within the track, Ghostface addresses the current weak state of hip-hop:

"My arts is crafty darts/ While y'all stuck with 'Laffy Taffy'/ Wondering how y'all got past me/ I was here before Nas dropped the nasty."

Even on the apparent cross-over-audience attempt, "Back Like That," featuring label-mate Ne-Yo, Ghostface manages to never compromise his identity. The track is a kiss-off to his woman who is fooling around with one of his competitors.

Other flashes of Ghostface's genius and cinematic storytelling include "Whip You With a Strap," where he reminisces about getting beat by his mother for misbehaving and regretting that kids don't get punished like they did in the past; and "Be Easy," a thumping club-rocking track.

In fact, except for a few unnecessary skits and a tacked-on bonus track, the entirety of "Fishscale" is nothing short of brilliant.

With his latest album, Ghostface has provided the fix I needed – a hip-hop album that is absolutely vital and a record that hits harder and lasts longer than the best cocaine ever could.

DAILY HOROSCOPES

Aries
(March 21 - April 19)
At the same moment you read this, someone will be thinking about you and smiling. Soon, they'll be laughing outright.

Taurus
(April 20 - May 20)
Your car is possessed again, so you should swing by the exorcist on the way to work. Don't you always hate it when it is repossessed?

Gemini
(May 21 - June 20)
Good day to snatch cookies when nobody's looking.

Cancer
(June 21 - July 22)
Be careful if you try to be funny today. Although you are normally renowned for your dry wit, you may be a bit soggy, today.

Leo
(July 23 - Aug. 22)
Today you will seek out new life and new civilizations. You won't find any, of course, but you will discover a really excellent Chinese restaurant in the process.

Virgo
(Aug. 23 - Sept. 21)
Beware of the Spanish Inquisition today. They may show up unexpectedly.

Libra
(Sept. 22 - Oct. 22)
Time heals all wounds, yes. But that's not really intended to mean that you should tie Time magazine around your sprained ankle. It's a figure of speech, you see, not meant to be taken literally. It has been rumored, however, that Newsweek is good for gout.

Scorpio
(Oct. 23 - Nov. 21)
A coworker is going to steal one of your best ideas and claim it as his own. That's about what you should expect, though, from a cow "orker."

Sagittarius
(Nov. 22 - Dec. 21)
You will have an intellectual discussion with a potato soon. You'll be so caught up in whether it was Descartes or Voltaire who first advocated empiricism, that it will fail to strike you as a bit odd that the potato knows much of anything about 17th-century French philosophers. In fact, it knows more about them than you do. Later, that will irritate you.

Capricorn
(Dec. 22 - Jan. 20)
You will be conducting naval maneuvers in the bathtub today when you will have an unfortunate accident involving your toy submarine. The visit to the emergency room will be most embarrassing.

Aquarius
(Jan. 21 - Feb. 18)
Good day to go on a voyage of self-discovery. Try to be back in time for dinner though.

Pisces
(Feb. 19 - March 20)
You will be walking along today when you overhear someone making a snide remark about you, drawing an unflattering comparison between your personality and a landfill. A snappy reply will occur to you sometime late next week.

Take action: be vocal about smoking, dump boyfriend

LAUREN ROHRER

I am graduating in May and will be returning home for a couple of months. I have been dying for the chance to get with an old friend from high school. He and I will be in the same place at the same time finally. Should I go for it, not knowing how long I might be at home?

If you guys have managed to stay close for the entire duration of your education, then I think it is safe to assume he is a really good friend. Just because you guys can see eye to eye doesn't mean you have to see him naked. Honestly, you've made it all the way through college without hooking up with this guy and complicating the friendship. Ask yourself how necessary a relationship really is before opening up that can of worms.

My roommates are constantly smoking in the house. They're addicted to nicotine, and everything inside smells like smoke, including my clothes. How can I get them to take their cigarettes outside for good?

You may not want to hear this, but smokers are people, too. And with public smoking becoming more and more rare right now, it's natural for them to want to smoke where they are comfortable. Trust me, if you've ever so much as made a face about it, they know it bothers you. Smokers are prone to look for that kind of thing. Best thing to do is just let them know and be vocal about it. But try to not lecture about how smoking is bad; it's nothing they haven't heard before.

My boyfriend can never keep a job. He calls in at least once a week, and there is nothing that I can do to motivate him to go. Is he even worth my time?

In a word, no. But that's assuming you like people who don't need encouragement to get out of bed, shower and other giant challenges the day can bring.

I am horribly bad about calling friends and family back. I can't even motivate myself to call my mother, and it's been about three weeks now. I really feel like an ass, but I honestly am too busy sometimes to call back. Any suggestions?

Seriously, pick up the phone. It does not take that much effort. Sometimes, if I sit a certain way with my phone in my back pocket, my ass can call people.

Wait a minute ... do you also have trouble getting to work? Fool, get a job and call your mother. And call your girlfriend, too. She thinks you're a lazy idiot, too.

Museum closes for construction

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Martha Scott, business and marketing manager for the museum, said the new space will be used for additional gallery space and storage space.

"It's primarily an expansion project," Scott said.

Storage space has also been an issue with the expansion of the museum's collections, Scott said.

The art collection has grown from less than 1,500 to 5,700 items since the museum's beginning 10 years ago.

"We're out of storage space," she said.

The windows in the galleries are currently being replaced to prevent condensation and to protect the art pieces from being damaged by the sun.

Heating, ventilation and air conditioning systems are also being adjusted in the current space.

The museum's staff is in the museum offices but will be moved temporarily during construction to the museum's activities room or the UMB Theater.

After construction is complete, Scott said the current gallery will be used to display permanent collections, and office space will be user friendly.

"It's nerve-wracking at the moment, but we're really excited about getting to the completion," she said. "When it's all done, we'll have space that's usable."

Lorne Render, museum director, said the additional space testifies to the support the museum has received from the community and university.

"It's a substantial increase," he said. "I think it's absolutely amazing."

The first show after the museum's reopening will be titled "Tools in Motion," an exhibition from the Hechinger Collection.

The artists used tools as subjects of paintings and artwork. Lorne said it's a happy coincidence to the museum's construction work.

Construction should be completed by the end of April 2007, and the museum will have a grand reopening in fall 2007, Lorne said.

Beth Hesterman, vice president of the Student Friends of the Beach Museum and senior in mass communications, said the need for the expansion indicates the success the museum has experienced.

"I think it's going to be great for everyone," Hesterman said. "It's kind of a shame there aren't a greater number of students seeing the exhibits. It's something accessible for students."

Snead begins 2nd term as Manhattan's mayor

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bruce Snead is Manhattan's new mayor. Again.

Snead, who was mayor from April 1997 to April 1998 and for the second time from April 2001 to April 2002, moved one chair over at Tuesday's meeting of the Manhattan City Commission. He had previously served as Manhattan's mayor pro tem under Mayor Ed Klimek.

Outgoing mayor Klimek reviewed his term and thanked the people of Manhattan before giving up his seat, calling the city the "most livable city in the state of Kansas."

"For a hometown boy, born and raised in Manhattan, to serve as your mayor, for a second term no less, has really been an honor and a privilege for me," Klimek said.

Snead said he looks forward to working with city staff to deal with problems to come in the next year, specifically the changes to the region as a part of the 1st Infantry Division's return to Fort Riley.

"We had a history of careful, guided growth, and now we anticipate and see explosive growth," he said. "Explosions can be damaging events if they aren't controlled and managed."

City Manager Ron Fehr said Manhattan operates under the tradition of the commission voting the previous mayor pro tem to be mayor. The new pro tem is the one four-year term commissioner who won more votes in the last election. The other two four-year term commissioners are voted mayor pro tem the next year.

Fehr said after those terms are up, the other two four-year term commission seats go up for election, and the commission has two new mayoral candidates. The fifth seat on the commission is held for two years for a time, and its holder does not take the job of mayor.

This means Phillips will be mayor next April, and commissioner Mark Hatesohl becomes mayor pro tem. Both were elected to four-year terms in 2005.

36 Saudi students study at K-State

By Adam Monroe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many new students from Saudi Arabia will be studying at K-State, due to efforts from Saudi Arabian King Abdullah bin Abdulaziz and President George W. Bush.

"We had seven Saudi students show up in October, but we are now up to 36 for this semester," said James Lewis, international recruiting coordinator for International Programs.

This new arrival of Saudi students is a direct result of collaborative actions taken between Bush and Saudi Arabian King Abdullah.

"Ten thousand students have received full four-year scholarships," Turki al-Faisal, Saudi prince and U.S. ambassador, said. "These students are the real ambassadors of our culture. They will be actively demonstrating our similarities while they are here."

"The focus of the scholarship is undergraduate studies," Lewis said.

The Office of International Programs has a structured system for handling new students of any ethnic origin.

"The English Language Program works closely with the Pre-admissions and Recruiting office as well as the International Student Center," Mary Wood, director and instructor of International Programs, said.

The Saudi Student Association is also actively involved in helping the student's transition go smoothly.

"We pick students up from the airport, help them find a place to live; we also help them open a bank account, get a student ID and get ready for classes," said Mohammad Alanazi, president of the Saudi Student Association and graduate student in computer science.

Initially, students are given a language placement test, which will determine the courses they take. Students with minimal English skills are placed in an intensive English course, which consists of 18 hours of English classes per semester.

"Of the 70 students in the intensive language course this semester, 35 are from Saudi Arabia," Wood said.

Students who show adequate English skills will be moved into high-level English part-time and undergraduate classes part-time, Wood said. Students then can continue to pursue a bachelor's degree.

"I will go through the English language program before I can take engineering classes," Osso Alsakkaf, freshman in electrical engineering, said.

Once students are here and begin to settle into a routine, it is quite common for them to struggle with homesickness and culture shock.

"You get really exhausted not being able to say what you want to say how you want to say it," Beverley Law, assistant director of International Programs, said.

Alsakkaf said he has been struggling with the language differences but has been trying to learn every chance possible.

"I speak Arabic, and it has been hard speaking a foreign language," Alsakkaf said. "I do have a lot of Saudi Arabian friends here, so I can speak Arabic sometimes, but most of the time we speak English, and we are trying to speak it with each other to learn more quickly."

"This is the longest I've been away from my family," Alsakkaf said "It's different in Saudi Arabia. Saudi students live with their family, and when you get married, you move out."

However, Alsakkaf said he is enjoying his time here.

The English Language Department works with the international resident assistants in the dorms, and teachers in the classrooms try to spot students with symptoms of homesickness, Law said.

"Once we spot it we can help them through it," Law said. "I would encourage students to get involved in sports, student groups, clubs or activities".

Along with the emotional pains of homesickness, new international students might experience cultural conflicts.

"Some traditions require students to pray five times a day, and sometimes they have trouble finding place on campus," Law said. "Also, students may have difficulties adapting to the cultural variations of food, which may lead to physical pains as well."

Education students face reality of debt, rate hikes

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dani Elder said she does not want to be a teacher for a high-paying salary.

"To me, it's not about the money," Elder, junior in elementary education, said. "It's about the students. No one can be who they are without a teacher."

Elder said she has to purchase items to ensure projects and portfolios are professional, and the money begins to add up, despite her love for teaching.

"You are at Hobby Lobby once a week, and I'm doing this on my own, working a part-time job," she said. "I'm broke every week."

Elder said she is concerned about her semester of student teaching when she will be unable to work and teach simultaneously.

"I see their point, but there are students doing it on their own," she said. "Every time it's time to pay bills, who is going to do it for them?"

After graduation, Elder said she will look for a job that offers benefits with the hope that she will be able to begin paying off her debts.

"I know I'm going to be in debt for the rest of my life because of loans," Elder said.

In July, the federal student loan rate will rise to its highest level since 2001, causing students to deal with increasing debt. Graduates planning on finding jobs serving the public might be faced with more debt and forced into finding higher-paying jobs, according to a report by the Public Interest Research Group in Washington, D.C.

Dottie Evans, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, said dealing with debt is an individual issue.

While many students in education majors have expressed a desire to teach for some amount of time, Evans said these students still are unsure they immediately want to go into teaching.

Because the cost of living in Kansas is lower than some other states, Evans said the financial stress for teachers in Kansas would be less than in an inner city.

"Kansas salaries aren't the worst in the nation, and they're not the best in the nation," Evans said. "I would encourage students to look at the cost of living and do some financial planning."

Jan Wissman, associate dean of the College of Education, said students might trade larger salaries to fulfill their calling as teachers.

"Each professional decision will bring with it the financial," Wissman said. "But I don't think it deters them from education."

Response team opens to public

By Bhagavathy Umamaheswar
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Flint Hills Sexual Assault Response Team had its public opening and reception Tuesday night.

Christine Hazlett-Allen, assistant program director, said five victims of sexual assault have been assisted by the program since the team began April 1.

"We are a community-based coordinated response to child and adult sexual assault," Hazlett-Allen said.

Hazlett-Allen said, according to Riley County Police Department records, there were 183 victims of sexual assault in Riley County and adjacent counties in 2005.

The Flint Hills Sexual Assault Response Team is a collaboration of efforts by sexual-assault examiners, law enforcement officers and patient advocates to enhance services for victims of sexual crimes.

"We want to ensure that a victim is not lost in the shuffle of getting medical attention, criminal justice and counseling," program director Stephanie Reich said.

Alesia McNutt, risk management chairwoman of Delta Delta Delta sorority, said she attended the opening to learn about the team and pass on information about prevention and response to members of her sorority.

"Lots of women don't know where to go for help and if there is any place even," McNutt, junior in modern languages, said.

The Crisis Center, Inc. and the Women's Center are two community organizations that support the Flint Hills Sexual Assault Response Team.

Mary Todd, assistant director of the Women's Center, said the center's role as an advocacy group is to provide support, information, medical care and referrals.

"A team like this helps build conviction in victims that they will be taken through the aftermath of sexual assault in a professional and caring way," Todd said.

Kay Ediger, part-time social worker at Mercy Regional Health Center, said the people working on the team are passionate and caring.

"The team does a lot of follow-up with the victim's health and answers questions about pregnancy and sexually transmitted diseases," Ediger said.

Underage drinking tip-line launched

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Kansas Department of Transportation launched a state-wide underage drinking tip-line last week.

Anyone can call and anonymously report parties involving underage drinking, plans to purchase alcohol for underage people and willingness of retailers to sell alcohol to underage people, said Steve Halbett, program consultant for the Bureau of Traffic Safety for the Kansas Department of Transportation.

"This is not an issue that is only about adults trying to control their kids – this goes way beyond adults wanting to make things difficult for kids," Halbett said. "We are trying to save their lives."

The toll-free tip-line operates 24 hours a day, seven days a week, Halbett said. When making a call, it is important to report the zip code or area where the activity is taking place. The call then will be matched to the law enforcement in that area, he said.

The caller's name, phone number or location are not required.

In 2005, 63 percent of Kansas students in grades eight through 12 reported having consumed alcohol in their lives, according to a Kansas Department of Transportation news release.

The idea of the tip-line was presented by Strong City, Kan., residents Richard and Liz Scott, who are sponsors of the Chase County Drug Free Action Team.

"This is a prevention program," he said. "Heading off the problem before it starts is a lot better than trying to recuperate."

Neeley Kleen, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education, said she does not support the tip-line.

"I think it is shallow to report others," Kleen said. "I think it's like when we were in elementary school when you tattle on each other."

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN

Josh Burmeister, as Roger Hopewell, and Martha Hunt, as Bernice Roth, respond to the discovery of a murder victim's make-up case. The show will be performed at 7:30 p.m April 20-22 at the west campus of Manhattan High School.

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A group of innocent people is snowbound in a creepy old mansion, complete with secret passageways, flickering lights and a crazy housemaid. Rumor has it that a killer is on the loose – and then the phones go dead.

This stereotypical murder mystery scenario sets the pace for Manhattan High School's spring play – John Bishop's "The Musical Comedy Murders of 1940," which opens Thursday night.

"It's a comedy spoof of murder mysteries," Linda Uthoff, drama director, said. "We have all these multiple personalities, and you have to find out who the slasher is."

The auditorium has been transformed into the set of a spooky 20th century mansion and includes many special effects, like trap doors, blowing snow, moving bookshelves and flying swords, said Daren Stuckenschmidt, who has been working backstage on the set.

The cast, which consists of 10 students, also is having a good time, Uthoff said.

The play is set in the 1940s, the costumes are from another decade and many characters require thick accents, she said.

"They are very smart kids who are expanding accents and the time period," Uthoff said. "They're having fun seeing what they would have looked like in the 1940s."

Most of the props were borrowed, and the K-State Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance loaned some of the bigger props for the production, Uthoff said.

"The Musical Comedy Murders of 1940" is a story of a group of stage people who assemble at the Westchester estate of a wealthy benefactor to begin work on a new production, according to a Manhattan High Performing Arts news release.

After a snowstorm traps them in the house, corpses begin to appear, knives spring out of nowhere and a full-fledged murder mystery unravels.

After much finger-pointing and comedic antics, the murderer is finally unmasked.

"I'm just curious about how it will go tonight," Annie Mack, who plays the wealthy homeowner Elsa von Grossenknueten, said.

"Otherwise, it will be a lot of fun."

Practice for the spring production began about five weeks ago, a shorter amount of time than what is usually allowed, Uthoff said.

The auditorium has been booked for concerts during the past several weeks, so the play's set was built in about a day, Uthoff said.

Despite the shortage of time, practices have gone well and the cast has made a lot of progress, said Clint Harris, who plays comedian Eddie McCuen.

Auxiliary squads to select new members

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In preparation for the 2006 season of the K-State Marching Band, auditions for the band auxiliary squads will be on April 29 in McCain Auditorium.

There are three groups of auxiliary performers that are part of the marching band: the Classy Cats, color guard and the feature twirler.

Kathleen Henao, Classy Cats coordinator, said people auditioning for Classy Cats will be asked to display several skills.

"The girls will learn two combinations, one jazz and one pom routine," Henao said.

Following the first round in front of the judges, all except 50 contestants will be cut. The remaining dancers will learn and be judged on more dance combinations that feature various leaps and turns.

Henao said the panel of judges is made up of experienced dancers.

"Our judges include alumni Classy Cats, past dance coaches and studio directors," she said.

Like the Classy Cats, those trying out for the color guard will have to learn and perform several tasks at auditions.

"They will be learning a routine to a pop song, as well as a 64-count marching routine," said Jeanne Copeland, color guard coordinator.

Copeland said there are several criteria she would like members of the color guard to meet.

"We're looking for people with good work ethic and potential," she said. "They should be willing to work hard on what we're trying to teach them."

Along with the Classy Cats and color guard, one feature twirler is selected to march with the band each year.

"We begin with a preliminary audition process," Meis said. "Prospective twirlers submitted a video, three letters of recommendation and a résumé. From there, letters are sent to finalists inviting them to a live audition on campus."

Meis said people trying out for this position are tested in three areas: command, a downfield marching routine to "Wildcat Victory" and a self-prepared routine.

"We have narrowed the prospective twirlers down to four," Meis said in regard to the preliminary process. "This year, we had interest everywhere from Canada to Texas."

Meis said one factor in choosing a feature twirler will be the ability to please the crowd.

"We want them to show us their ability to entertain," she said.

Frank Tracz, director of bands, said he believes the auxiliaries are an important part of the band.

"They add an awful lot," he said. "They bring a lot of color to the band – they're all talented young ladies."

Although the deadline to register for feature twirler tryouts has passed, anyone interested in being a member of the Classy Cats or color guard can try out. For more information on the upcoming auditions, students can reach the KSU Bands office at (785) 532-3816.

Movies bring India issues to K-State

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Three Bollywood movies will be shown as part of "India on Screen ... Bringing India Closer to You."

The first movie, "Monsoon Wedding," will show at 6:30 tonight. It is a comedy about how different people prepare for an arranged marriage in India.

The second movie, "Rang De Basanti," will show at 6:30 p.m. Sunday. It tells the story of a woman making a documentary about her grandfather's experiences in the Indian Independence struggle.

The final movie, "Velu Nayakan," will show at 6:30 p.m. April 26. It is about a small boy who witnesses a police officer killing his father, who is a leader of a labor organization.

"Monsoon Wedding" is in English, while "Rang De Basanti" and "Velu Nayakan" will be in Hindi with English subtitles.

Sudha Rani Pisipati, secretary of the India Student Association, said the movie festival will bring issues from India to K-State.

"The point is to bring the country of India and the traditions that we have and things like that much closer to the audience here," she said.

Pisipati said although students have read Indian literature, the movies bring it to life.

"When you see something you have already read, it makes more sense, and it has more meaning," she said.

The movies showcased are known as Bollywood movies. Bollywood is India's version of Hollywood, and it originated in Bombay, India.

Sanket Sanghavi, graduate student in industrial engineering and organizing committee member, said the movies will show a different side of India.

"People don't know what really goes on," he said. "It shows diversity of the different cultures and shows what living in India is like."

Debarshi Banerjee, graduate student in biochemistry, said he is excited for the movie festival.

"They are great Indian movies with the direction and the acting," he said.

Baking institute researches, inspects food safety

By Adam Monroe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The American Institute of Baking, an internationally accredited school of baking and scientific research institute, does everything from making cookies to fighting terrorism.

"The AIB has a school of baking, an audit services department, a food safety department and a research and technical services department," said Marilyn Sparks, administrative assistant for the school of baking.

The baking department trains students in the science of baking through two main courses. Sparks said these courses are Baking Science and Technology, and Maintenance and Engineering.

"These classes are very intensive and require students have at least two years of experience in baking before they can enroll," Sparks said, "Students, however, can take a correspondence course that will allow them to waive the two years of experience requirements."

The Baking Science and Technology course lasts for 18 weeks and students attend classes eight hours a day and five days a week. Half of the day is spent in lecture, and the other half is in a laboratory. This course is used primarily to train people how to bake and use the technology to do so.

The Maintenance and Engineering course offered at the institute has the same prerequisites but lasts for 11 weeks.

"The Maintenance course is set up similar to the Baking course, but the Maintenance course teaches things such as maintenance fundamentals, ammonia refrigeration and robotics among other things," Sparks said.

The Audit Services department inspects food processing institutions for health and safety, while the food defense department focuses more on education and awareness.

"Our goal is to train people, so they are able to do their own vulnerability assessments," said William Pursley, vice president of food safety and education.

The institute has been doing this through many types of programs and media.

"We have a book out titled 'AIB Guide to Food Security;' we give seminars; we have online courses, and two weeks ago, we released an audio course," Pursley said.

The institute offers between 80-90 seminars in the United States, 50 in Latin America, and several throughout the rest of the world, annually.

"This year we will be traveling to Japan, China, Mexico, Canada and India, among other places," Pursley said

There are two different types of threats against which the institute educates.

"We teach precautionary measures against food safety, which deals with accidental contaminations of food supplies, and food security which deals with intentional contaminations," Pursley said

The Food Safety and Security Industry's roots are linked to NASA.

"NASA started studying food safety because space food isn't easily recallable, so anything they left with, they were forced to eat," Pursley said.

The institute tries to focus on the process of food production holistically and strives to analyze each step of the process.

"It starts in the fields and grain bins but includes building plot design, employee training quality and packaging," Pursley said.

Steven Doll
COLLEGIAN

The Research and Technical Services department of the AIB will provide services for a fee and test new experimental products but also strives to find new technologies.

"An organization may submit to use a new enzyme, for example, that they have invented, claiming it makes bread fresh longer. We will then bake the bread and measure how soft it is over a period of time," Brian Strout, head of experimental baking, said.

The institute also has a group of people that develop the nutrition labels found on most products in the supermarket. The AIB does this by analyzing ingredient nutritional facts.

"In our database we have a nutrition table for around 30,000 different ingredients," Strout said.

The institute complies with many codes and regulations to produce these nutrition labels.

"There is a ton of regulations right down to the print size and serving size that vary per item," Strout said.

"We have worked with the FDA (Food and Drug Administration), and they recognize the program database."

The baking institute's mission is to protect the safety of the food supply and deliver a high value technical and educational programs.

"We train bakers for the industry," Sparks said, "but it's more than just a baking school."

Church to fundraise for addition

By Sarah Hardy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

St. Thomas Moore Catholic Church is preparing to begin a fund-raising campaign for a new community center that is expected to cost $2.9 million.

Mike Clark, fund-raising chair for the church, said a growing congregation needs more space for community activities, such as high school and older adult functions, intramural activities and weddings.

"Since the parish started in 1981, we have grown from 125 to over 930 families," Clark said. "And with the Manhattan population growing, we will probably be near 1,000 families in the next few years."

Clark said the church's growth presents the need for more office space, a choir room and expanded areas of the church.

"Right now if everyone showed up for an activity, we would have a serious space issue in our current building," he said.

The church's parish council did a strategic overview of the church's needs in 2002 and found that the amount of space the parish center offered was not going to be able to accommodate the growing congregation, Clark said.

The parish council voted in 2005 to begin a fund-raising campaign for a new community center.

The church has scheduled its main fund-raising day for April 30, when 160 volunteers are scheduled to visit with more than 700 parishioners.

The church hopes to raise $2.4 million through the campaign, and some parishioners have already made donations toward the center, Clark said.

Ron Frank, St. Thomas Moore member, said the donations are an early indicator to the goal of $2.4 million.

"We had some early commitments, and it's about where we had targeted," Frank said. "As people look at the parish they will see it is something that is needed, and we're confident they will step up to the plate and make it a success."

Shayla Sack, senior in industrial engineering and a member of St. Isidore's Catholic Church, said her parish's community center has served the congregation in many ways.

"We use our community center to have social hours and to play cards and games," Sack said. "I think the people who are active in the church get a lot of use out of it."

Abortion rights group gains victory

By Roxana Hegeman
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA – In a victory for an abortion rights group, a federal judge ruled Tuesday that abortion clinic doctors and other professionals are not required under Kansas law to report underage sex between consenting youths.

The ruling by U.S. District Judge J. Thomas Marten was a setback for Kansas Attorney General Phill Kline, an abortion foe.

Kline contended a 1982 Kansas law requiring doctors, teachers and others to alert the state and law enforcement about potential child abuse covers consensual sex between minors. He argued that the law applies to abortion clinics, and later extended that to other health professionals and teachers.

The Center for Reproductive Rights challenged that interpretation in court, and the judge sided with the organization. Kline said he had not decided whether to appeal.

"It's not unexpected," Kline said. "It's what we've been predicting."

Marten ruled that a plain reading of the Kansas law gives health care providers discretion to determine whether there is reason to suspect a child has been injured as a result of sexual abuse.

The attorney general's office had contended the law required mandatory reporting because sex is inherently harmful to underage children. In Kansas, the age of consent is 16.

2 lacrosse players arrested in Duke rape case; 3rd charge expected

By Tim Whitmire
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DURHAM, N.C. – Two Duke University lacrosse players were arrested on rape charges Tuesday in a scandal that has rocked one of the United State's elite campuses and raised explosive questions of race, class and the privileged status of college athletes.

The two players – both graduates of Northern prep schools – were promptly booked and released on bail. District Attorney Mike Nifong said a third player also could be arrested but has yet to be firmly identified.

"It is important that we not only bring the assailants to justice, but also that we lift the cloud of suspicion from those team members who were not involved in the assault," Nifong said.

Lawyers for the two men bitterly assailed the district attorney for bringing the charges. Other attorneys for Duke's lacrosse players said the two were not even present at the time the rape is alleged to have occurred.

Reade Seligmann, 20, of Essex Fells, N.J., and Collin Finnerty, 19, of Garden City, N.Y., are accused of attacking a stripper at a team party at an off-campus house on the night of March 13. They were charged with first-degree rape, sexual offense and kidnapping and were released on $400,000 bail each.

The district attorney would not say what evidence led to the charges.

"Apparently it was a photographic identification. And we all know how reliable that is," Kirk Osborn, Seligmann's attorney, said.

Finnerty's attorney is also confident.

"The next jury will hear the entire story, which includes our evidence, and we're confident that these young men will be found to be innocent," Bill Cotter, Finnerty's attorney, said.

The case has raised racial tensions and heightened the long-standing town-vs.-gown antagonism between Duke students and middle class, racially mixed Durham. The accuser is black, and all but one of the 47 lacrosse team members are white.

Well before the scandal, the nationally ranked team had a reputation for a swaggering sense of entitlement and boorish frat-boy behavior that included public intoxication and public urination. After the scandal broke, the university announced an investigation into whether it put up with such behavior for too long.

The case has led to the resignation of the coach and the cancellation of the rest of the season.

"Many lives have been touched by this case," said Duke President Richard Brodhead in a statement. "It has brought pain and suffering to all involved, and it deeply challenges our ability to balance judgment with compassion. As the legal process unfolds, we must hope that it brings a speedy resolution and that the truth of the events is fully clarified."

The university would not comment specifically on any disciplinary action taken against the two men but said it is Duke practice to suspend students charged with a felony.

Both players are products of wealthy New York City suburbs and all-male Roman Catholic prep schools. Finnerty attended Long Island's Chaminade High School, where 99 percent of the students go on to college. Seligmann went to the exclusive Delbarton School, a lacrosse powerhouse in Morristown, N.J.

"It is our hope and our conviction that the full truth of all that happened that night will vindicate Reade of these charges," Delbarton's headmaster, the Rev. Luke L. Travers, said in a statement.

Neither Seligmann nor Finnerty was among the Duke team members arrested in recent years for such offenses as underage drinking and public urination.

Finnerty, however, was charged in Washington with assault after a man told police in November that Finnerty and two friends punched him and called him "gay and other derogatory names." Finnerty agreed to community service.

Seligmann, a 6-foot-1 sophomore, and Finnerty, a 6-foot-3 sophomore, were in handcuffs when they stepped out of a police cruiser at the Durham County Jail early Tuesday. Their early-morning surrenders were arranged as part of a deal with Nifong in which they were bailed out of jail in a matter of hours.

A May 15 date was set for the next hearing in the case.

Vice President Dick Cheney waves as he gets off Air Force Two on Tuesday afternoon. The vice president arrived before his scheduled time and quickly loaded into the motorcade to depart for Fort Riley.

inside Afghanistan and Iraq as well as the continuance of the war on terror.

"The war on terror is a battle for the future of civilization; it's a battle worth fighting, and it's a battle we're going to win," he said.

The events of Sept. 11, 2001, were discussed, as were previous terrorist attacks like embassy bombings in Africa, the 2003 battle in Mogadishu, Somalia, and the bombings of the U.S.S. Cole in 2000. All lessons, the vice president said, from which the United States did not learn.

"Time and time again ... terrorists hit America, and America did not hit back," he said.

The vice president also said the United States' view of the world has changed and "... will never go back to the false comfort of the world before Sept. 11 (2001)."

"It's a sign that much is right in the world when elected representatives work to build a new Iraqi government while the tyrant who filled mass graves and terrorized Iraq went from palace to bunker to spider hole to jail," he said.

Cheney also said politicians would not hinder the military's ability to fight.

He sounded his support for continuing the war on terror saying, "the only way to lose this fight is to quit, and quitting is not an option."

After his speech Cheney presented the First Infantry Division's First Brigade with the Valorous Unit Award and attached the streamer to the brigade's flag. Before he departed the field he made rounds and greeted soldiers in the audience.

Rep. Jim Ryun, R-Kan., was present at the event and said the vice president's appearance was "... a great tribute to Fort Riley, what goes on here in the war on terrorism."

Ryun also echoed the vice president's approval of the increased role of the Iraqi forces.

Several soldiers were selected to speak with the press following the event.

Sgt. 1st Class Parvin Williams of Jacksonville, Fla., who served in Iraq from January 2005 to January 2006, said the vice president's appearance was rewarding.

"I think it feels great. Any kind of special consideration for anything that you do always feels good," he said.

Williams said he was unsure if most Americans could imagine the day-to-day life of deployment in Iraq.

Iraq veteran Capt. Michael Loftus, from Worcester, Mass., said the visit was a good opportunity to display Fort Riley to a member of the executive branch.

Loftus said while some might not understand exactly what deployment entails, his family and friends have been supportive of the efforts.

"They understand that what soldiers do over there is good," he said. "I know I get the kudos whenever I go back home on a job well done."

Hardy said the vice president's visit was a welcome tribute to the military members after a long and difficult job.

"It's great when you can have the vice president of the United States out here recognizing those families, those soldiers, so that's the biggest thing," Hardy said.

MUMPS | Slower spread indicates vaccine works

Tuesday it had counted 124 probable and confirmed cases of the mumps in 24 Kansas counties.

Kansas normally has one to three cases of the mumps reported each year, Sharon Watson, KDHE communications director, said. She said there were none in 2004 and 17 reported from 1994 to 2004.

Watson said the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention were looking into the disease's sudden growth, because the majority of those with suspected mumps cases already were vaccinated with MMR.

However, she said, the fact that the disease isn't spreading as rapidly as it could indicates the vaccine does have some effect.

"We don't have numbers that make us believe the vaccine isn't working," Watson said.

Unusual instances of the disease have been cropping up in several Midwestern states, including Nebraska and Wisconsin. In Iowa 815 cases have been reported according to The Associated Press.

Watson said a person with the mumps is contagious three days before showing symptoms and four days after symptoms end. She said people can lower their risk of the disease by not sharing utensils or drinking glasses and avoiding people believed to have the disease.

SMOKING | Salina smoking ban well received

reasons against the idea of the ban.

"Companies are worried they will lose business," she said. "But if the ban is everywhere, it will level the playing field. I doubt people will leave and go to other towns for business."

In other cities that have passed an ordinance banning smoking in businesses, Morris-Hardeman said business has stayed the same or even grown.

However, Stach said he thinks people who smoke will continue to do so, even if that means not going to bars, restaurants or other places of business.

A partial smoking ban has been in effect in Salina since 2003. The ordinance bans smoking in restaurants from 5 a.m. to 9 p.m. Private businesses, bars and places with a gross income of less than 30 percent are exempt from the ban, said Gary Swartzendruber, director of the Coalition of Reasonable People in Salina.

Swartzendruber said when the idea of a ban came about, he felt the people of Salina should have a say in what the ordinance would be.

"The population needs to hear the whole story," he said.

The Coalition of Reasonable People worked to open the ban ordinance to a public to vote, Swartzendruber said.

"About 14 percent of people came out to vote for city commission," he said. "But with a hot-button topic like smoking, 52 percent of registered voters came out to vote for this."

A few businesses closed after the ban, but there wasn't any public follow-up that confirmed the smoking ban influenced the companies' closing.

"No one has proved they closed because of the ban," Swartzendruber said.

Miriam Ibrahim, director of Tobacco Use Prevention Program in Salina, said she thinks Salina residents have accepted the ban well and thinks the response has been positive overall.

"Social norms are changing," she said. "People are becoming more open to this."

Ibrahim said she would like to see a more comprehensive ordinance in Salina in the future, such as one that includes more public places and businesses.

"In the beginning, some businesses were very skeptical," she said. "(Businesses have said) it's much better now. People don't have to wait in line for smoking or non-smoking sections."

DRAFT | Freeman provides element of mystery

will play a key role in Morris' new Cover-2 scheme.

It doesn't hurt, either, that he said he is now running a 4.2 in the 40-yard dash.

5. JOSH FREEMAN, QUARTERBACK

Sure, it could be argued that Allan Evridge should be the first quarterback selected in the draft, but you're missing the point. We already know what Evridge can do, but Freeman is still a mystery.

If you want your team to get the proper exposure and have the fans' eyes following your team's every move, you choose the freshman that spurned Nebraska for an offer from K-State.

However, the pick is not that far of a reach, since he was taking snaps with the first team offense in practice on Saturday.

You might agree or disagree with my picks, but you have to agree: Prince has made the Spring Game fun, interactive and a spectacle – something about which most universities are unable to pump their chests and boast.

Senior catcher Brandon Farr was named the Big 12 Baseball Player of the Week on Tuesday after going 11-for-20 (.550) with two doubles, four runs scored and five RBIs last week against No. 22 Creighton and Texas Tech.

Farr went 1-for-3 in the game against the Shockers and extended his current hitting streak to a Big 12 season-best and career-long 17 games. The streak ties him for the fifth-longest in K-State history.

Farr didn't know about the honor until after the game Tuesday, and he said he hopes the team can use his accomplishment as motivation for the weekend series starting Friday against Kansas.

"It's always good to earn an honor like this one," Farr said. "I just hope our team can rally around it and keep it going, because the most important thing is that we get some wins this weekend."

MONSOON WEDDING
The Rain is coming ... and so is his Family
Rated R, 114 minutes, 2002
Here comes the bride ...but is she ready? This romantic comedy from New Delhi native Mira Nair is set in contemporary India where bride-to-be Aditi has to contend with her traditional father Lalit Verma who loves his family dearly but does not have time for their "modern ways." The Punjabi family travels from all over to enjoy the festivities surrounding the wedding. Aditi faces the dilemma of an arranged marriage and how it conflicts with her contemporary take on relationships. We also get to know the stories behind her family members who also have conflicts between past and present. Vijay Raaz, as P.K. Dube, provides comic relief as the hysterical wedding planner who is busy working and wooing the family's maid.

RANG DE BASANTI
A generation awakens
Not rated, 155 minutes, 2006
"Every so often Bollywood produces a rare gem like Rang De Basanti, a film that breaks the mold by offering something more sophisticated than the standard musical melodrama. Directed by Rakeysh Mehra and featuring Brit Alice Patten opposite Indian superstar Aamir Khan, it tells the story of an English filmmaker who travels to the sub-continent to make a documentary about the freedom fighters mentioned in her grandfather's memoirs. An entertaining mix of romance, history, and social commentary, this quality production takes Hindi cinema in a fresh direction. — BBC, UK

VELU-NAYAKAN
Not rated, 154 minutes, 1987
TIME Magazine's ALL-TIME 100 movies
"Bollywood is shorthand for Bombay Hollywood, said of the largest Indian film industry. But it mans factures only about 200 of the thousand or so Indian feature films; a half-dozen regional based production sites larger than most of the world's national cinemas. Madras, capital of the Tamil state, is one such place, and its savior — arguably India's top pop film auteur — is Mani Ratnam. His movies, often dramatizing social unrest and political terrorism, churn with narrative tension and camera energy that would be the envy of Hollywood directors, if they were ever to see them. Nayakan, an early, defining work in his career, tells the Dostoyevskian tale of Velu, a boy who announces a life of crime after his father is killed by the police. Velu (Kamal Haasan) has trouble juggling his family life with his life-and-death mob "family." Ratnam has no such difficulty blending melodrama and rivalry, violence and comedy, realism, and delirium into a taut and a half-hour demonstration that, when a gangster's nearest are mounting, the most natural solution is to go singin' in the rain." — N.C.

Drugs found in vehicle

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Manhattan man was arrested Tuesday on charges involving drug possession and battery, according to a Riley County Police Department press release.

Samuel Lee Dartez II was arrested on a felony charge of aggravated intimidation of a victim, and misdemeanor charges of two counts of battery, criminal trespass and theft. He also was arrested on charges relating to possession of marijuana with intent to distribute within 1,000 feet of a school, possession of drug paraphernalia and no Kansas Drug Tax Stamp, as well as misdemeanor charges of possession of marijuana and possession of drug paraphernalia.

According to a press release, RCPD officers were called to 1430 Park Place, Apt. 3, for an unwanted subject at the residence.

Upon arriving at the scene, officers received a report that the suspect had battered two victims and allegedly had stolen a cell phone from one victim to prevent reporting of the crime.

Bond was set at $20,000.

2 arrests stem from traffic stop

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two Clay Center men were arrested Tuesday after a traffic stop revealed suspected methamphetamine, according to a Riley County Police Department press release.

Joshua David Vanaken and Timothy Jason Miller were pulled over in the 4500 block of Pillsbury Drive, on suspicion of impaired driving, the press release said.

More than 33 grams of suspected methamphetamine, drug paraphernalia, a semi-automatic handgun, a bolt action rifle and a Dodge truck were seized in the investigation.

Vanaken was arrested on felony charges of possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute, possession of methamphetamine, possession of drug paraphernalia and no Kansas Drug Tax Stamp.

He was charged with misdemeanor charges of possession of drug paraphernalia and criminal possession of a firearm.

Miller was charged with felony counts of possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute, possession of methamphetamine, possession of drug paraphernalia and no Kansas Drug Tax Stamp.

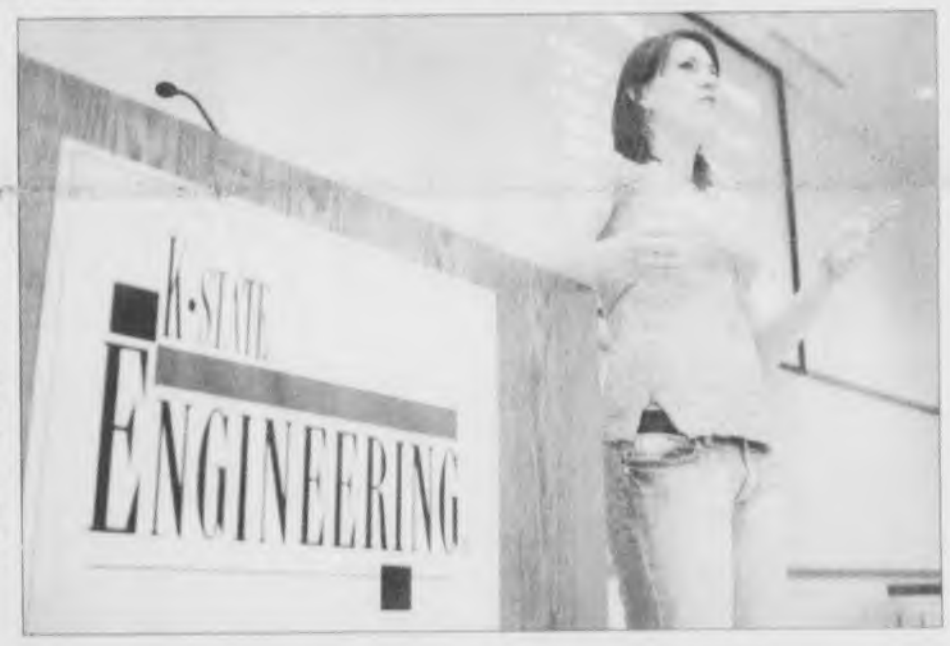
Misdemeanor charges against Miller included possession of drug paraphernalia and criminal possession of a firearm.

Vanaken and Miller had bonds set at $5,000.

High school girls shadow women to experience college lifestyle

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Several female K-State students partnered with high school girls from across the state as part of Wednesday's K-State Shadow Day.



The event was sponsored by the K-State Exploring Science, Technology and Engineering program (EXCITE!) and was designed to cultivate high school girls' interest in pursuing careers in science and mathematics, according to a media relations press release.

Chelsea Tinch, freshman at Junction City High School, said she and another participant were assigned to a student mentor.

"She showed us the library, which was the biggest library I have ever seen," Tinch said. "We walked around, and she showed us the campus, which doesn't look big at first, but once you start walking around, you realize it's huge."

Tinch said her tour of campus included a stop at Goodnow Hall, where her mentor lives, and Kramer Dining Center. She said

High demand causes increase in gas prices

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With summer approaching, many are curious if gas and diesel fuel prices will continue to rise.

Michael Babcock, professor of economics, said he does not foresee prices rising much this summer.

"Prices always rise in the summer," he said. "But I would suspect that the price isn't going to go up a whole lot because it's already at such a high level."

Babcock listed several reasons why he believes gas prices increase.

"Basically, the whole oil situation worldwide is all of the fast-growing economies," he said. "All these economies use oil, so the demand is pushing the price higher."

Babcock said the demand for gasoline is what drives prices so high, and reducing the demand is one way to help bring prices down.

"If you buy a car, find the most fuel-efficient one and use less gas," he said. "Think about what are essential uses for the car."

Kealan Schroeder, senior in history, said she is prepared to conserve gasoline.

"I won't go to a lot of places if prices are real high," she said. "I'll only drive if I have to – like I could walk instead of driving to work."

Rep. Sydney Carlin, D-Manhattan, said it is hard for the Kansas Legislature to respond quickly to combat high prices because there are few oil refineries remaining in Kansas.

"We currently have a bill in committee where we are trying to generate more production in Kansas," she said.

Carlin also mentioned the State's efforts to build ethanol plants.

"We already passed a bill for ethanol, but the reaction doesn't go into affect until January of 2007," she said.

When the actions take affect, the result will be a seven-cent decrease on motor vehicle fuel taxes, Carlin said.

ReNu contact lens solution pulled for possible link to eye infection

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bausch & Lomb Inc. has suspended shipments of their ReNu with MoistureLoc contact lens solution.

The decision comes after the Center for Disease Control reported a possible link between the solution and the fungal eye infection Fusarium keratitis, according to an April 10 Bausch & Lomb news release.

The infection, according to the release, has been reported in 109 patients in 17 states since June 2005. Of the 28 cases that have been investigated so far, there appears to be a disproportionate number of cases in which the patient reported using the solution.

No clear connection between ReNu with MoistureLoc and the infection has been established, however, according to the release.

"We at Bausch & Lomb believe that every effort should be made in assisting with this investigation in order to quickly identify the root cause of these infections," the release said.

Dr. Paul Bullock of Eyecare Associates of Manhattan, 1441 Anderson Ave., said fungal eye infections usually come from someone getting hit in the eye with a tree branch or a similar situation in which the eye is scratched.

"(Fungal infections) are very difficult to treat, and the drugs that are used to treat them are very expensive," he said.

Bullock said he recommends those contact wearers who currently are using any ReNu contact solution switch to another brand for the time being. Consumers should not, however, switch to a generic brand, he said, because they don't provide a high level of quality.

Bullock said he hasn't seen any cases of fungal infections, but he thinks the attention the issue has attracted has been a good way to remind his patients of the importance of taking proper care of their contact lenses.

"Contact lenses are medical devices," Bullock said. "Just like if a patient

"Humans and Hypoxia: An Unhealthy Match"
An Invited Presentation by: DR Jerome Dempsey
Sponsored by The Kinesiology Student Association
Thursday, April 20th 1:30 P.M.
Forum Hall
Kansas State University Student Union
Dr Jerry Dempsey is currently the John Robert Sutton Professor of Population Health Sciences, the Director of the John Rankin Laboratory of Pulmonary Medicine, and has affiliate appointments in Physiology and Kinesiology at the University of Wisconsin-Madison. His research interests are concerned with the regulation of breathing in various physiologic states in humans and animals. One group of projects seeks to determine the limits of the healthy human pulmonary system for gas transport, respiratory muscle function and ventilatory output during exercise. A second major aim is the influence of respiration on autonomic control of cardiovascular function. A third series of studies is concerned with regulation of breathing in waking and sleeping humans and animals, with specific emphasis on sleep apnea. Dr Dempsey has over 300 publications in scientific journals, has been well funded for over 35 years from sources such as NIH, NHLBI, and American Heart Association, and is presently the editor of Journal of Applied Physiology. He is also a past Citation Award Recipient and Honor Award Recipient for Scientific Contributions from the American College of Sports Medicine.

For a $10 donation, handmade bowls can be purchased at Mercado Gourmet Grocery and taken to Texas Star Cafe for free soup 5-8 tonight. The Empty Bowls effort has been selling bowls since April 6. All proceeds benefit local hunger-fighting organizations.

Empty bowls benefit charities

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Today is the last day of the Empty Bowls campaign, which was organized locally by the Women's Center.

All proceeds will benefit local charities that provide food to those in need.

"It's kind of symbolic of food – empty bowls," said Jeff Pfannenstiel, owner of Mercado Gourmet Grocery. "The whole idea is you get food with your bowl and fundraise for food organizations."

Mercado Gourmet Grocery, 1222 Moro St., began selling handcrafted ceramic bowls for $10 each on April 6.

The bowls were crafted by Manhattan residents, and the bowls vary from beginner pieces to bowls made by professional potters, Pfannenstiel said.

"That's kind of the charm of the bowls – you come in and pick out what you want," Pfannenstiel said.

A hot meal is included with the cost of a bowl, which will be provided by Texas Star Café, 606 N. 12th St.

The restaurant will host an all-you-can-eat-soup supper tonight 5-8 for people who purchased an empty bowl.

Cream of tomato basil, and beef and vegetable with barley soups are on the menu for the night, Jared Becker, co–manager of Hibachi Hut and Texas Star, said.

The Empty Bowls campaign began in a Michigan high school in 1990, and events have taken place around the world since its start, according to its Web site, www.emptybowls.net.

Last year was the first time K-State had an Empty Bowls event. About 200 bowls were sold, and $2,000 was raised, said Kelly Maze, who helped organize the event with the Women's Center.

This year, about 300 bowls were made, and it is hoped that the proceeds exceed last year's donations, Maze, junior in life sciences, said.

Those who wanted to make a bowl to donate were invited to use the Manhattan Art Center clay annex, 1520 Poyntz Ave., during open studio time at the end of February, Julie A. Gibbs, clay annex manager, said.

Many of the more inexperienced artists hand-constructed their bowls, while more experienced potters crafted them on the pottery wheel, Gibbs said.

Manhattan High School West Campus ceramics students and K-State Potters Guild members also made bowls to donate, Maze said.

The event also is taking place in conjunction with the K-State art students' studio walk, which will be 5-7 p.m today at Memorial Stadium.

The public will be able to view the students' work, and bowls will also be available for purchase, Maze said.

Proceeds from the fundraiser will benefit the Ogden (Kan.) Friendship House, Circle 6, Allegra and Second Helping, all of which are local organizations that provide hot meals, Maze said.

"It's a way for communities and, in this area, the university to come together and raise money for those that have empty bowls," Maze said. "It's for hunger around the world and in your own community."

For more information

Bowls are available at the Women's Center's kiosk in the K-State Student Union. There also will be a table from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. Thursday in Bosco Student Plaza selling bowls made by the K-State Potter's Guild.

Aggieville gift store to reopen after month-long renovation of building

Scrubbing the floor at The Palace Cards and Gifts, Antonio Guzman, owner of Amee Inc. Janitorial Services, does floor maintenance in the newly renovated store. The shop has been closed since March 20 for painting, adding new lighting and redoing the woodwork, as well as adding a new awning.

Originally a pharmacy, The Palace Cards and Gifts, 704 N. Manhattan Ave., is going through another renovation.

The Palace is known for its gifts and balloons, and new owner Julie Haynes said she plans to keep it a gift store.

The Palace has been closed since March, and hopefully will reopen by the end of this week or the beginning of next week, Haynes said.

Haynes said she bought the business in November 2005 and sold most of the existing merchandise. She started preparing for a reopening of the store in January.

The business will close again this summer for further renovations to the bathrooms and other parts of the building so it can offer more to the customers, Haynes said.

"We want to give cooking classes in there," she said.

Haynes said the new Palace location will offer gardening and kitchen items, linens and balloons, among other items.

Haynes said she plans to restore most of the cabinets that were in the building when it was a pharmacy.

Haynes also owns Rock-A-Belly Deli, 718 N. Manhattan Ave., and has made a success of that business, so her ownership of The Palace will be an asset to Aggieville, Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association said.

"She has a vested interest in Aggieville," Sieben said. "Anytime you have merchants who invest their time and energy to update and renovate their business, it's beneficial."

Diane Meredith, owner of The Dusty Bookshelf, 700 N. Manhattan Ave., and Acme Gift, 1227 Moro St., said she is looking forward to the reopening of The Palace.

"We're thrilled," she said.

With the different items offered by Acme Gifts and The Palace, and with Krystallos, 405 Poyntz Ave., returning to Aggieville in June, customers will have a variety of options from which to choose, Meredith said.

Krystallos was closed in 2003 after an electrical fire destroyed its building in Aggieville.

"I think it's going to be great for Aggieville, and I'm not just saying that," Meredith said.

EARTH DAY
K-STATE RECYCLES and thinks green

Since mid 1987, K-State Facilities Recycling has collected and diverted from the waste stream over five and three quarter million pounds of materials. This material, over twenty-eight hundred tons, was reused instead of being buried in a landfill.

K-State Facilities Recycling and Custodial Services will celebrate Earth Week 2006 by continuing to expand our desk-side recycling program, and by initiating the use of Green Seal Certified chemicals for cleaning campus buildings. We are in the process of developing a contract for Green Seal Certified cleaning chemicals to be used in locked, dispensing units. These chemicals will be safer for Custodial Specialists to use, and they will result in an environment that is safer for building occupants. When these chemicals leave the campus, they will be safer for the environment to assimilate.

We have placed a three compartment recycling container in about one thousand campus offices located in eleven campus buildings. In partnership with the City of Manhattan, we have provided containers for two of their buildings as well. We will continue adding campus buildings during this next year until all academic buildings have the desk-side recycling containers in place.

WHAT CAN YOU DO TO HELP?
Any time you need to discard a piece of paper, look and see if it can be recycled. If so, then place it in the appropriate compartment in the recycling container. Please continue to take your home recycling directly to a recycling facility such as Howie's Recycling Center. This program is designed to reduce the solid waste that we currently haul to the Riley County Transfer Station.

WHAT IF SOMETHING GOES WRONG?
If you have questions about recycling or the service we provide, please call 532-6446, or contact your building recycling coordinator.

You are also encouraged to recycle white bond paper, office mix paper, computer paper, shredded paper, cardboard, newspaper, magazines, telephone books, plastic bottles, aluminum cans, wooden pallets, computers and other electronic equipment (with appropriate signed DA-110s) at campus collection sites or by calling 532-6446 for special pickups. You may also visit our website at: http://www.k-state.edu/facilities/recycling/.

To find out what K-State students are doing to celebrate Earth Week 2006, visit the Students for Environmental Action (SEA) website at: http://www.k-state.edu/environment/.

Please encourage your friends, family, and coworkers to celebrate Earth Day by recycling.

TO THE POINT

Small solutions ease burden of high gas prices

It is no secret that gas prices are high.

With summer approaching, there is speculation about whether gas prices will continue to rise.

Manhattan currently does not have a public transportation system, and not everyone can afford to purchase a new fuel-efficient vehicle. So here are some suggested alternatives to driving and relying on vehicles for transportation:

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

1. Walking and biking

Whenever possible, students should walk and bike to c. s and work. Driving to and from campus and hunting for a parking spot for 30 minutes wastes a significant amount of fuel that could be saved simply by lacing up the tennis shoes and walking.

2. One-stop shopping trips

Instead of making numerous trips to the mall or grocery store, students should plan ahead for shopping trips by making a list. While making three or four visits to Wal-Mart might not seem like a lot of wasted fuel, it adds up – and quickly.

3. Carpooling

If walking or riding a bike is just not possible, students should carpool with friends to campus and work. The cost of gas can be split among four or five people.

Bullied

Columbine tragic, but harassment intolerable

OWEN KENNEDY

Today is the seventh anniversary of the Columbine High School shootings. I've mourned the deaths of the 15 individuals, including the shooters, who died on April 20, 1999.

Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold, the shooters, died tragically. But they lived tragically as well.

Many members of the media and other individuals around the country have called these two young men "monsters" and "evil." I have always strongly disagreed: their actions were monstrous and evil; the young men were not.

Harris and Klebold were different than most high school students. Because of this, they dealt with extreme heckling from peers. My impression is that these two were always a bit different, and for this, they probably had to deal with bullies and insults for their entire school careers.

Most of us dealt with being picked on sometime in our younger years, and, at least in my experience, I was told to stand up for myself and fight back when confronted by a bully. We are told this by teachers, administrators and parents, but it rarely works.

I'm sure Harris and Klebold went to school officials to complain about the harassment, and I'm sure they were told to toughen up and stand up for themselves. On top of this, the individuals who were doing the harassing were well-known and esteemed by teachers and members of the community. So not only are their complaints ignored, but also they have to deal with their bullies finding favor with the so-called "indifferent" administrators.

After being called "faggot," "loser," "retard," "dumb-ass," and "screw-up" for 12 years, it is understandable that these two young men wanted to fight back. Their school was a pressure cooker for a violent response. When no one would help, Harris and Klebold fought back. They could have spent the rest of their lives being losers and nobodies, or they could be forever known as monsters. They decided on April 20, 1999.

Before this, the young men, who lacked a support system, had never harmed anyone. Now they always will be known as two manifestations of evil, while their bullies will be known as harmless, good-natured, all-Americans.

I can't defend what Harris and Klebold did. Most of those killed never did anything wrong. But I find it hypocritical to tell young people to defend themselves, while offering no help, and then making them out to be evil when they finally do fight back.

Columbine shows the need for schools to no longer ignore student-to-student harassment. Rather than just calling those who are picked on "babies" or "wimps," why don't we try to stop those who are doing the harassing? Let's prevent the problem before it blows up, just like it did seven years ago.

Two young men take the harassment for 12 years before doing something, and they are called monsters. Those who heckled them put on a front to hide who they really are and continue picking on others to make themselves feel better – all while the outside world does nothing. It really makes you wonder: who are the real monsters here?

Women: allow chivalry, but don't freeload

MEGAN MOLITOR

I wrote love letters to every boy in our class. I know – I was four feet of desperation. My peers apparently had not grown used to my charm and hotness quite yet, because no one replied. All except one boy, who sent me back a construction paper heart and attached it to a candy bar. This was my first present from a boy.

Many of us have had a boyfriend, or perhaps girlfriend, who showered us with random gifts. Maybe you were like I felt in that situation – uncomfortable.

One of the fun parts of being a girl is being taken care of – to a point. I was raised to believe that it's acceptable for the man in the relationship to pay for dinner, movies, etc. I have no problem with this, as long as it isn't too frequent of an occurrence, and I can have a turn once in a while.

Chivalry is a cool thing. I like having doors held open for me, being in front of lines, all the things my gender in this society has for me. My problem is with the women in this society who take this concept too far and make the rest of us look like gold-diggers.

A friend of mine is in a new relationship – hooray for her. He's a nice guy; she's a nice girl; the setup is fine. However, she's known this guy for about three weeks and the relationship exceeds standard chivalry.

He pays for her to get her nails and hair done and for cartons of cigarettes. And the icing atop this atrocity – he actually gives her a weekly allowance.

When I was young, I was given an allowance to make sure I did my chores and did the things my parents said I was supposed to. I detect possibly horrific similarities in the aforementioned situation.

She supported herself just fine before this guy. Now, however, she has abandoned financial independence and leans on a man whose middle name she doesn't know.

I take great pride in the fact that, while I have a significant other, I am financially stable for my everyday needs. I like the independence in little things like paying my own cable bill and buying my own clothes. It means they're mine, and I worked for the money to buy them, as opposed to what other women might have done to earn the money from their boyfriends.

Women of K-State, take heed. Feeling protected, loved and, yes, a little taken care of, can be a pretty nice setup. I have nothing against it. I do, however, take offense to women who take the easy route. It's too simple to let somebody else handle your finances. Ladies, the only way to know what you're made of is to do it yourself.

Besides, if your guy isn't too happy about buying those Manolos you've been eyeing, it'll be nice to buy them yourself.

Huggins signs top junior-college guard Young

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

So far, coach Bob Huggins is a perfect two-for-two in recruiting since arriving at K-State.

After Huggins signed 7-foot-3 center Jason Bennett on April 12, K-State's new coach filled another scholarship by signing junior-college guard Blake Young to a National Letter of Intent on Wednesday morning.

"(Young) gives us another dimension on the offensive end," Huggins said in a release Wednesday. "I think he will give us that added dimension of being able to push the ball up the floor and create easy baskets for us.

Young

"I also think he can be a tremendous defender in the aggressive style we want to play."

Last season, the 6-foot-2 guard averaged 23.2 points on 48.5 percent shooting as a sophomore for Daytona Beach, Fla. Community College, including 37.7 percent (69-of-183) from 3-point range.

Young, rated as the top junior-college guard in the country by Rivals.com, adds talent and athleticism to a deep K-State backcourt that returns five guards who averaged at least 19 minutes per game last season.

Though Young is listed as a shooting guard, he started at the point for Daytona Beach this past season.

Brian Gates, a recruiting expert for GoPowercat.com, said Young is similar to the type of player Huggins was known for recruiting at Cincinnati. Gates said Young reminds him of San Antonio Spurs' guard Nick Van Exel, a former junior-college transfer who played for Huggins at Cincinnati in the early 1990s.

"(Young) can bring the ball down the court and run the offense, but you better not leave him open to shoot," Gates said. "And I know he can take it to the basket as well."

Who will be the next QB?

What type of presents do you give someone celebrating his or her 21st birthday?

CEDRIQUE FLEMMING

Most people ask for alcohol, but for my 21st birthday today, I would like to ask coach Ron Prince for a special present.

If Prince could do anything for my birthday, I would want him just to tell me who the starting quarterback for the Wildcats will be next season.

I understand it is way too early to tell, and all candidates look like they have the potential to earn the starting spot, but I've been patient, and I want to know.

I'll make it easier for you. Coach. I'll tell you what I think the depth chart at quarterback should be, and hopefully this will help your decision.

And don't worry – if you grant me my birthday wish and tell me who the starter is before letting anybody else know, then I'll make sure to keep it a secret.

The five quarterbacks competing for the starting spot (in order of how I think they should appear on the depth chart) are:

SENIOR DYLAN MEIER

Meier was a good leader for this team when he played in 2004, even though he was hurt for a good portion of the season.

He has been off target at times during spring ball and looks like he is struggling to find the game he possessed earlier in his career.

He said he is 100 percent, but sometimes looks as though he is still trying to work out the kinks of not being able to throw the ball for an entire season.

So why am I choosing him as the starter after all that, you ask?

I base my judgment only on past performance. He played extremely well at times during the 2004 season, and he was on the roster when K-State won the Big 12 Championship in 2003, so he knows what it's like to be on a winning team.

Right now, I would take experience over youth.

TRUE-FRESHMAN JOSH FREEMAN

Prince did not recruit this guy to sit on the bench.

Freeman has shown flashes of greatness during the spring. He has had some nice passes down the field, and he can shake a defender if he has to.

In some ways, he reminds me of a younger Vince Young, with his height and the way he runs the ball. He might not have as much talent as Young at this point in his career, but I think he has tremendous potential, and, given the chance, he will show everyone he can be the starting quarterback for the Wildcats.

The K-State track team will travel to Lawrence today to compete in the 79th Annual Kansas Relays.

Coach Cliff Rovelto said the competition at the three-day meet will different from past meets.

"Relatively few Division-I schools go," he said. "It's a lot of smaller four-year and community colleges. It doesn't mean they are not good athletes, they are just not the athletes we will be competing against later on."

Last year in the Kansas Relays, sophomore Laci Heller won the women's hammer throw, and senior Christina Lara won the women's 1,500-meter run. Sophomore Ben Delay won the 3,000-meter steeplechase, senior T.J. Staab won the shot put, and the men's spring medley relay team grabbed its event title.

Rovelto said although there will be post-collegiate and Olympic athletes at the meet, they are not a main focus for the K-State athletes.

"There are athletes associated with our program, whether as coaches or athletes, who have been there done

K-State's equestrian team will compete at the Varsity Equestrian National Championships today in Albuquerque, N.M., against some of the top teams in the NCAA.

The Wildcats will compete against the 10th seed West Texas A&M Lady Buffs in the first round at 8:30 a.m. If victorious, K-State, the eighth-seeded team in the tournament, will compete against Texas A&M Aggies. The Aggies are the defending Western Varsity National Championship winners.

K-State already faced Texas A&M, the No. 1 seed in the Western Bracket, this year at the Big 8 Varsity Western Tournament on Jan. 27 and 28. K-State lost both shows.

Weller said she feels that competing against A&M earlier in the year will have a positive effect on the Wildcats this time around, if they are to face the Aggies.

"We'll do better this time," Weller said. "We are more prepared this time around."

Coach Teresa Slough said the Wildcats will have to perform well to come home with a victory.

"Going in to this championship, our western riders have been riding very well in practice, and we expect them to perform at a high level this weekend," Slough said in a press release.

Five riders will compete in the Hunt English Bracket; freshmen Leslie Yates and Jana Lechtenberg; sophomores Whitney Snyder and Jessica Walters; and junior Casey Finnell.

Walters said she expects great things from the Wildcats.

"I think we'll ride really well," she said. "We are going to come out here and surprise some people."

K-State will be competing in the English Bracket of the tournament against Fresno State. K-State is the ninth seed in the English Bracket and with a win, will compete against the No. 1 seed, Georgia Bulldogs.

PGA | After long wait, Nelson in Hall of Fame

For Larry Nelson, a long wait to get into the World Golf Hall of Fame didn't diminish the joy once it finally happened.

Nelson

The three-time major champion and Ryder Cup stalwart was the only player elected off the PGA Tour ballot into the Hall's Class of 2006. In his 11th appearance on the ballot and a year after finishing second by one percentage point to Vijay Singh, Nelson received 65 percent of the votes to earn entry.

The late Henry Picard, whose 26 tour victories included the 1938 Masters and 1939 PGA Championship, was second with 53 percent, followed by Curtis Strange (50 percent), Craig Wood (37), Hubert Green (36) and Lanny Wadkins (34).

NFL | Broncos deal 22nd overall pick to 49ers

The San Francisco 49ers now have two first-round picks in this month's NFL draft.

The Niners acquired the 22nd overall selection in the draft from the Denver Broncos on Wednesday for picks in the second round and third round.

NFL | Opening statements given in Williams' trial

There was little dispute in court Wednesday about what running back Moe Williams did on a raunchy cruise with several other Minnesota Vikings players, but his attorney questioned whether it was a crime.

Series tackles polygamy stereotypes of child abuse, sharing husband's time

"Big Love"
★★★★☆
TV series review by Loni Woolery

"Big Love" airs at 9 p.m. Sundays on HBO.

At first glance, Bill Henrickson seems like an ordinary man. He is a successful businessman who is opening his second home improvement store.

HBO's newest series, "Big Love," follows the struggles of polygamist Henrickson (Bill Paxton) and his attempts to emotionally and financially support his three wives and seven children. Henrickson left his life at the Juniper Creek commune, a polygamous community, to succeed as an average man in suburbia.

His wives, Barb (Jeanne Tripplehorn), Nicki (Chloe Sevigny) and Margene (Ginnifer Goodwin) share the responsibilities of raising the children while maintaining all three of their adjoining houses. Henrickson's primary responsibility is to bring in the income that allows the family to live the life to which they have become accustomed.

However, a previous debt to the "prophet" of the commune, Roman, has become a serious threat to the family's safety. Roman's constant harassment has attracted suspicious attention to the Henricksons.

Polygamy has officially been banned by the Mormon Church since 1890. About 20,000 – 40,000 or more currently practice polygamy in the United States, according to a joint report by the Utah and Arizona Attorney General's Offices. Polygamy is a felony offense in Utah.

The constant need for discretion and secrecy has kept all members of the Henrickson family at arm's length from the rest of society.

The oldest daughter, Sarah, already has revealed the truth to a new friend, and Margene has been inviting a suspicious neighbor to her house frequently.

Polygamy isn't just about hiding from society. The social support structure of a polygamous family is something that people can come to appreciate.

Bigger families can offer a stronger emotional and financial support system, at least for the children. The family pools together it's money to share with the family as a whole.

All decisions are made as a group, and a schedule is maintained to assure each wife equal time with the husband.

On the other hand, polygamy can be grossly abused through the exploitation of young girls. For example, Roman recently married one of the girls from the commune who is the same age as Henrickson's oldest daughter.

The most basic argument against polygamy is the difficulty of sharing one's husband with multiple wives. "Big Love" has taken great strides in showing that all the Henrickson family members struggle to deal with this.

While there is a fair share of bickering that goes on, especially between Barb and Nicki, the family is generally loving and warm.

So far, the show has yet to introduce any unexpected twists or turns.

The overabundance on Paxton's rear-end can be a little unsettling at times, but overall, "Big Love" is a solid story about an average family.

Play explores primal human instincts, basic elements

By Mark Sibilla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State will be one of the first universities in the country to present the 2002 Tony Award-Winning play "Metamorphoses."

Playwright Ann Zimmerman took her favorite myths from Ovid's 15-volume work and focuses on the stories' power of unconditional love to transform lives, Charlotte MacFarland, director of "Metamorphoses," said.

"The play juxtaposes the ancient and the modern in language, set and costume to reflect the timelessness of the myths," said MacFarland, associate professor in the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance.

"The stories of Ovid are the great stories of Western culture, and, though thousands of years old, still matter today, because they explore the primal instincts of humanity."

"Metamorphoses" played around the country and off Broadway before it was moved to Broadway's Circle in the Square Theatre in March 2002.

The play was conceived as an organic work, originally set in a large pool of water, MacFarland said.

Many theaters are financially or physically unable to handle the incredible amount of water and have been unwilling to do the play, MacFarland said.

"We explored the possibility of creating the pool in Nichols Theatre and found that we could not support the weight," MacFarland said. "We all, however, loved the beautiful and timeless script."

It was discussed whether the play is only about the water.

The production crew decided it was not and decided to create its own vision of the piece, MacFarland said.

"Metamorphoses" was re-conceived to incorporate the four basic elements present in all civilizations: earth, air, fire and water, said Kathy Voecks, assistant professor of scenic design.

"We decided that the communal and ritual aspect of storytelling was the most important part of the play," Voecks said.

"We tried to create a space with a sense of ritual. There are a lot of locations in the play, which are described verbally, but not a lot of scenery changing – it is about the storytelling, not the spectacle of the scenery."

In addition to the change in set design, MacFarland enlisted David Ollington, assistant professor of dance, to choreograph a dance for a segment of the play in which Orpheus ascends Mount Pangaion to salute his god Apollo at dawn.

Metamorphoses
When: 8 p.m. April 20-22 and 26-29
Where: Nichols Theatre
How much: $7.50 for students
$9.50 for seniors and $11.50 for general public

The dance involves a number of lifts and is set to original music composed by MacFarland's son, Ollington said.

Ollington said he researched the myth of Orpheus in order to try to incorporate aspects of the myth into the dance.

"In the myth, Orpheus is torn to pieces by a gang of women when he attempted to ascend the mountain," Ollington said. "The play doesn't show the event, but I tried to add things into the choreography that suggests that."

Like the original play, however, MacFarland said the theater production has been created organically by the entire ensemble.

The play tells nine stories, and including the narrators, there more than 60 different parts played by 12 people, she said.

"We are truly one unit – a group of storytellers sharing our tales for the enjoyment, and hopefully edification, of the audience," MacFarland said. "We only hope we can do some justice to this incredible play.

"The world needs its message. Our fondest wish is that everyone will leave the theater determined to be a little more loving."

Holmes gives birth

Holmes

Suri weighs 7 pounds, 7 ounces and is 20 inches long. Her name means "princess" in Hebrew or "red rose in Persian," he said.

"Both mother and daughter are doing well," the publicist said.

The birth was planned to take place as a silent procedure under the tenets of the Church of Scientology, to which both parents belong.

Suri is the 27-year-old actress' first child. Cruise, 43, has an adopted daughter and son — Isabella, 13, and Connor, 11 — with ex-wife Nicole Kidman.

Brooke Shields also gave birth to her daughter, Grier Hammond Henchy. Cruise had criticized her for taking antidepressants following the birth of her first child.

Simple summer fashion

Catrina Rawson
COLLEGIAN

Manhattan is a long way from New York, London, Paris or Milan. In much the same way, the average college student's bank account is a long way from those who sport the styles fresh off of the runways of those cities.

Therefore, when you dust off the boxes filled with the summer clothes you haven't worn since – well, I guess that would be early March – don't feel bad about the fact that they're slightly different than those that will be worn by the fashion industry's best and brightest this summer.

There are a few things you can keep in mind when deciding what to buy this season that will keep you stylish, cool, and most importantly, in the black.

TOPS

The best possible option for both sexes is the T-shirt. They're by far the most comfortable option, and a well-fitting T-shirt can look great on anyone. And a great summer activity is going down to the local thrift shop and looking for that perfect shirt. At most they cost about $2, and they can last for a really long time – it's not like T-shirts are ever going out of style.

The most flattering fit, for guys and girls, is a shirt that falls a couple inches below the hips and isn't too baggy or too tight; anything between the two is great, depending on what you prefer, but either extreme is incredibly tacky on both sexes.

On those particularly warm days, girls might want to opt for a tank top. Tanks can be a great option, but I've often seen them misused. A super-tight tank top doesn't look good on anyone – and all that material hugging so close to your body makes you hot. A recent trend of tank styles that I like are the long tanks, which look great on all body types, alone or layered.

JESSI HERNANDEZ

Guys, unless you are working outside or working out, leave the tanks at home. On most guys, they're just not flattering. And even if you have the arms of a Greek god, showing them off makes you seem like a tool.

BOTTOMS

The most popular summer choice is some form of cropped pants – shorts for guys and shorts or capris for girls.

Guys have it pretty easy – the best-looking option for them is a good pair of cargo shorts, which look best when they fall to the knee. Jean shorts, however, are not an option and haven't been since the "Saved By the Bell" days. So guys, if you have a pair in your closet, it's time to retire them.

Ladies, you can still get away with jean shorts, although they're on their way out. A fun new trend in women's shorts is the longer, fitted Bermuda shorts, which are cute on essentially all body types.

Another option for girls is wearing guys' cargo shorts. They're comfortable and can be worn in a more casual manner with a T-shirt or even for going out when paired with a cute tank top and a wide belt worn low around the hips.

There also is a trend to wear nice shorts for semi-dressy occasions. Patterned shorts made of material like wool look nice when paired with a nice shirt and a pair of heels.

Overall, the best thing to keep in mind when planning your summer wardrobe is what you're most comfortable in. If you live in the Midwest, you're lucky enough to be able to get away with practically anything. Even jean shorts.

$50 outfits possible

By Kelsey Childress
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many of the stores in Manhattan Town Center allow shoppers to create an entire outfit for $50 or less, providing a fashionable alternative for those on a budget.

"When I'm looking for a bargain, no matter what store I go to, I will check out what is on sale and go from there," said Leeann Armstrong, senior in apparel and marketing design.

American Eagle has several skirts and capris on sale, including the Military Mini Skirt for $24.95. This skirt, matched with the Embellished Boyfriend Tank for $14.95 and a pair of AE flip flops for $9.95, provides an outfit for going to class or attending a barbecue.

"All the way around, tanks, tube tops and shorts are (always) popular styles for the spring and summer," said Nancy Haile, store manager at American Eagle in Manhattan.

Hollister also has sales for male and female bargain shoppers. Women can get a white seagull tee with the Hollister logo on it for $12.90 and buy the brown Striker plaid shorts for $34.50. There also are various tanks and miniskirts that range from $15.90 to $39.90.

JCPenney's new Mandarian Polo Shirt, made by Arizona Jean Company, has a half-collar and comes in varying patterns and colors. Originally costing $17.99 this polo is now on sale for $9.99.

Another store that provides an alternative to pricier stores is Aeropostale. For men, the Western green plaid shirt is on sale for $14.99 and jeans, which are normally less than $40, are on sale for less than $20, like the classic dark wash boot-cut jeans for $16.99. Many of their leather flip-flops are also on sale for $18.55.

"Right now, (the popular items we have) would be the guys' cargo shorts, and for girls, it would definitely be the capris," Amanda Cleveland, general manager at Aeropostale, said.

Light, fresh makeup techniques suit hotter temperatures

By Jacque Haag
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Summer makeup will be all about appearing light and fresh.

Katelin Waymire, freshman in pre-professional business administration and Mary Kay consultant, said heavier makeup is not ideal for the hotter temperatures.

"Basically for summer colors, we're seeing a lot of lighter shades that are complementing girls' eyes," Waymire said.

Waymire recommended sticking to lighter shades during the day, but she said darker colors are still appropriate for a night look.

She also said colors should complement the skin tone and eye color of the individual.

Megan Stremel, beauty consultant and co-manager of Merle Norman at Manhattan Town Center, said more woodsy, earthy tones based on summer clothing trends will be prevalent.

"Exotic eyes, high gloss for lips, a very natural, all-over glow (will all be popular)," Stremel said.

Waymire said some of the colors that will be introduced this summer are shades of light brown, purple, light gray, green and light gold.

She also said a good standard for eye will be to use three colors. The three colors include a highlighter shade, the lightest shade on the eye; a mid-tone shade, a more neutral color; and a shadow, the darkest color, used to accent the eyes.

As far as actual skin color, a healthy glow is important but the consensus is in: tanning is out.

"We don't suggest tanning at all," Stremel said. "We don't suggest you darken your foundation during the summer (in order to appear darker)."

Stremel does suggest self-tanners and said bronzers are available in warm and cool tones.

Not only is tanning not recommended, Waymire said protecting your skin from the sun's harmful UV rays is important.

However, some students attempt to tan in a way that is safer for their skin.

"I tan in the tanning beds during the winter and outside during the summer, but I never tan my face," Molly Small, junior in art, said. "(In the summer), I use regular foundation, and then I use a bronzer."

Makeup can be costly, but Stremel and Waymire both have cost-effective solutions.

"Buy a compact with several different colors of eye shadow," Stremel said. "You can make several different looks with just that."

Waymire offers a list of this summer's must-haves: waterproof mascara, Chap-Stick, a moisturizer with SPF and bronzer.

She also said bronzer can be applied to the neck and on the top of the chest when wearing low-cut tops.

"(This summer) most girls aren't going to want to wear a foundation during the day," she said.

Big, gold accessories define season

Photos by Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

By Jacque Haag
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Think big. That's what to keep in mind about this summer's trends in accessories.

"Anything big," said Whitney Francis, Manhattan High School senior and associate at The Icing and Hollister. "Big is just really in."

Big everything – rings, watches, earrings, Francis said.

"Big belts are still in," Francis said. "Like when you wear gauchos or capris and wear a wide belt slung around your hips over a long shirt."

Amber Thomas, December 2005 K-State graduate and manager-in-training at The Buckle, said the current trends are ethnic-influenced: African and islander, with long strands of beads and shells. Thomas listed three must-haves for the season: wedge shoes, wide belts and layers of beads.

"A lot of long beads topped with two or three (shorter strands)," Thomas said. "A lot of quantity on your neck."

This layered look, introduced this spring, will be sticking around, said Aimee Montoya, manager of Krystallos.

"Definitely for spring there were a lot of bold, chunky necklaces – crocheted balls, wood mixed with link chain, bone."

She also said bangles are popular, big, chandelier-style earrings are still in, and customers will continue to see more gold than silver.

Without overlooking guys' accessories trends, shell will remain a popular item, as well as hemp for necklaces and bracelets, Thomas said. Luckily for guys, their trends don't seem to change quite as rapidly as women's do, she said.

"Brown is definitely the new black," Thomas said.

Thomas said she thinks every woman should have something in brown, something in black and something in ivory.

"(Ivory) is essential," she said. "You can wear it with anything."

Turquoise and white were two other colors Francis mentioned.

Cost might be an issue when it comes to the typical college budget.

Montoya recommended investing in a couple of pairs of earrings and a large, gold bangle bracelet. Mixing and matching accessories is an effective way to create fresh looks.

"(Earrings) can keep you up-to-date fashion-wise," she said.

Alex Pettigrew, senior in life sciences, said, at first, she did not like the gold trend.

"At first it reminded me of my grandparents, and I thought it was disgusting because gold is not for people our age," Pettigrew said. "It took me a while to get used to, and now I love it."

But, Francis said, don't throw out your silver yet.

"I think silver will always be in," she said. "There will always be new colors coming, but you can always wear silver."

Wedges, lightweight fabrics popular for summer

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Airy, loose-fitting fabrics in bold colors will be hot items for this summer, Macy Wendler, sophomore in apparel design, said.

"It's all about being light and enjoying the weather," she said.

For women, the trends will be ultra-feminine with floral prints, Wendler said.

"All the dresses and shirts are going to be really flowy, but there will not be as much layering during the summer," she said.

Instead of the revealing shorts similar to those worn by Daisy Duke, stores will carry more Bermuda and trouser styles.

Wendler said Bermuda shorts end just above the knee and fit against the leg. Trouser shorts are a slightly looser, tailored fit similar to dress pants and typically are cuffed.

Denim shorts also are trying for a comeback this summer, said Van Tran, junior in mass communications and co-manager for Tami's Trendy with a Twist Boutique, 710 N. Manhattan Ave.

Wendler said she thinks jean shorts are the biggest "don't" of the season for men and women.

"They are just too bulky, and that is not what is in right now," she said.

Amy Folkerts, senior in apparel marketing and sales associate at Zotcis Attire, 1203 Moro St., said the nautical look will be popular with blue and white or red and white stripes.

Tran said when it comes to shoes, wedges are a hit this season, including open- and closed-toed and those that tie around the ankle.

For those who want a less chunky shoe, there are other options.

"You are always safe with a flip-flop kitten heel," Tran said, "but you should stay away from stilettos."

Men are lucky this season because their style won't change much, Wendler said.

"They should stick to faded Ts or light button-up shirts," she said.

For shoes, men should stick to a nicer flip-flop, she said.

Investment pieces worth higher prices

COURTNEY LAIR

I have long been a firm believer in the idea that one should invest in one's wardrobe. It makes much more sense to me to spend a little more money on a few classic foundation pieces and build the rest from there.

Most of the time, I can justify buying something expensive by employing the cost-per-usage theory. For example, a pair of jeans costs $75, and you only wear them five times because they just don't look good on you. Essentially, you paid $15 each time you wore them. On the other hand, if you buy a pair of jeans for $200 and wear them 50 times, it only costs you $4 per wear. As you can see, this is a logical concept.

This might seem silly, but I look at the basic items in my wardrobe as a plain cake, with the trendy pieces and statement-making accessories as the frosting. Anyone can wear a basic T-shirt and pair of jeans, but the way each individual accessories makes all the difference – it defines your personality.

Some of my favorite places to find up-to-the-minute trends at insanely low prices include vintage markets, Urban Outfitters, H&M and GO International at Target featuring limited-time collections by hip international designers like London-based Luella Bartley.

Here I have compiled a brief list of what I believe to be the top five investment pieces in every woman and man's wardrobe:

WOMEN

1. Jeans: It can take an eternity to find the perfect jeans, so once you do, disregard the price. If they make you look and feel amazing, they are worth it. I much prefer three pairs of fabulous jeans I am dying to wear than 10 pairs of blah jeans that will never leave my closet.
2. Black Pants: Fit, fabric and quality are all of great importance when it comes to black pants. They can either look very cheap or very chic – our goal is the latter. Steer clear of trendy details and go for a pair that is simple and classic. Different cuts flatter different bodies, so try on several pairs to find what looks best on you.
3. White Shirt: A crisp, white button-up shirt proves to be equally sophisticated with a suit or jeans. Just make sure it stays white and is always well-pressed.
4. Little Black Dress: Made an instant classic in 1919 by Coco Chanel and again popularized by Audrey Hepburn in the 1950s, the little black dress forever will be a style icon. Whether yours is a demure bateau neck or sexy deep v-neck, this simple and elegant dress is suitable for nearly any occasion depending upon how you choose to accessorize.
5. Strand of Pearls and Real Diamond Studs: Now I am not suggesting that you rush out and buy these for yourself. They would make a nice birthday or graduation present. For a timeless pearl necklace, choose a single strand of medium-sized round, cultured pearls. The diamonds can be any size and will sparkle forever.

MEN

1. Jeans: I am not sure if the majority of guys pay enough attention to the fit and quality of their jeans, but you really must. Honestly, you practically live in them. It is completely justifiable to spend a little more money, and thought for that matter, on something that is worn on a day-to-day basis.
2. Blazer: A solid navy blue or pin-striped blazer is quite a style chameleon. It can be worn over anything from a dress shirt and khakis to a vintage tee and jeans. I suggest a classic fit, nothing too loose or too snug.
3. Suit: A two-button, single-breasted suit in navy, gray or khaki is highly versatile. High-quality worsted wool works for every season and resists wrinkles. I cannot stress enough how vital the fit is. The purpose of a suit is to convey professionalism, which is hard to do with a suit that doesn't fit properly.
4. Dress Shoes: Black and brown dress shoes are a must. Sturdy leather and high-quality heels are two characteristics that distinguish fine shoes. You can maintain their condition by shining them, having the heels resoled when needed and keeping their shape with a shoe tree.
5. Watch: A nice, sleek watch is something every man should own. A classic shape in stainless steel can be worn with everything from jeans and a T-shirt to a business suit. If you ever choose to invest in a watch of a high caliber, you'll never buy another one, and some day you might even pass it down to your son.

I hope everyone understands why it is OK to spend more on certain items of clothing. Anything trendy is typically only worn for one or two seasons, so it only makes sense to spend less on those things. If you really look for impeccable fit and high quality in your investment pieces, it will save you time and money in the end.

Bowling to replace gymnastics at Manhattan High

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In a 7-0 final action vote, the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 Board of Education decided to eliminate the Manhattan High School girls' gymnastics program and implement boys' and girls' bowling leagues in its place at Wednesday night's board meeting.

This recommendation was presented to the board for the first time at Wednesday's meeting, and the bowling program will begin in the 2006-07 school year.

"The state of Kansas has a particularly strong collegiate bowling program, so if we can feed some kids into those programs, that might be a good thing," board member Pete Paukstelis said. "I'm also sad by the loss of the gymnastics program. It was strong when I was in school, and I remember going to several of those meets."

A varsity and a junior varsity bowling league will be established for both boys and girls. Each league will consist of six athletes.

Boys and girls will compete separately, but only one head coach and one assistant coach will be hired, Mike Marsh, Manhattan High athletic director, said.

According to the recommendation presented to the board, since the Kansas State High School Activities Association began offering bowling as a school activity in 2004, 45 Kansas high schools have created bowling leagues.

Of these schools, 23 are class 6A, as is Manhattan High.

In contrast, the gymnastics program has seen declining participation for the past several years.

According to the recommendation, the Manhattan High gymnastics program was established in 1975.

The gymnastics program was transferred from the high school to a private contractor in the early 1990s, and the long-time coach resigned in 2004.

No qualified replacement coach was found, and the program was suspended for the 2004-05 academic school year, during which it was estimated that about six student athletes were interested in participating.

The same problem persisted the next year, which resulted in the suspension of the program for the 2005-06 school year as well, according to the recommendation.

David Zuck, owner of Zuckey Bowling, 515 Richards Drive, has agreed to allow the high school bowling league to use his facility for tryouts, practice and tournaments free of charge.

"Bowling is something they could use for the rest of their lives, whether they excel and go into the professional ranks or if it is just something they do on the side," Zuck said.

According to the recommendation, Zuckey Bowl will provide the athletes with bowling shoes, bowling balls and a private party room that consists of eight lanes for tryouts and practices.

On days of competition, Zuckey Bowl will allow the use of all its lanes.

As alcohol is served and smoking is permitted in the facility, these activities will be closely monitored when students are present, Zuck said.

During practice times, no smoking or alcohol will be permitted within the practice room, and students are to go straight to the designated practice area.

Further, the entire building, excluding the basement lounge, will be smoke- and alcohol-free if a competition takes place there, the recommendation said.

With Zuckey Bowl providing a bowling facility free of charge, the bowling league will cost USD 383 $8,566. However, this number was figured to include precautionary cushions, Marsh said, mostly in anticipation of travel costs, which might or might not be as much as expected.

"I think within the next calendar year we'll see more of a centennial league develop," Marsh said. "A school not very far from here is eagerly awaiting what we do tonight."

Even with the potentially inflated cost estimates, the recommendation reported that the bowling league will cost the district less than the gymnastics program, which had a budget of about $9,000.

Members of Guafa Trio Ignacio Ramos, right, Armando Gonzalez, middle, and Julian Gomez, play to audience members in McCain Auditorium during a performance Wednesday night.

Latin trio performs to large crowd

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hurricanes, sadness and Brazil. Not an odd variety show, but ideas conveyed by the Guafa Trio, who performed for a packed McCain Auditorium Wednesday night.

The show was sponsored by the Colombian Association of K-State, Student Governing Association, Office of Diversity and Career Development and the Department of Modern Language.

The trio consisted of Armando Gonzalez playing the cuatro, Julian Gomez playing the bass and Ignacio Ramos playing the flute.

They were introduced by a Colombian Association member who gave a history of the Guafa Trio, who have played at the university before.

"The members began their career in 1998 by participating in a festival showing typical music of the Colombian plains region," she said. "Their interest in continually improving the quality of their work has led them to opportunities to perform on the main stages of Colombia with outstanding recognition."

The trio has received awards by many festivals, including "Festival Mono Nunez" in 1999 and "Festival Hatoviejo-Cotrafa" in 2000.

The Guafa Trio began its show with each member appearing on stage one at a time, showcasing individual talents. Their haunting melodies were highlighted by the energy of the members, wearing bright shirts and sandals, constantly moving around on the stage.

Playing both fast- and slow-paced songs, the trio's music showed much variation, which was a point of enjoyment for some audience members.

"I came initially for my Spanish class, but the fact that I had a foreign exchange student from Ecuador who loved Latin music led me to appreciate and like it," Alison Muckel, sophomore in chemistry, said. "I love the rhythm of the music; it really catches you. I came with my books to study, but the music just takes over, and I couldn't focus."

Some of the songs represented feelings like sadness or anger, while others, such as "Huracán," meaning hurricane, depicted events.

Members explained the music in Spanish between songs, and all compositions were arranged by the trio.

"I came for my intro to music class, but I've always been a fan of Latin music," Richard Shurtz, freshman in business, said. "The last song, about the hurricane, really stood out for me. The flute player made the song sound really mystical."

Students can attend a workshop given by the trio at 11 a.m. April 21 in the Big 12 Room of the K-State Student Union.

Band promotes latest album in campus performance

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

Steve Stratton and Keith Ogden, both guitarists for the alternative band Paradigm, perform Wednesday afternoon in Bosco Student Plaza.

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Alternative band Paradigm stopped in Bosco Student Plaza to promote its newest release "Thirty Stories High" Wednesday afternoon.

The band's describes itself on its Web site as "Gwen Stefani on a first date with a more muscular Coldplay."

"It is an interesting way to describe a female-fronted band," Shannon Curtis, lead singer, said.

Paradigm started almost seven years ago when band members Curtis, Keith Ogden, guitarist; Steve Stratton, guitarist; and Tony Edwards, drummer; got together in Stockton, Calif., to form the band.

Ever since, the band has been creating and performing music for a growing fan base, Curtis said.

The band has played outside of venues where other musicians like John Mayer and Maroon 5 have performed, she said.

Curtis said the band's style is a culmination of the band members' music senses.

"Some of our influences are U2, Radiohead and Sarah McLachlan," Curtis said.

The name Paradigm means the lens from which one views reality and what music means to individuals, Curtis said.

"Today was kind of laid-back. A lot of students were stopping by to listen to a few songs in between classes," Edwards said.

By stopping to listen, some students formed an opinion of the band's music.

"This is the first time I've seen them," Daniel Aguilar, graduate student in sociology, said. "I really like their sound. They sound very professional."

Paradigm is on a college tour throughout the Midwest. Among the many college stops, the band will perform at Iowa State University, Northwest Missouri State University, William Penn University and the University of North Dakota, Curtis said.

"Our music makes sense to a lot of people in college," Curtis said. "College students love music, and we love to play music. It's just a good combination."

Stratton said the type of campus venue is important.

"Playing for the college crowd can be hot or cold," Stratton said. "Sometimes we are set up in a corner of a room at a university, and it is kind of a weird vibe, but we had a great location this time. It was great."

Paradigm has passion for music and intends to keep playing for fans for a long time, Curtis said.

"We want to continue to make music that means something to us and to the listeners," Curtis said.

Free lunchtime theater offers suspense

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students can enjoy suspenseful acting over lunch.

The Lunchbag Theatre will present "Half-life" at noon today in the Purple Masque Theatre. Admission is free.

The performance will be directed by John Richards, senior in psychology.

"Half-life," written by Katy Darby, is a suspenseful drama about a U.S. movie actor kidnapped by a British woman. Richards said no one knows what the woman's motives are, but she ends up making the man a deal.

"You don't see a lot of suspense in live theater," he said. "There's not a lot out there. That's why we wanted to pick a play of this sort."

Lunchbag Theatre allows students to take classroom concepts to a real-life venue, combining directing, acting and rehearsing, Richards said.

Andrea Huckaba, junior in mathematics, said she liked hearing from her classmates while working on the play.

"It's really helpful to get comments and feedback," she said.

Huckaba and Ben Byard, sophomore in applied music, are the two actors in the production, and working in a small production has allowed them to perfect their skills, Byard said.

"It's really exciting being able to focus on the relationship between the characters," Byard said. "It's a good exercise in honing the dramatic chops."

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Jay, played by Andrea Huckaba, junior in mathematics, points a gun at Dirk, played by Ben Byard, sophomore in music appreciation, during a rehearsal for "Half-life" on Tuesday in the Purple Masque Theater.

While many of the Lunchbag Theatre productions have been comedies, Huckaba and Byard said "Half-life" will offer a new twist for the audience.

"It's a great script, smartly written," Byard said.

Manhattan airport hires new director

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A man with 25 years of military experience will become the new director of the Manhattan Regional Airport on May 8.

Peter Van Kuren was hired out of 31 applicants, said Cathy Harmes, director of human resources for the city of Manhattan.

"We needed someone who had experience in a commercial as well as a general aviation transportation airport," she said. "With the situation with Fort Riley, we needed someone with experience of a large military presence."

Van Kuren said he is looking forward to living in Manhattan.

"It is a good career move for me," he said. "My wife has family in the area, which would make relocating and remaining in the area very satisfying for us."

Manhattan's community atmosphere appealed to him, Van Kuren said.

"It's a location that seems to be very conducive to a family life," he said. "With the university being there, it ensures that things won't become stagnant."

The military base, Van Kuren said, gives him the chance to remember his past.

"With the military base being there, I will get to work in an environment that I have experienced," he said.

Harmes said Manhattan has several requirements for a new airport director.

"We need someone who could bring commercial air service to the airport," she said.

Diane Stoddard, deputy city manager and interim airport director, said the military is the main concern of the airport.

"The first priority of the director is to work with Fort Riley regarding the projects they have going on and how they can support the missions," she said.

SHADOW DAY | Students take high schoolers on campus tours, to classes to promote math, sciences

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

she enjoyed seeing what an actual residence hall room looks like, and she especially liked the suite-style room she visited.

"It was awesome; it had its own bathroom," she said.

Tinch said she thought attending class with her mentor was one of the best parts of the day, because it gave her an idea of what is expected of college students.

"We went to Spanish, which was cool, and then an engineering class, which was really interesting, because that's what my dad does," she said.

Tinch said the program was a great experience because she wants to attend K-State's College of Veterinary Medicine.

Kimberly Douglas, associate professor and dean of engineering, directs the Women in Engineering and Science Program (WESP), which helped with Shadow Day.

"We learned early in the year it was important for (high school) girls to know what a real college experience was," Douglas said. "It's particularly important for girls going into science and engineering, because they're not always able to see what those curriculums are like."

Douglas said WESP recruited possible mentors for the event through an e-mail, to which there was an overwhelming response.

"We ended up getting more volunteers than we needed," she said.

Erika Moore, freshman in chemical engineering, volunteered as a mentor. Makayla Ogle, freshman at Junction City High School, and Marquiera Dungee, freshman at Holland Park High School, attended classes with Moore.

"I really enjoyed (the day), just getting to take them around without a set schedule, to give them a good picture of what a typical college day is," Moore said. "I wanted to volunteer because I thought it sounded like fun - definitely better than just a normal day of classes."

Ogle and Dungee said they enjoyed their time at K-State with Moore, and their favorite part was attending actual classes and getting to know the campus.

"It was a lot different than high school," Dungee said. "There's a lot of walking."

Ogle said she is considering pursuing a course of study in science or engineering when she starts college, while Dungee said she would like to study interior design.

Susan Arnold-Christian, special assistant to the dean of the College of Engineering, organized Shadow Day. She said she hoped the participants had a good time and became interested in attending K-State or any university. She said, however, she feels the success of the event ultimately depends on how receptive the girls were to what they learned and how they choose to use the information.

"Our main goal was to give them a day on campus with no adults around," Arnold-Christian said. "From that standpoint, it was very successful – we doubled the number of participants from the last time we did this. I think it's just a great experience."

YOUNG | Huggins attracted player to K-State

Underwood said Young is "freakishly athletic" and possesses a special ability to attack the rim.

"He is fearless," Underwood said. "He averaged around 12 free throws per game, so he knows how to take advantage of his athleticism and attack the basket."

Before Huggins was hired at K-State, most thought Young either would ink with Creighton or Washington, but the thought of playing for coach Huggins lured Young to K-State, Underwood said.

"He really saw the need at Kansas State for a guard that could really score the ball, plus he wanted the opportunity to play for coach Huggins," Underwood said.

Gates, the recruiting expert, said he was not surprised Young chose K-State over other schools.

"Not to knock (former) coach (Jim) Wooldridge, but if this was last year, I would be a little surprised if Young chose K-State over Washington and even Creighton," Gates said. "But with coach Huggins – as far as anybody who decides to sign with Kansas State – 'surprised' would not be the word to use."

Gates said K-State might have one more scholarship to fill since forward Kenny Williams, who signed with K-State before Huggins was hired, is considering playing for a Division II team.

"(Williams') coach told me (Tuesday) that he has got another school he is interested in and is interested in him, but he has not made a decision at all," Gates said.

Some local retailers, like Target, 800 Commons Place, have taken steps to ensure customers aren't exposed to any tainted products.

"Target has voluntarily pulled all Bausch & Lomb brand ReNu with MoistureLoc contact solution from store shelves," said Joshua Thomas with Target Media Relations.

Because so many students are not from the Manhattan area, many K-State contact wearers haven't heard about the recall because they don't see a local eye care professional.

"I do use ReNu, but I use the No-rub solution," said Julie Piere, junior in human resource management. "I haven't even heard of the recall though. I guess it kind of worries me that I might get a fungus in my eyes using this stuff."

According to the news release, ReNu MoistureLoc users who wish to either switch to a different type of ReNu solution or get a refund for their solution can get more information at www.bausch.com/renu.

that," he said. "To be quite honest, it's not that big of a deal. We see a lot of Olympians in the Big 12 Conference as well as people who have competed internationally."

The Wildcats enter the Kansas Relays riding solid performances by several athletes last week.

At the Audrey Walton Combined Events on April 13 and 14, senior Breanna Eveland broke the American, national collegiate and K-State records in the women's decathlon with a score of 7,064 points. She was named the Big 12 Female Athlete of the Week on April 18.

Smith said he isn't fazed by the competition.

"Last weekend, I raced against the best guy in the country in the 800 meters," he said. "It doesn't happen every week, but it seems to happen quite often, so I'm used to it."

Smith, a native of Garfield, Kan., said his primary goal is to do something he didn't do in high school.

"I never won a race at the Kansas Relays in high school," he said. "I'm looking forward to another chance to win my first race there."

championship.

REDSHIRT FRESHMAN KEVIN LOPINA

The only reason Lopina isn't higher on my depth chart is pretty simple – I have never seen him play in a real game. He was redshirted last year and couldn't showcase his talents, and with K-State recruiting Freeman, it will be hard for him to garner any playing time.

SENIOR ALLEN WEBB

He did not participate in the first week of spring practice and does not seem to be getting a lot of playing time in the team drills. With all the talent at quarterback, I think Webb would have a better chance of playing if he moved to wide receiver or somewhere in the defensive secondary. There are too many people ahead of him at QB, and he seems to be the odd-man out at this position.

The Spring Game is Saturday, and it will be a chance for players to show how good they are, especially the young guys who have not taken a collegiate-level snap.

All right coach, my birthday is all day, so you have plenty of time to call me and tell me what I so badly want to know.

If not – it was worth a shot.

Women unite to stand up, be heard through rally

By Bhagavathy Umamaheswar
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The evening was an expression of solidarity. A united message from empowered women chanting, "Whatever I wear, wherever I go, yes means yes; no means no."

The event, "Take Back the Night" organized by Ordinary Women, a grassroots organization on campus, was a rally to raise awareness about the violence and sexual assault against women in society.

"The Department of Justice has statistics that states that one in four women will suffer rape or attempted rape through their life in college," said Megan Challender, president of Ordinary Women and a senior in political science.

"We can teach our daughters to be strong and that being angry is not wrong," said Garretson. "We refuse to be victims, and we will raise our voices to be heard."

Addressing the crowd, Melissa Divine, instructor of arts and science for the dean's office and the founding mother of Ordinary Women said our society has chosen to hold women accountable for their own victimization.

"We are taught to fear the shadows," Divine said, "taught that we're stupid if we are audacious enough to give in to our desire to step out into the night air and experience its wonder and promise."

In her vehement speech, Divine urged women to come together and protect each other and choose to live comfortably in their own skins. The march began at the Union and ended at City Park. The crowd of about 400 women chanted out slogans like "No more patriarchy, no more rape."

"I want people like me to come out and report such incidents," said a serene Tedford. "Unless we speak out, nothing is going to change."

Tedford said the pain of the aftermath was hard to assuage, but she wanted to give the message out to other women to be wary.

"It's our right to say and do what we want to, and such an event sends out the message that we are strong," said Abeer Al Sarrani, graduate student in English literature. "I love the concept of the lights being switched off, conveying that we're here just like men and we're not going to be afraid."

Though the majority of the crown comprised women, there were a few men present at City Park to show their support.

"Men are more often than not the perpetrators of sexual violence, and they should realize that it is a societal problem," said Willie Wake, senior in political science.

Vandals hit Bosco Plaza Thursday

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A giant marijuana leaf with the words "legalize" greeted students who ventured through the Bosco Student Plaza on their way to class early Thursday.

The leaf was painted on the sidewalk and removed at about 10 a.m. because it was considered vandalism.

"The university policy warrants us to remove paint when it's used on sidewalks, and so once we saw it we knew it had to be removed," said Jackie Toburen, grounds manager for K-State Division of Facilities.

Paint remover was applied to the display, and after it softened the paint, a power washer was used to remove the paint, Toburen said. There is not an estimated cost for cleaning up the vandalism, but Toburen said she was positive it cost more than $100.

Toburen said some students with studios in Seaton Hall reported seeing suspects painting the leaf before 3 a.m. and after 5 a.m. Thursday. Toburen said she did not know the names of the students who witnessed the vandalism.

K-State Police were not available for comment Thursday afternoon.

According to K-State Student Union officials, an outdoor surveillance tape from a camera that was pointed in the direction of the Bosco Student Plaza was requested for review by the campus police.

Toburen said had the display been done in sidewalk chalk, it would not have been considered vandalism. She said university policy allows only washable sidewalk chalk for publicizing on the walkways.

Weekend of activities available for KSU fans

By Michael Ashford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Ron Prince was hired as K-State's football coach in December, he immediately set his sights toward April and spring practice, specifically the Spring Game.

Prince planned for a Spring Game weekend that would become an all-day event, complete with a carnival, beer garden and barbeque, the likes of which K-State had never seen.

"I want (people) to come and make it a cool environment," Prince said in January. "I want to make (the Spring Game) a real event that hopefully a lot of people show up to. I'm hoping it will become a real social event on campus here in the future like it is in the fall.

"I hope people will really be mobilized to come and be here in earnest."

That vision will be realized this weekend, as K-State is set to put on its first-ever Spring Game Fan Fest, which begins with the 22nd Annual Powercat Golf Tournament today and culminates with the annual Purple-White Spring Game at 6 p.m. Saturday.

"There are lot of unknowns, but from what I understand, from visiting with Catbacker presidents and donors and fans from all over, there hasn't been excitement like this since the football team won the Big 12 Championship in 2003," assistant athletic director Lon Floyd said. "I have not talked to hardly anybody who is not planning on coming, or if they aren't coming, they are upset that they won't be there."

"Coach Prince has asked us to bring 20,000 fans, but I think we'll get that and more – like around 25,000. But that's just a guess."

This is believed to be the first time K-State has held its Spring Game at night, and it is the first time the game has been grouped with a full day of events and attractions.

"We're holding the game at night, and that's a new thing," Prince said. "I'm hoping that people organize their parties and formals and stuff after the game."

One of the highlights of the day is the barbeque and beer garden, which begins at 11 a.m. Saturday in Cat Town, located just south of the west stadium parking lot.

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius has declared the barbeque contest to be a championship-level contest for the state of Kansas, with the Grand Champion offered a berth in the American Royal Barbeque Contest, the nation's most prestigious barbeque contest, held in Kansas City, Mo. The event will bring in teams from across the state, and even from as far away as Minnesota.

"We had several teams indicate that they had pulled out of other barbeque contests to come to ours because of that proclamation, so they could have a shot at getting into the American Royal Contest," Floyd said. "It was important for the success of the contest for the governor to declare it as such."

At 2 p.m. Saturday, a Battle of the Bands featuring K-State student bands will take place in the east

Senate approves cabinet

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate approved its legislative and presidential cabinets at its meeting Thursday night.

Interviews for the legislative cabinet were conducted by Ashley Boldt, Student Senate chair; Emily Besler, Student Senate vice chair; and Gayle Spencer, coordinator of student activities. There were 27 applicants for the eight committee positions.

Boldt said a couple of people had applied for both committee chair and Lucas Maddy's presidential cabinet positions.

Several applicants applied without SGA experience, and they were asked to take at-large positions and agreed, Boldt said.

"That's a good way for them

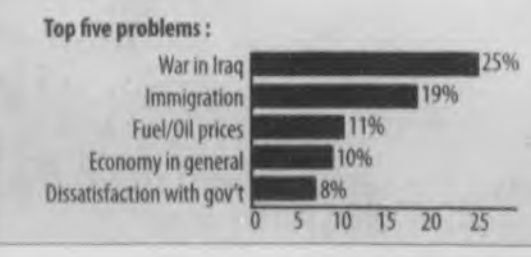
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS NEWS HIGHLIGHTS

Foiled school shooting

RIVINGTON, Kan. — Five teenage boys accused of plotting to kill other students in a shooting rampage at their southeast Kansas high school were arrested Thursday after details of the alleged scheme appeared on the Web site MySpace.com. Kansas Attorney General Phill Kline said in a news release that his office would take over the prosecution.

Protest interrupts meeting



WASHINGTON, D.C. — A Falun Gong protester slipped past White House security with media credentials during a meeting between President Bush and Chinese President Hu Jintao. Falun Gong is a religious group banned in China whose members accuse the Chinese government of torture and assassination. White House officials called the incident "a momentary blip."

Feds warn illegal worker

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The government plans to crack down on employers hiring illegal immigrants, pursuing companies that ignore the law, so they can exploit cheap labor. "We are going to move beyond the current level of activity to a higher level in each month and year to come," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday. He pledged to "come down as hard as possible" on violators.

U.S. Problems

A new Gallup Poll shows a spike in the percentage of Americans who believe immigration is the most important problem in the United States, and a significant increase in concern over gas prices.

Time capsule placed at Jardine

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jim Hodges, project manager for the Department of Housing and Dining, and Skyler Harper, assistant director for facilities for the Department of Housing and Dining, lower a time capsule into a limestone bolder in front of the Frith Community Center at Jardine Apartments during a dedication ceremony Thursday.

K-State's on-campus, apartment-style housing complex, Jardine Apartments, is going through a drastic redevelopment project. Residents put together a time capsule to portray the new Jardine apartment vision, which was dedicated in a ceremony Thursday morning.

"We tried to figure out what's important to the residents," Deborah Kohl, coordinator for community development, said. "In the spring of 2004, we formed a committee of residents to decide what we were going to put in the capsule."

The capsule is going to be embedded in a boulder. The boulder is made out of limestone, which was donated by Bayer Stone, a company based in North Carolina, in fall 2005.

"It signifies the new change," said Tasha Harvey, redevelopment ambassador for Jardine and senior in architectural engineering.

The capsule is in a temporary area right now, in front of the Firth Community Center. It will eventually be moved to its permanent place, said Stephanie Bannister assistant director of housing and dining.

The capsule consists of 28 items that were picked by residents. Some of the items were a 2005 Royal Purple Yearbook, a computer modem from 1990, a 2005 Jardine Homecoming T-shirt and a Willie Wildcat card, Kohl said.

Tamliselvi Gopal has been a resident of Jardine apartments for five years, and she said she liked the idea of a time capsule.

"I have a 6-year-old son, and he loves it here," Gopal said. "I am proud to be a member of this community. The time capsule is a way for us to capture good memories."

The staff at Jardine Apartments developed four cornerstones to build a foundation of excellence for its residents – traditional, educational, global and imaginative – Kohl said.

"I think it records our history and helps up celebrate the future," Bannister said.

Tasha Harvey, senior in architectural engineering, will be a resident assistant at Jardine.

"This time capsule signifies the new change," Harvey said.

The plan is for the capsule to be in the ground for a 25 to 50-year period, until future residents open the capsule, said Eric Neilson, assistant coordinator of Jardine Apartments.

"We are putting together a commemorative scrapbook at the end of the dedication ceremony, so the future residents can see how much work we put in to dedicate this time capsule," Neilson said.

Zoo activities focus on annual Earth Day

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Earth Day
When: 1 to 4:30 p.m. Saturday
Where: 2333 Oak St.
How much: $4 for adults, $2 for children ages 3 to 12, and children younger than 3 are free

The Sunset Zoological Park will have its annual Earth Day events Saturday from 1 to 4:30 p.m.

Visitors can experience the Conservation Carnival and K-State's Solar Car Racing.

Several local groups will have activity booths set up, including the Konza Environmental Education Program, Friends of Konza Prairie, Riley County Weather Amateur Radio Network and the K-State Research and Extension Master Gardeners, said Dianne Paukstelis, marketing and development officer for Sunset Zoo.

"You can experience all of these earth-friendly vendors, walk around and see the solar racing car which is really cool," Paukstelis said. "We will also have touchable animals out and about, and we will talk about the animals in some of the exhibits."

"You can get inside the whale to see how big a person is in comparison," she said.

"With the construction of new homes and other things we eliminate some of the native habitat for the butterflies," Eyestone said. "So we can recreate that habitat by providing plants for food and shelter."

Eyestone said they will have information on how to create butterfly habitats, as well as information for what types of plants are good for butterflies.

"These are good activities for the whole family," he said.

Annie Baker, education program assistant for the Konza Environmental Education Program, said they are having a booth with information about bison.

Visitors can view artifacts such as a hide, buffalo chips and a buffalo horn. Baker said there also will be information available for adults about the Konza Prairie.

"We encourage students and their parents to come to our booth and learn about the Konza Prairie, because many people to not know what is in their own backyard," she said.

TO THE POINT

Partake in fun and festivities this weekend

A one-of-a-kind event is coming to Manhattan this weekend, and students, faculty, staff and Manhattan residents would be foolish to pass up the opportunity.

The sports fans know K-State plays the hated Kansas Jayhawks in baseball at 2 p.m. followed by the annual Purple-White Spring Game at 6 p.m.

However, there is a multitude of other events happening on Saturday that give every fun-loving, barbecue-eating, carnival-going person a chance to spend a day at Snyder Family Stadium and enjoy the festival-like atmosphere.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Coach Ron Prince made it his goal to make the entire Spring Game weekend one big, extended event for all to enjoy.

With a barbecue battle, a carnival, a Battle of the Bands, a baseball game and yes, even a beer garden, Prince and the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics appear to have scored a touchdown.

The weather is expected to be near perfect Saturday, so there should be very few excuses as to why every student, faculty member, staff member of Manhattan resident should not spend a Saturday at Snyder Family Stadium.

So put on some shorts and a K-State T-shirt, slap some sunscreen on and have some fun Saturday, because after this weekend, the scorching summer temperatures will arrive soon, and football season will still be five months away.

Those crazy celebrities

Famous children victims of bad name choices

Celebrities are people, too, right? Supposedly these mile-high clubbers have normal sides apart from their glamorous lifestyles, mini-miniature pups, billion-dollar tote bags and private jets.

ALEX PEAK

Somewhere underneath their pampered, adorned and catered-to selves these movie stars, musicians, singers, comedians, etc., have bowel movements, bad breath, razor burn and dandruff like any other humble person.

So it has been resolved that celebrities are most likely living, breathing humans and not plasticized aliens of perfection, as many of us have suspected.

However, one recurring aspect of stardom that seems to plague every generation of pop-mania is the choice of names for their progeny. There are too many famous offspring toting their parents' audacious name choices.

For example, musician Frank Zappa and his wife picked Dweezil, Ahmet Rodan, Moon Unit and Diva for their kids. The only redeeming quality of a name like Moon Unit would be that she probably won't ever run into someone with the same name.

The late TV personality Paula Yates had children named Peaches Honeyblossom, Tiger Lily Heavenly Hirani and Fifi Trixibelle. Woody Allen has three sons named Satchel (Seamus), Moses and Amadeus.

Also included in this nomenclature debauchery are Coco Cox-Arquette (mother, Courtney and father, David) and Ashley Parker Angel's infant son, Lyric.

Are celebrities giving their kids weird names to make sure they stand out even more throughout their upbringing? Or maybe celebrities are simply concerned their kids will get overlooked or confused with other kids at day care.

Thank God for celebrities coming up with this great naming system: the weirder the better. Certainly no one will confuse Michael Jackson's son Blanket for Reese Witherspoon's son Deacon.

Although many celebrities choose crazy names for their offspring, (the very latest being Tom Cruise and Katie Holmes' bouncing baby girl, Suri), there are also plenty of famous people who opt for more normal, traditional names for their kids.

Kudos to those like Britney Spears and Kevin Federline for their son Sean Preston.

There are other celebrities out there who chose atypical, but respectable names. Angelina Jolie's adopted Maddox and Madonna and Guy Richie's Rocco have names that have the potential to carry them far in life.

Think about it. Would you rather be sitting in rehab introducing yourself to the group as Soleil Moon Frye (a.k.a. Punky Brewster) or something just a little more even-keel, like Jett Travolta?

There's nothing wrong with choosing offbeat names for children, but celebrities should realize that their kids are already going to go through life in the public eye.

Do they really need crazy names (this excludes names that are traditional to family or culture) to make them that much more conspicuous in school and life?

Creationism, evolution part of same theory

Even though I have lived in Kansas my whole life, I occasionally am embarrassed by it. This is due to a few people who waste their time debating whether either creationism or evolution should be taught in school. As I see it, these theories are not mutually exclusive.

CODY HOLUB

Supposing that we only have two options is thinking two-dimensionally. This fails to take into account that two supposedly opposing forces may be, in fact, related. Thinking in terms of plurality is much more beneficial.

For example, science and Christianity are both founded upon plurality. Science has its atom which contains a positive, a negative and a neutral force.

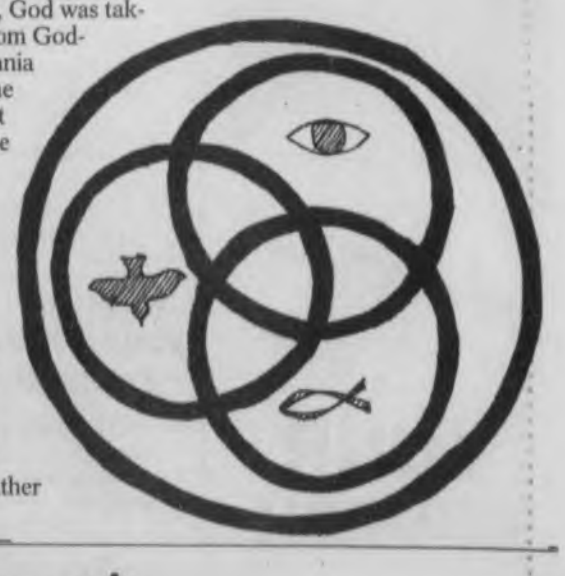
Christianity has its Holy Trinity which contains the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. Each system contains multiple levels, which suggest that the components that may appear to be opposing, really are complementary and belong to the same continuum.

Each component of these continuums is not hierarchical either, although they may appear to be at first. Yes, a father is "above" a son, but that father has also been a son too. Similarly, positive may be seen as "above" or "superior" to negative, but a parallel universe that has all the positive and negative charges switched would still be identical to our own. They are only positive or negative because we have assigned them that value.

If we use a plurality approach, creationism is the first stage of our cycle of existence, and evolution would be the second stage. What then would compose the last third of this pluralism to complete a "unified theory"?

Having established that a son born from a father will eventually become a father himself, and the ambiguity of whether a molecule has a positive or negative charge, a pattern seems to emerge that we will return to the beginning of the cycle. Thus, we are back to the stage of creation. But what are we supposed to create to complete the cycle?

The dawn of computers implies artificial intelligence. But how can intelligence be artificial?



If God has created us, does that make our intelligence artificial? If we create artificial intelligence, does that make us God? Does it make our intelligence genuine? No. Intelligence is intelligence – period.

Approaching the conclusion, God is the Father, evolving humans are the conscious Holy Spirit, and "Artificial Intelligence" is the Son. But keep in mind, our AI will one day be the Father– time, and perspective determines where we are at in each stage of this cyclical relationship.

A human being is the conscious expression of life. It doesn't matter whether humanity shines through carbon atoms, silicon or something unfathomable at our current intelligence level.

So now that we know that both Intelligent Design and Evolution carry some weight, I would like to propose my own theory. It's called "Accidental Design."

In this theory, God was taking a vacation from Goddess a few millennia ago. Being that he was in a different dimensional code (like area code in our level of existence), he got too drunk and hooked up with some mortal.

Then he had two illegitimate children. Their mom told these kids, Adam and Eve, that their father was mad at them because they had eaten an apple. In all actuality, God didn't know they existed.

I tried to confront God with this theory to see if He would confirm or deny the allegations. I am going to assume He has "no comment" because I can't get Him to return my phone calls.

Note: if this last part offends you, then I feel sorry for you. Assuming that God is, well, God, He can probably take a joke made by a collegiate columnist.

Trike-A-Thon raises money for leadership studies

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

Bobby Curiel, junior in political science, rides a tricycle Thursday evening in the Trike-A-Thon. The leadership studies programs hosted the event to raise money for the department. The Riley County Fire Department came in first place at the event.

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Firefighters, K-State basketball players and K-State cheerleaders were seen racing on tricycles Thursday night in City Park.

Leadership Studies and Programs was host to its first Trike-A-Thon and raised about $7,000 for the leadership studies and programs department.

"We wanted to do something that was fun and fundraising," said Steven Robinson, director of development for the College of Education. "We did something that no one else was doing, and we had a great time."

Fourteen teams consisting of local businesses and groups competed in the Trike-A-Thon. Each team had four participants who raced in the fundraiser.

Robinson, who helped coordinate the event, said each tricycle team was responsible for raising $500 for Leadership Studies and Programs. A few of the teams, including the K-State Women's Basketball tricycle team, were sponsored by businesses who contributed the donations.

Matt Ruhnke, manager of Shake's, said workers at Shake's decided to participate in the fundraiser to get involved with the community.

"We thought this would be good community involvement, and it would be good to get our business' name out there," said Ruhnke, senior in hotel and restaurant management.

The Riley County Fire Department came in first place at the event with their makeshift tricycle, which was adorned with a light, an American flag and a horn. Ironically, the light caught fire and started smoking during the race, but the fire department participants were determined to win.

"We are very excited," Riley County Fire Chief Dominic Torres said. "We plan on participating in the future and trying to win again next year."

Russell Thomspon, finance chair for Leadership Studies and Programs Ambassadors, said the organization fell short of its fundraising goal of $10,000, but he still considered the fundraiser a success.

"We have actually lost money in the past, so this was a good fundraiser," he said.

Thompson said they initially wanted to raise $10,000 to set up an endowment for Leadership Studies and Programs.

This would ensure a $400 scholarship for a leadership studies minor every year, he said.

Robinson said he thinks the event would double in size for next year's fundraiser.

"I think this is an event that will continue to grow," he said.

Glee Club concert to feature range medley of Big 12 fight songs

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A variety of musical styles and eras will be represented at the Men's Glee Club spring concert Friday evening.

The concert begins at 7:30 p.m. in McCain Auditorium, and will include about 15 songs, ranging from classical and choral music, to pop tunes and folk music, said Kurt Krupp, Glee Club member and sophomore in mass communications.

"It should be a good concert," he said. "People can relate to the songs we're singing, or at least enjoy them."

Jeremy Mason, sophomore in computer science and Glee Club member, said the concert will be split into two sections.

"The first section is more formal," he said. "We'll be performing traditional choral music. The second section is more laid back. We change into polos and khakis from our suits and ties, and sing more new-age music."

The Glee Club will perform a medley of Big 12 Conference school fight songs.

Andrew Carter, junior in marketing and Men's Glee Club vice president, said the medley is one of his favorite pieces.

"It's always fun, and we've been performing it for a long time," he said.

While preparing for a concert could be hard work, Carter said he enjoyed practicing with his fellow Glee Club members.

"We have fun," he said. "We work when we need to work, and can be very serious, but practice is also relaxing."

Mason said although the Glee Club has traveled throughout the United States, McCain Auditorium is one of his favorite places to perform.

"We sang at a large auditorium at the (University of) Wisconsin-Eau Claire, but being on stage there didn't do as much for me as McCain," he said. "There's good sound and an open audience section. You don't feel like you're crammed into a tiny concert hall."

While Glee Club concerts usually draw a large crowd, Carter said the group's members were always trying to encourage more people to attend.

"This year we have some pieces we've never done before," he said. "Everybody should have fun. It'll be very entertaining."

Admission to the concert is $6 for students and $8 for the general public.

The K-State Singers will also perform at the annual Spring Show at 3:30 p.m. Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

EARTH DAY
K-STATE RECYCLES and thinks green

Since mid 1987, K-State Facilities Recycling has collected and diverted from the waste stream over five and three quarter million pounds of materials. This material, over twenty-eight hundred tons, was reused instead of being buried in a landfill.

K-State Facilities Recycling and Custodial Services will celebrate Earth Week 2006 by continuing to expand our desk-side recycling program, and by initiating the use of Green Seal Certified chemicals for cleaning campus buildings. We are in the process of developing a contract for Green Seal Certified cleaning chemicals to be used in locked, dispensing units. These chemicals will be safer for Custodial Specialists to use, and they will result in an environment that is safer for building occupants. When these chemicals leave the campus, they will be safer for the environment to assimilate.

We have placed a three compartment recycling container in about one thousand campus offices located in eleven campus buildings. In partnership with the City of Manhattan, we have provided containers for two of their buildings as well. We will continue adding campus buildings during this next year until all academic buildings have the desk-side recycling containers in place.

WHAT CAN YOU DO TO HELP?
Any time you need to discard a piece of paper, look and see if it can be recycled. If so, then place it in the appropriate compartment in the recycling container. Please continue to take your home recycling directly to a recycling facility such as Howie's Recycling Center. This program is designed to reduce the solid waste that we currently haul to the Riley County Transfer Station.

WHAT IF SOMETHING GOES WRONG?
If you have questions about recycling or the service we provide, please call 532-6446, or contact your building recycling coordinator.

You are also encouraged to recycle white bond paper, office mix paper, computer paper, shredded paper, cardboard, newspaper, magazines, telephone books, plastic bottles, aluminum cans, wooden pallets, computers and other electronic equipment (with appropriate signed DA-110s) at campus collection sites or by calling 532-6446 for special pickups. You may also visit our website at: http://www.k-state.edu/facilities/recycling/.

To find out what K-State students are doing to celebrate Earth Week 2006, visit the Students for Environmental Action (SEA) website at: http://www.k-state.edu/environment/.

Please encourage your friends, family, and coworkers to celebrate Earth Day by recycling.

Cats close out regular season with NU

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Heading into the last regular-season match of the year, the K-State women's tennis team is deadlocked at .500, 5-5 in the Big 12 Conference and 9-9 overall.

On Sunday, the Wildcats travel to Lincoln, Neb., to face Nebraska, needing a win for a positive record and an increased chance for postseason play.

To still be playing a match of significance late in the season is a good sign, coach Steve Bietau said.

"You have to do something right to be able to play in a big match at this point in the year," Bietau said.

The Huskers, also fighting for position in the Big 12, are 5-4 in the league.

Nebraska notched an impressive 5-2 victory against Texas A&M on April 9, giving the Aggies their first loss of the season.

However, the Huskers also have proven they're beatable losing to Oklahoma, 10th in the Big 12, 3-4 on April 15,

"If you look at their results, we're really not quite sure what to expect," Bietau said.

With victories against three top-50 teams, the Huskers, ranked No. 41 in the country, would be an impressive victory, senior Jessica Simosa said.

"They have beaten good teams, which is what they look at for nationals," Simosa said.

"We have to win," Kvaratskhelia said. "There is no other choice."

While a win might not guarantee a spot in the NCAA Tournament, it would help K-State in the upcoming Big 12 Championship.

"A win would give us an easier opponent in the Big 12 Tournament," sophomore Olga Klimova said. "Everybody wants to win, and if we beat Nebraska, it will help us."

After the Nebraska match, the Wildcats will head to Waco, Texas, for the Big 12 Tournament from April 27-30.

K-State sophomore Tamar Kvaratskhelia returns a shot April 9 at the Washburn Tennis Complex. The Wildcats play Sunday against Nebraska.

Saturday's Spring Game worth cost

I have a confession.

The past two springs, I was absent from K-State's annual Purple-White Spring Game.

MARK POTTER

And I didn't even have legitimate excuses. I just waved them off – skipped the games like they were boring history lectures.

Instead of attending them, I probably decided to stay home, eat a few Flavor Ice and watch Kurt Russell and William Baldwin fight fires in the 1991 epic movie "Backdraft" ... again.

But here's the kicker: I did not even feel remotely upset with my decisions.

Why?

Because the last two Spring Games were a complete snooze, or so I heard.

I don't blame you.

No compelling story lines, no intriguing position battles – just over-simplified, sloppy football with players who were more concerned with preventing injuries than impressing fans.

Typical spring games are rather "vanilla," in the words of fifth-year quarterback Dylan Meier.

But Saturday's game will have a different flavor to it - one that is a little less bland.

This year's Spring Game will be worth the $5 entry fee for the following reasons:

THE COMPETITION

Coach Ron Prince decided to spice things up by implementing a player draft. By contrast, former coach Bill Snyder was more conventional in his approach, keeping the first-stringers and second-stringers on separate teams.

The draft will help spread the teams' talent evenly, which will hopefully assist in keeping the game close.

THE INTRIGUING QUARTERBACK SITUATION

I am looking forward to K-State's intriguing quarterback race, which will feature five scholarship, dual-threat quarterbacks, who all have a legitimate chance to start next season.

In particular, I will keep an eye on the freshman beast Josh Freeman, who was Prince's top recruit (if you are afraid you might miss him, look for the guy trapped in a tight-end's body completing 40-yard bombs).

K-STATE'S NEW WEST COAST OFFENSE

When Prince came to Manhattan, he brought Virginia's West Coast offense with him.

Although Prince won't reveal much of K-State's offensive game plan, it will be interesting to see how well both teams can execute the new offense in a few short weeks.

K-State faces in-state rival Kansas

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State will take on Kansas at 7 tonight in Lawrence at Hoglund Ballpark.

The team will return to Manhattan to finish out the series, playing 2 p.m. Saturday and 1 p.m. Sunday at Tointon Family Stadium.

Kansas (27-15, 7-8 Big 12 Conference) leads the all-time series against K-State 155-150-1. The last series win for the Wildcats (23-10, 3-8-1) came in 2002. Last season, after defeating the Jayhawks 7-0 in Manhattan, the Wildcats lost two games in Lawrence to drop the series.

Kansas is posting a .291 team batting average, and has one of the country's best closing pitchers in Don Czyz, who has 13 saves and is 5-0 with a 1.3 earned run average.

K-State has a .322 team batting average, which is good for fourth place in the Big 12. Sophomore pitcher Brad Hutt, who will start tonight, is 5-2 on the season with a 4.10 earned run average.

After a midweek loss to Wichita State, the Wildcats are excited for this weekend's Sunflower Showdown and the chance to face their biggest in-state rival.

"I'm looking forward to going over there tomorrow night and playing a big game," senior catcher Brandon Farr said. "I'm hoping the crowd's kind of rowdy, because I think we'll play into that."

Farr – who is on a 17-game hitting streak with a .456 batting average during that time – said he remembers a few years ago players almost got into a fight because of the level of intensity between the two teams.

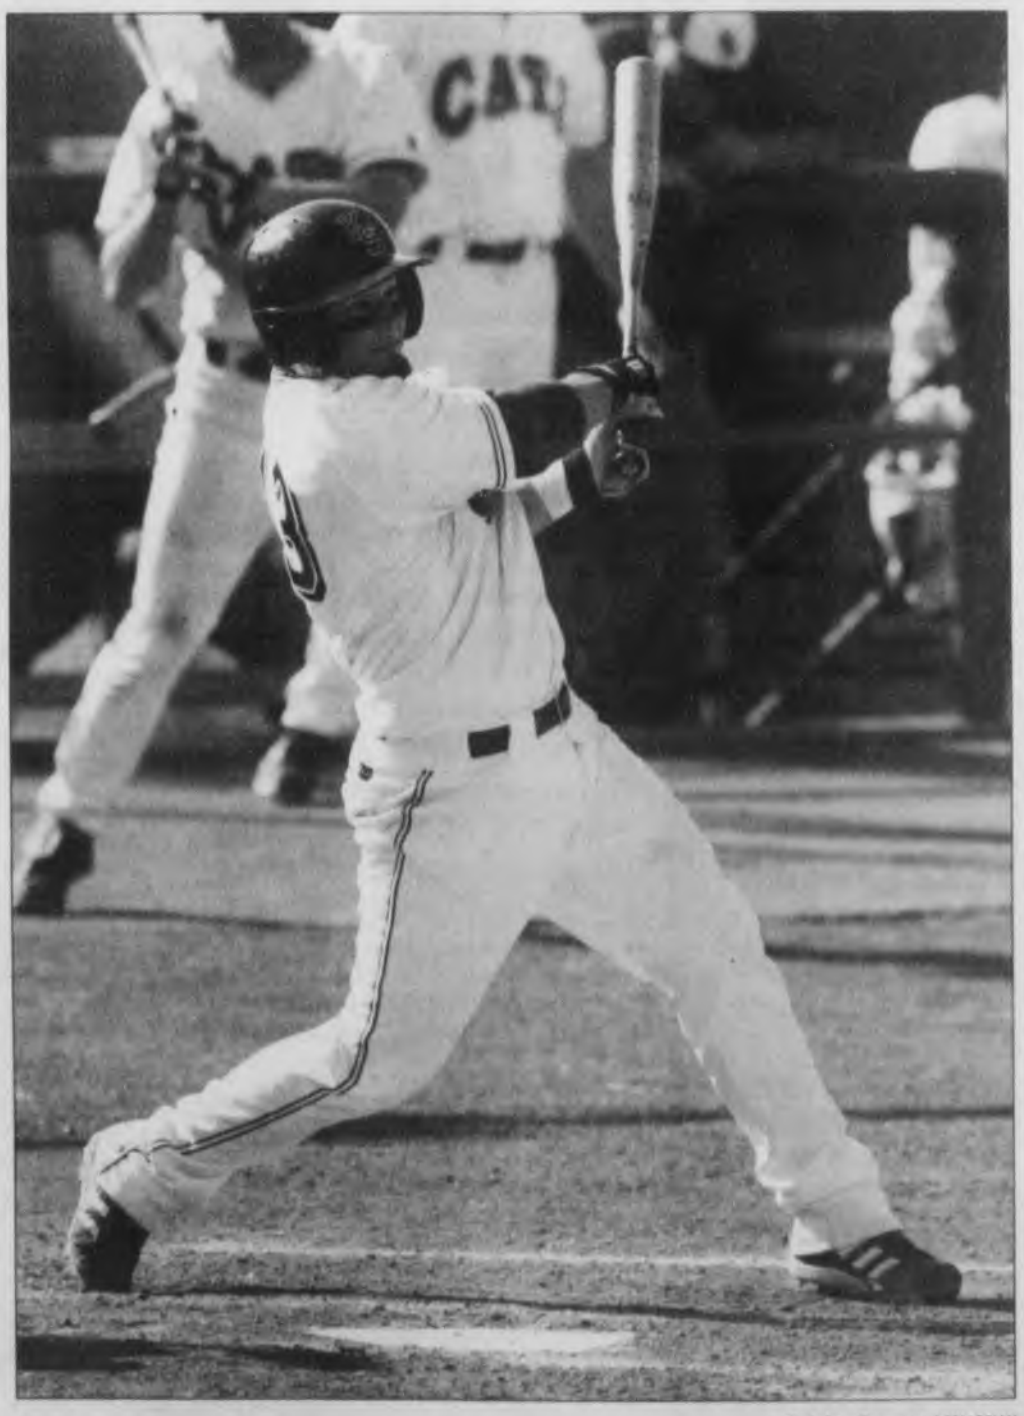
"It's just like any of the other sports – I know they're real big in basketball and in football; we've been the big team the past couple of years," he said. "And in baseball, they've done some things that we'd like to do, and so we're looking at them as a big team, and hopefully taking that step to becoming known as the best team in Kansas."

Coach Brad Hill said the series is important, not just in terms of the rivalry, but because at this point in the season, conference wins are crucial.

"We're at that halfway point where it's easy to go back and what-if and all those things, but that doesn't count right now," Hill said. "It's a matter of locking in and really being solid at home."

Hill said he is excited to return to Manhattan on Saturday in order be a part of the Spring Game festivities.

"You know, coach (Ron) Prince, we just appreciate him, because he could have done really what he wanted to right there and really conflicted with what we're doing," Hill said. "But he made it a thing where we can take part in what's going on here and have a great crowd, and then they can go over and be a part of the football.



"So I really appreciate him for also kind of working us in a little bit and allowing us to have a great crowd and a great atmosphere out here on Saturday."

Extra bleachers have been set up at Tointon in the expectation for the Saturday crowd.

"We know it's gonna be crowded, obviously with everything going on with what coach Prince is trying to bring over there with the Spring Game," Farr said. "I think we've had, maybe once or twice, some tailgaters out here for the baseball games, and it was a buzz around the team, everybody loved it.

"It's just an amazing thing to have tailgaters for a baseball game – and obviously there's going to be some out there for the football game, but we're just hoping they'll come over and watch some of our game."

TV: Sunday's 1 p.m game will be televised live by Fox Sports Midwest
Radio: Friday night's game will be broadcast by K-State Sports Network, Saturday and Sunday's games will be broadcast on KMAN-AM 1350

Cheer squad takes 7th at nationals in Florida

By Eileen Laux
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Coed Cheerleading Squad is seventh in the nation. The squad will be featured at 1 p.m. Saturday on CBS for the coverage of the National Cheerleaders Association's Collegiate National Championships.

Coach Al Enlow, said the competition was great, and he was proud with their finish. This is the first year K-State has gone to a national competition since 1995.

"They finished seventh in '95," he said. "So we kind of picked where they left off.

He said Purdue and Virginia Tech tied for fifth with Purdue sliding ahead by eleven-tenths of a point.

Enlow said the team had to submit videotapes to compete. He said he is looking forward to the new season next year. He said football coach Ron Prince said he would like to get some new traditions going for the football games.

Improvements will be made, but tumbling is a large priority.

"Tumbling improvements are number one," he said. "We would like to have a good balance of appearances, games and competition keeping things as strong as possible."

He said the squad will be featured in American Cheerleader Magazine with photos that were taken of skills performed in their routine.

Dusty Allen, a member of the squad and junior in life sciences, said there was a fall in the preliminaries.

However, there is another round, and K-State came back to win and then earned their spot in the finals.

"The squad was down after the fall," he said. "But Al and Josh did a really good job, changed some things, and we came out on top."

He said he would like K-State finish in the top five next year and continue to improve.

"We were a young squad this year," Allen said. "With the experience we will have and improving our stunts and tumbling, we could take first."

Allen said the experience was fun and would like to finish his last year with a bang.

Van Tran, member of the squad and senior in mass communications, said the experience was "awesome."

She said it made her see cheerleading in a different way.

"It makes you see what you're capable of and what you're up against," she said. "The last time K-State competed was in '95 so for us to finish in the finals and place was amazing."

She said the competition is focused on displaying the skills and involves dancing, stunts, tumbling and transitions. The games focus more on involving the crowd.

She said being from Kansas, and most of the other schools being from the East, the squad showed their abilities. She said the squad is currently working on a difficult stunt called a rewind. Tran said the squad has more confidence because of nationals.

"We have great team unity," she said. "Also we have a lot more confidence. We look at a skill that may be difficult and say we can do that, or we have to at least try."

TEN | Jecminkova named to Anniversary team

Former K-State standout Alena Jecminkova was named to the Big 12 Conference Men's and Women's Tennis 10th Anniversary Team, as announced by the Big 12.

Jecminkova

The team, chosen by the league's head coaches, is part of a year-long celebration marking the 10th year of competition in the Big 12. Teams are being chosen in each sport during the 2005-06 season.

Jecminkova starred for the Wildcats from 1999-2002, earning All-Big 12 first team status in 2000, 2001 and 2002. Jecminkova is fourth on the all-time singles wins list at K-State with a 67-45 record.

NFL | Williams guilty of disorderly conduct

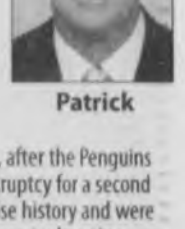
MINNEAPOLIS — Former Minnesota Vikings running back Moe Williams, charged last fall after a raunchy team boat party that tarnished the Vikings' season, was found guilty of disorderly conduct Thursday.

Williams

A jury found him not guilty of two other misdemeanors — indecent conduct and lewd or lascivious behavior. Williams was accused of touching the breasts of a dancer in a public space during the boat cruise on Lake Minnetonka in suburban Minneapolis.

NHL | Penguins not bringing back GM Patrick

PITTSBURGH — Craig Patrick made some of the best trades in NHL history. He oversaw some of the best drafts, built some of the best teams and signed some of the best players and coaches.



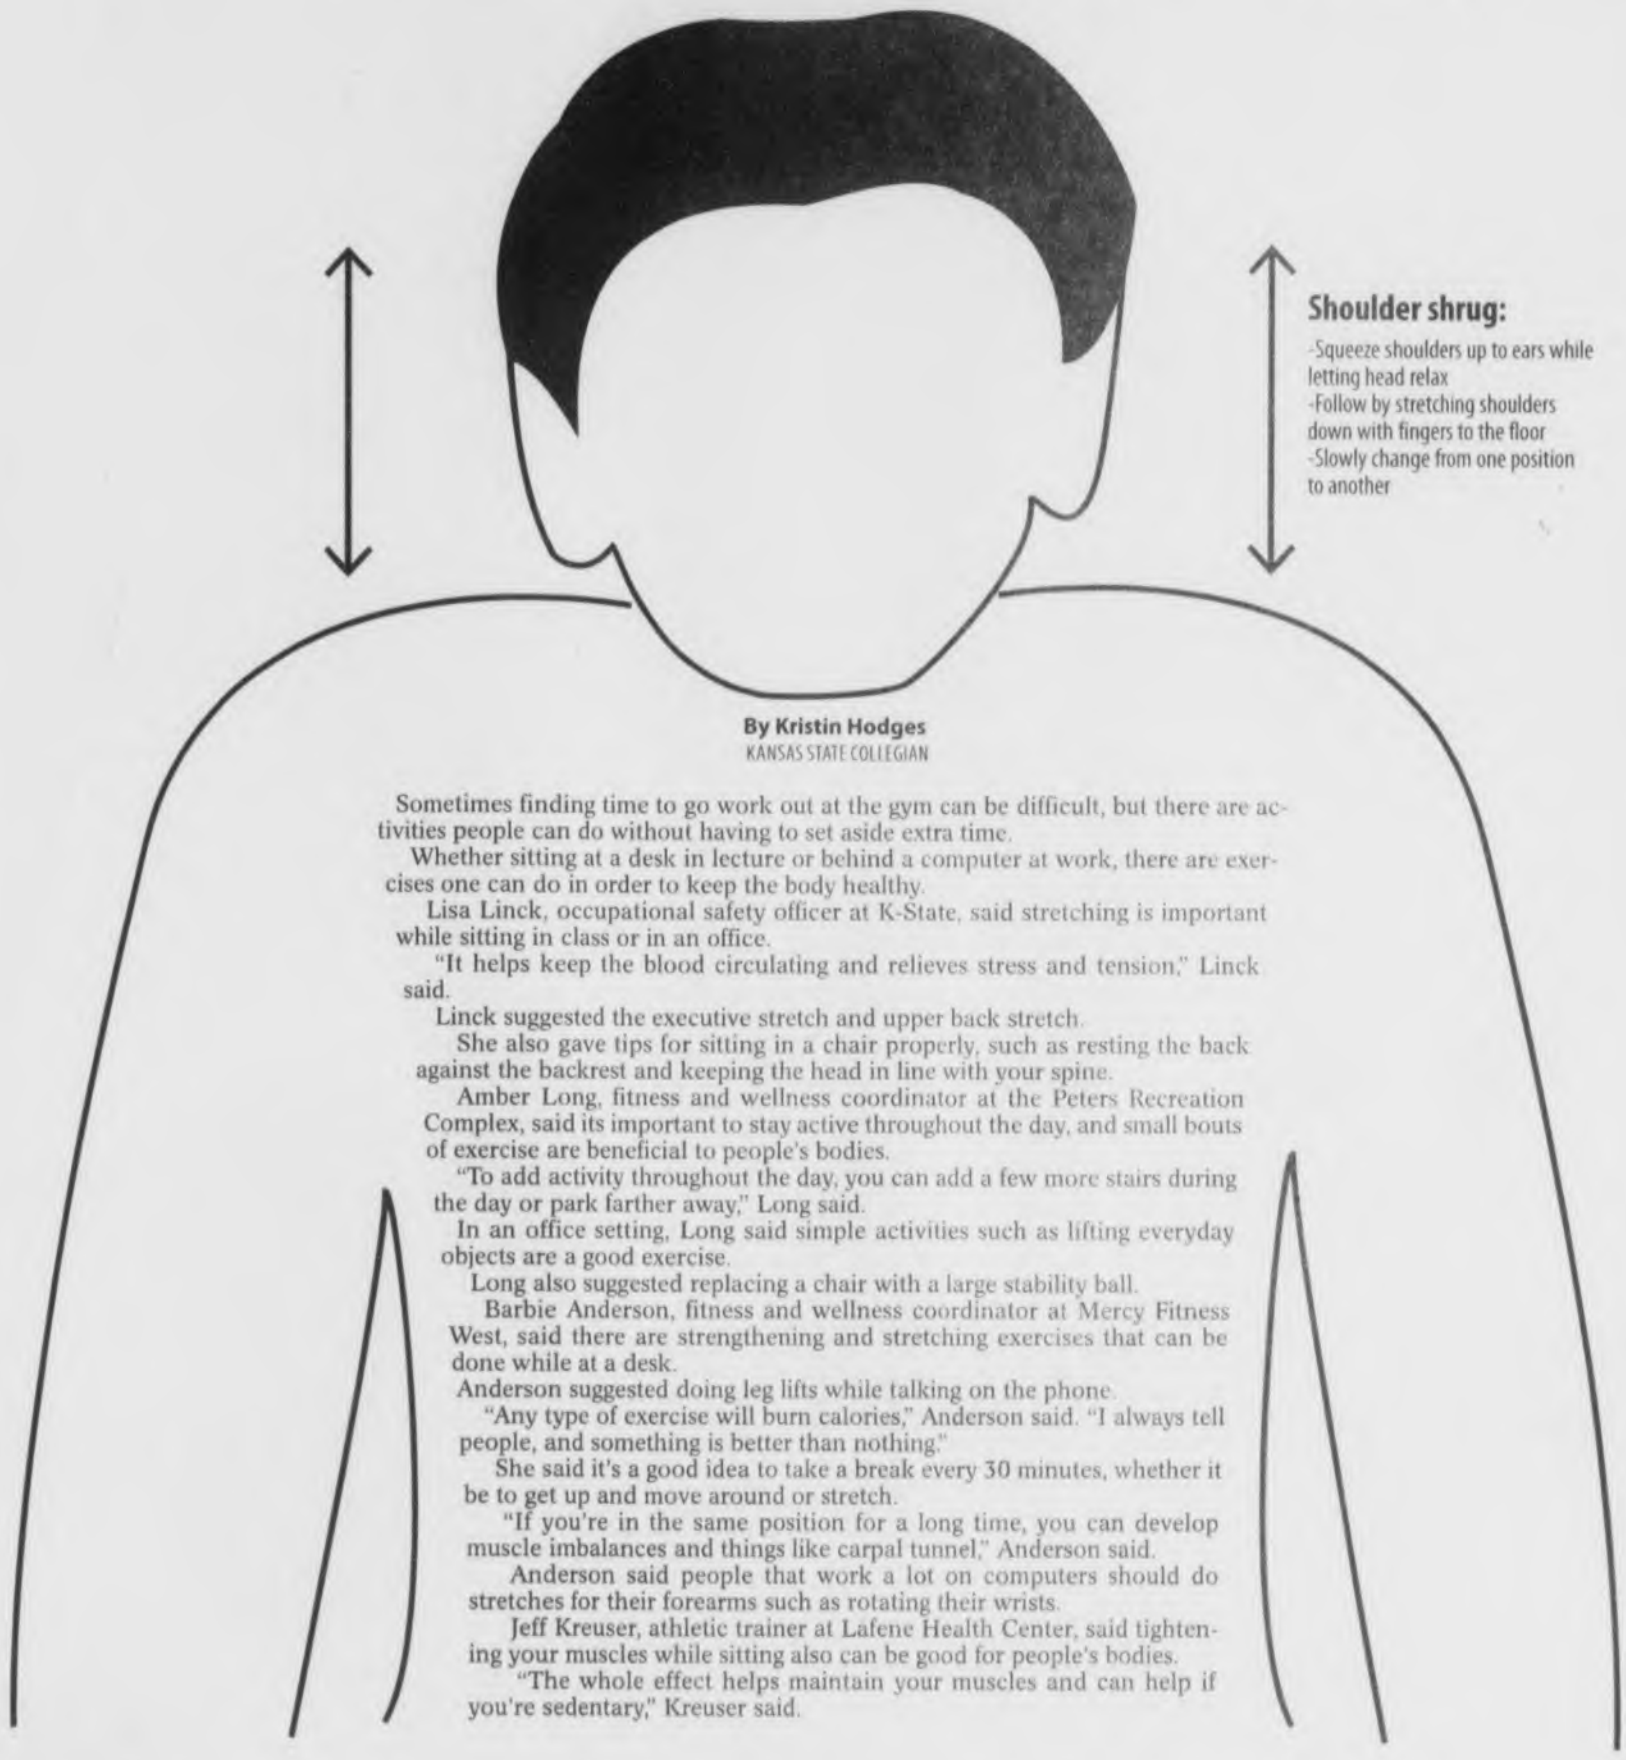
Patrick

But it was obvious, after the Penguins sank into bankruptcy for a second time in franchise history and were forced to tear apart a longtime contending team, their general manager lost his drive. Patrick's creative touch also disappeared, and many of the player and coaching decisions he made were bad ones.

So, after four-consecutive last-place finishes, the Penguins did what once would have seemed unthinkable: They let Craig Patrick go, failing to renew a contract that expires on July 1.

NFL | Arrington takes physical for Giants

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — LaVar Arrington took a physical for the New York Giants Thursday, one indication that the three-time Pro Bowl linebacker might be on the verge of signing with the team.



Arrington

Giants general manager Ernie Accorsi said Arrington came to the New York area to take the physical. Arrington also visited the team March 11-12.

BKC | Afflalo, Farmar declare for the NBA

LOS ANGELES — UCLA guards Arron Afflalo and Jordan Farmar both declared for the NBA draft Thursday, but neither will sign with an agent, giving them the option to return to the Bruins for their junior seasons.

Easy-to-do workouts help maintain a healthy body

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sometimes finding time to go work out at the gym can be difficult, but there are activities people can do without having to set aside extra time.

Whether sitting at a desk in lecture or behind a computer at work, there are exercises one can do in order to keep the body healthy.

Lisa Linck, occupational safety officer at K-State, said stretching is important while sitting in class or in an office.

"It helps keep the blood circulating and relieves stress and tension," Linck said.

Linck suggested the executive stretch and upper back stretch.

She also gave tips for sitting in a chair properly, such as resting the back against the backrest and keeping the head in line with your spine.

Amber Long, fitness and wellness coordinator at the Peters Recreation Complex, said its important to stay active throughout the day, and small bouts of exercise are beneficial to people's bodies.

"To add activity throughout the day, you can add a few more stairs during the day or park farther away," Long said.

In an office setting, Long said simple activities such as lifting everyday objects are a good exercise.

Long also suggested replacing a chair with a large stability ball.

Barbie Anderson, fitness and wellness coordinator at Mercy Fitness West, said there are strengthening and stretching exercises that can be done while at a desk.

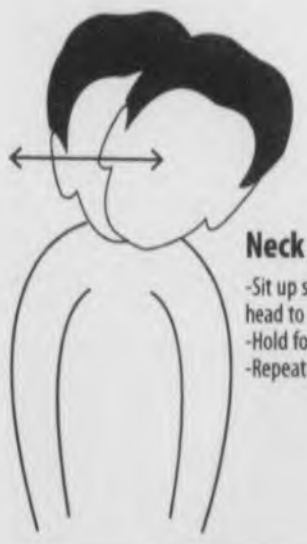
"Any type of exercise will burn calories," Anderson said. "I always tell people, and something is better than nothing."

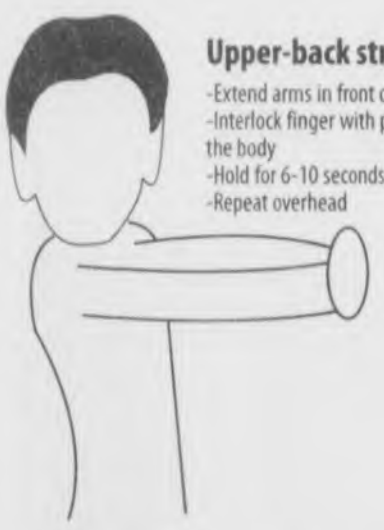


She said it's a good idea to take a break every 30 minutes, whether it be to get up and move around or stretch.

"If you're in the same position for a long time, you can develop muscle imbalances and things like carpal tunnel," Anderson said.

Anderson said people that work a lot on computers should do stretches for their forearms such as rotating their wrists.

Jeff Kreuser, athletic trainer at Lafene Health Center, said tightening your muscles while sitting also can be good for people's bodies.



"The whole effect helps maintain your muscles and can help if you're sedentary," Kreuser said.

Neck Stretch:
-Sit up straight, draw chin in gently, bend head to one side toward one shoulder
-Hold for 5 seconds
-Repeat on the opposite side

Executive stretch:
-Lock hands behind head
-Stretch slowly backwards in chair
-Arch back slightly and gently
-Hold for 6-10 seconds, relax for 5-10 seconds

Upper-back stretch:
-Extend arms in front of chest at shoulder height
-Interlock finger with palms facing away from the body
-Hold for 6-10 seconds
-Repeat overhead

'Thirds' as charming as previous books in Darling series

"Charmed Thirds"
★★★★★

Book review by Adrianne DeWeese

I waited two years for Megan McCafferty's "Charmed Thirds" to be published, and after zipping through all 360 pages in 10 days, I must say, it was well worth the wait.

"Charmed Thirds" is the third book in McCafferty's series featuring main character Jessica Darling. "Sloppy Firsts" and "Second Helpings" each featured Darling during her high school years in the fictional town of Pineville, N.J.

"Thirds" tells the story of Darling's 3 1/2 years as a psychology major at Columbia University in New York City, which also is McCafferty's alma mater.

Jessica's high-school boyfriend and bad-boy-everyone-loves-to-hate, Marcus Flutie, is away at a Buddhist college in California. But Jessica and Marcus maintain the ever-painful long distance relationship until the summer of her sophomore year, when Marcus decides to attend Pure Springs College in Death Valley, Calif. Marcus chooses to accept two years of total isolation at the college where the tuition is free, students are in charge and support themselves by working on a cattle ranch.

Jessica experiences a string of dead-end flings in the aftermath of her and Marcus' break-up. William, also known as Mini Dub, is the Republican with a punk image whom Jessica makes out with after a night of drinking. Bastian is the sexy, married graduate student with whom Jessica works during her sophomore-year summer and lusts after.

And then there's Kieran, the pot-smoking philosophy major two years Jessica's junior, and the epitome of what it means to be emo, complete with his shaggy hair, long eyelashes and wool cap.

The book's conclusion offers promise between Jessica and Marcus and their on-again, off-again relationship.

And who could forget Jessica's best friend, Hope? Hope moved away from Pineville when she was 16 after her brother's death from a heroin overdose, but Jessica continues correspondence with her. One of my favorite parts of the book was the actual dialogue between the two characters as they embark on a cross-country trek for Hope's senior project.

"Charmed Thirds" is really a story about living the college life with no regrets. Women and men alike can relate to Jessica Darling's character and what it means to grow up while in college. I relate to Jessica in her angst-ridden journal entries, painful break-ups and hope for what the future holds with a liberal arts major.

"Charmed Thirds" has me anxiously awaiting the fourth book in the series, which McCafferty so far has devoted all of 2006 to writing, according to her Web site. McCafferty said on her Web site she is not sure when the book will be completed, but it will feature Jessica Darling in her first year of the post-college "real world."

My guess is that the book will be released in, another two years. I, too, will be facing the real world in 2008, and I am excited to read how Jessica Darling will cope with it.

stadium parking lot.

"We've never run a battle of the bands before, so this is all new to us," said Joni Weinman, marketing assistant for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics. "This whole Fan Fest is new, so we wanted to do a bunch of new things that students would get into as much as the general public."

Five bands were chosen from student submittals, and the bands will be judged by three anonymous student judges in the crowd.

The judges will award points based on stage presence, music quality, creativity and song-writing, crowd response, musical precision and total package. Crowd response and musical precision will be worth 10 points each, while all other categories will be worth 20 points each for a total of 100 points. The winning band will be announced during the Spring Game.

The weekend ends with the actual Spring Game, and even that has a new twist.

Instead of pitting the No. 1 offense and defense against the No. 2 offense and defense, as it has been run in years past, offensive coordinator James Franklin and defensive coordinator Raheem Morris held a draft on Thursday, choosing the players that will comprise the White team, coached by Morris, and Franklin's Purple team. Prince was the "commissioner" of the draft, vetoing any trades or selection.

"It'll be a lot of fun," Prince said after practice on April 15. "I want to make sure the chemistry throughout the roster is adequate and really improving, and that's the reason for chopping and mixing up a lot of different players."

Kurt Fenster, junior in theater, said the patriarchal system of today's society is just as oppressive to men as it is to women.

"These women are my mother, my sister and my friends," Fenster said. "I believe in humanism, a sub-set of feminism, and a lot of the world's ills can be solved by holding on to feminist ideals of equity, justice and freedom," he said.

The march culminated with the reading of slam poetry by Eric Erhart and a musical performance by Deidre McCalla.

"We're people; we're strong, and we have minds."

Indeed, the resounding words of the evening were equality, respect and empowerment.

"I want this event to have a ripple effect and get the word out to people," Divine said. "Women should walk with confidence and a sense of our inherent right of humanity."

Prince tackles 1st year in phases

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Ron Prince is a man of many traits.

He is organized – a messy desk drives him crazy.

He is a good listener and an eloquent conversationalist – he doesn't like sitting opposite people at his desk. It's too far away.

He is attuned to detail – he can talk extensively about any player on his roster.

"Coach Prince implements the short term. He wants us to focus on the now and forget about the past and move on," quarterback Dylan Meier said. "As college athletes, it's required for us to look short-term and short-term only."

Since Prince replaced former coach Bill Snyder, he's made it a point to inform everyone about his goals and vision for the K-State football program.

Upon arrival in December, he outlined his four-phase plan for his first year at K-State.

Phase one was composed of his first 90 days and concentrated on recruiting, compiling a staff and getting everything in place.

Phase two encompassed the first 15 days of spring practice, familiarizing the players with his new system, Saturday's Spring Game and evaluating the progress of the team.

Phase three includes the summer, and phase four is the regular season.

So far, mission accomplished, Prince said.

"Right now, we're right on schedule," he said. "This weekend will be critical. Are there things we can sharpen? Yeah.

"But I feel very good about the mentality and competitive state of our team."

It is apparent Prince has emphasized the importance of the spring practice season, and his lofty expectations for the Spring Game, including observing how his players have evolved and adapted to a new system throughout the past months, are obvious.

"It's not Football 101 in the spring. All the players have been on a college football team before – with the exception of Josh Freeman – so hopefully we're teaching at a level like Football 410," Prince said. "We look at the acumen of the players, the ability to learn and see how a player is adapting to all the strategies and tactics in the spring."

Prince, along with offensive coordinator James Franklin and defensive coordinator Raheem Morris, have been hard at work since day one, hammering in these new strategies and tactics. And it hasn't always been easy, because transitions never are, Meier said.

"This is the first time we've been together on a whole new scheme, and we've come a long way," Meier said. "Nobody's really satisfied with the performance as a whole. But you're never satisfied; you always want to strive for more."

Prince also was adjusting to a dramatic change this winter, dealing with the newfound pressures of being a first-time head coach, while fulfilling his role as husband and father.

"I'm human. This is my first time as head coach, and heck, I want to do a good job," Prince said. "But I'm married. I have two kids. I have to have balance."

So in the winter, he started the balancing act. Prince began molding his team and staff and building the foundation of his squad.

"In the winter, we're building and strengthening the fabric of the team," Prince said. "One thing that has to happen every year is that the team has to be reborn. There are players who leave, players who come on, players who are ascending, players who thought they would be descending. All these dynamics are going on after the last game of the season.

"The players remaining have to have a collective resolve about what kind of team they want to have."

Building a team these days – in what Prince calls the era of modern football – is challenging. He has an 88-man roster with numerous positions. He said he wants to ensure every player pays close attention to his respective role, but he also wants to keep everyone in the program on the same page and growing together.

"I don't think anywhere, even in the corporate world, is team-building any more challenging or more important than in football," Prince said. "There is such adversity in size, strength and skill because there are so many types of skills needed, and there are so many different body types."

Senior linebacker Brandon Archer said the Wildcats are moving in the right direction – not at full speed – but at a solid pace for a team that started from scratch in the off season.

"We're progressing pretty well right now, we definitely need to step up on some things, but for the most part, we're following on track to where we want to be," Archer said.

Archer praised both Prince's and Snyder's coaching abilities and intelligence but said the one noticeable change this spring has been the energy Prince brings to the practice field.

"It's a little more one-on-one – when he's out there, there's a lot of energy," Archer said. "They're (Prince and Snyder) keen to details, but one of the major differences is coach Prince is able to get involved in the practice a little more so."

When summer, or phase three, rolls around, Prince doesn't plan to be around quite as much. It's the most fascinating time, he said, but it's a more relaxed period, allowing the veteran players and freshmen to come together and refine their skills on their own, without the coaches around.

Still, it's a vital period because the freshman and the upperclassmen must become a cohesive unit in order to taste success in the regular season, Prince said.

"Summer is critical, because if you don't do a good job integrating, you get a sense of old team, new team, and you never want to have that mentality," Prince said. "It's kind of like an older child dealing with the birth of a younger sibling."

While Prince tries to include each player in daily routines, he also is busy trying to involve everyone off the field by inviting fans and the press to practices. He also wants to establish himself not only as a coach, but as an approachable, friendly public figure in the community.

It's two of four responsibilities associated with modern head coaches, he said.

"It is my job to inform and energize the fan base. I need to have a great relationship with every player on my team, because it's my responsibility to the parents for their players' success," Prince said. "I have to be a great game strategist and tactician. Also, cooperating with the media.

"The head coach has the obligation to tell the story of K-State to the media."

Right now the story is the Spring Game, and Prince said he is looking forward to seeing how spring practices and his goals for phase two will translate into a semi-competitive situation.

"We'll assess coming out of Saturday's game and see where we are in our methods and teaching," Prince said. "The Spring Game is so valuable and impactful because you learn a new language.

"This is why coaches love the spring."

Coach Ron Prince runs the show during a spring practice. With spring drills over and Spring Game on Saturday, Prince looks forward to moving into phase three — summer.

5 quarterbacks aim for starting role

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

What freshman quarterback Josh Freeman might lack in experience, he makes up for in confidence.

Instead of finishing his senior year at Grandview High School in Grandview, Mo., the 6-foot-6, 230-pound quarterback graduated in December so he could participate in K-State's spring practice and compete for the starting job next fall.

So far, the decision has paid off, Freeman said.

"I am right where I wanted to be," said Freeman, who turned 18 years old in January. "Coming in, I wasn't sure what to expect, but I feel I have adapted somewhat well. I couldn't imagine coming into the fall and learning all of this in a month."

Freeman, a highly-touted, four-star recruit, according to Rivals.com and Scout.com, said coach Ron Prince's West Coast offense is a more complex version of the one he learned in high school.

"The basic concepts are similar," Freeman said. "I'd say it helps me a little bit because some of the spots and reads are the same."

Freeman and the rest of the Wildcats will have a chance to showcase their talents and hard work at K-State's annual Spring Game at 6 p.m. Saturday at Snyder Family Stadium.

"There should be a little nervous anticipation, but I want to go out and have a good, productive day – not make too many mistakes," Freeman said.

Meier, Webb and Evridge collectively accounted for all 22 starts at quarterback during the past two seasons.

Meier, in his fifth year from Pittsburg, Kan., has recovered from a severe shoulder injury that forced him to miss the entire 2005 season. But while Meier has regained his arm strength, he said his shoulder still feels sore from time to time.

"It gets some soreness every now and then, but it is nothing I can't fight through," said Meier, whose shoulder was being treated with ice after Monday's practice. "It feels good to throw the ball around again, knowing I can do it."

Meier said he hopes to be one of the quarterbacks vying for the starting nod next season. At this point, the position is wide open, Meier said.

"Nobody has really stood out," Meier said. "We are all trying our best to get the schemes down."

Because of the stiff competition, Prince has rotated the quarterbacks who take snaps with the first-string offense during spring practice.

"(Prince) is rotating us through, trying to figure out the best schemes and seeing where people are at," said Evridge, who practiced with the starting unit last week. "It's competitive, but there is definitely no animosity or anything between us."

Lopina, a redshirt-freshman from Pleasanton, Calif., said the quarterback race is too close to call.

"It's really tight," Lopina said. "Every day you have got to be your best, or you can move down. It is one of the toughest competitions I have had to face so far."

FRESHMAN WOULD DRAFT HIMSELF FIRST

This year's Spring Game, which is the first for coach Prince, could prove to be more competitive than those during Bill Snyder's tenure.

Unlike Snyder-led Spring Games, the Purple and White squads were drafted by K-State's offensive and defensive coordinators on Thursday.

Lopina said he likes the draft idea because both squads will have a similar number of first, second and third-string players.

"We are not going to be playing with people we have necessarily been playing with in practice," Lopina said. "It will add a little fun and competition to the game."

Lopina said if he had the first pick in the draft, he wouldn't know whom to choose. Freeman, on the other hand, sounded certain of whom he would select.

"If I was a coordinator, I would take myself," Freeman said with confidence. "I just trust myself. But if it wasn't me, I'd probably take (wide receiver) Jordy (Nelson) or (center Ryan) Schmidt."

MEIER, LOPINA AND FREEMAN SPOTTED AT KU'S SPRING GAME

The K-State quarterback trio got caught.

"Sure enough, we wore our hats low, but we got spotted," Meier said, laughing.

K-State's quarterbacks went to watch Meier's younger brother, Kerry Meier, who is a redshirt freshman for the Jayhawks.

"I have seen him play one other time live," Dylan Meier said of his younger brother. "Any chance I've got to see him play, I am going to take full advantage."

Meier quickly denied any claim of scouting K-State's in-state rival. In fact, Meier said he thinks Kerry plans to attend K-State's Spring Game.

"Spring games are pretty vanilla, so we weren't going to get much out of them anyway," Meier said.

Freeman adjusts to college sport, earns respect from coach, team

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Spring is the season of change for Josh Freeman.

Last fall, he was taking notes and throwing touchdowns at Grandview High School in Grandview, Mo.

But spring is here, and things are changing. Freeman is no longer a high-school superstar or a highly touted prospect. Now he's a Division-I quarterback. Now he's a Wildcat.

Coach Ron Prince, who lured Freeman away from Nebraska, said he is pleased with how his young quarterback has handled the changes.

"When you figure he should be getting ready for the prom, I'm pretty impressed with who he is, where he is and what he's doing," Prince said.

Freeman graduated early from Grandview in December and came to K-State, bringing with him plenty of hype and high expectations. Meanwhile, in Lincoln, Neb., the taste of sour grapes still lingers.

Bill Callahan, Freeman's would-be coach at Nebraska, was quoted in the Lincoln Journal Star as saying, "We want players who want us, because we feel Nebraska's a special, special situation. If you're a prima donna, if you're a drama queen, there's no room for you at Nebraska.

"You can go to Kansas State."

So far this spring, Prince has offered nothing but praise for Freeman's attitude and work ethic.

"He (Freeman) is such a humble kid," Prince said. "He's a hard worker, and he really wants to do well."

Freeman might be Prince's prize recruit, but that doesn't earn him special treatment on the field. Freeman said he gets the same tough love any other freshman would get.

"(The K-State coaches) have interesting coaching methods," Freeman said. "One minute they'll be tearing you down, (like) everything you're doing is wrong. The next minute you do something right, and it's the opposite."

Prince admitted his expectations for Freeman are high, but only because of Freeman's tremendous potential.

"I mother-hen him a little bit," Prince said. "Anybody who's got the courage to graduate from high school early and head off to a major college program has a little bit of moxie to them that you have to respect."

Freeman is only 18 years old, but that hasn't stopped him from raising eyebrows at spring practice. Among those impressed are the guys he throws to.

"The kid's got an arm," senior wide receiver Yamon Figurs said. "He's going to be good."

Junior wide receiver Jordy Nelson said Freeman, rated the No. 4 pro-style quarterback in the nation by Rivals.com, has the tools to excel in K-State's new West Coast offense.

"He's got a good arm. He's a smart kid. He's tall, big. I think that's about everything you want in a quarterback," Nelson said. "He's just got to come along and learn the offense with the other quarterbacks. I think it's going to be a battle all spring."

Freeman said Meier has been the go-to guy for the younger quarterbacks this spring.

"Dylan's been around awhile. He knows everything that's going on," Freeman said. "Sometimes he'll see things we don't."

Freeman has shown flashes of brilliance this spring, like a shifty touchdown run during an Oklahoma Drill earlier this spring. But Freeman, who wears number 1, admits he has some work to do before he is number one on the depth chart.

Freeman said adjusting to the speed of the college game and learning the playbook are some of his biggest challenges.

"I'm not quite there, but I'm working on it," Freeman said. "Reading and knowing the playbook – that all comes with time. We're all learning."

So Freeman's football education continues. But this spring, he's learned more than check-downs and hand-offs. He said he's also learned about life in Manhattan.

"Coming here, I heard (Manhattan) was just a small town," Freeman said. "When I took my visit, everyone had just left for Christmas break. It was kind of like a ghost town. There was snow on the ground, no green or anything."

But spring is here, and things are changing. Grass is shooting from the soil, and campus is crawling with students. Like almost everything else in his life, Freeman's feelings about Manhattan are changing, he said.

"Now I'm here, I'm getting to see everything that's going on, and I'm loving it," Freeman said.

Experienced Archer leads talented linebackers

By Michael Ashford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senior linebacker Brandon Archer takes a moment to rest during a practice this spring. Archer returns in 2006 as K-State's leading tackler, and coach Ron Prince said Archer has been one of the more impressive players this spring.

Catrina Rawson
COLLEGIAN

The first-year skipper of the Wildcat football program has yet to coach a game, but this spring, in preparation for the 2006 season, Prince has been searching for players around whom to mold his program.

With the Wildcats set to finish spring drills Saturday at the annual Purple-White Spring Game, Prince said he believes he has found that player in senior linebacker Brandon Archer.

"As far as knowing how to play the game, Brandon's ahead of everyone else," Prince said. "It's the little things. He's played in all the stadiums, he's confident, and he's comfortable with himself. Brandon Archer's experience is something to build around."

With Prince and defensive coordinator Raheem Morris incorporating the Cover 2 defense Morris helped run with the Tampa Bay Buccaneers before joining Prince at K-State, it is Archer who is given the task of making sure the defensive players understand what they're being taught.

Archer's teammates understand why he is the foundation for the Wildcat defense, and it starts not with what takes place inside the 100 yards that stretch from goal line to goal line, but in the five inches between Archer's ears.

"Brandon, he's so smart. He sees something, and he just knows exactly what to do," fellow senior linebacker Zach Diles said, emphasizing the word "exactly" with a loud snap of his fingers. "Myself, I'm getting better and better at seeing things and realizing things, but if I don't see something right away, Brandon, he'll see it and point it out right away."

Not only that, but Archer has been a stalwart on defense for the Wildcats in the last two seasons, leading K-State in tackles with 147 combined stops. He also has shown the knack for the big play.

Archer has three interceptions for touchdowns in his career – including a memorable 45-yard pickoff score in a 36-28 season-ending win against Missouri last season to help send coach Bill Snyder into retirement with a win. His three scores tie him for the career record at K-State, a mark he shares with Bobby Walker (2001-02) and Brad Lambert (1984-87).

"That's a big deal," Prince said.

While Archer might be Prince's building block, the rest of the K-State linebackers offer their own forms of construction material for Prince and Morris' defense.

Diles, sophomore Reggie Walker, senior Maurice Mack and redshirt-freshman Ross Diehl – all players Prince has singled out at some point this spring – compose a group of linebackers that appears to be one of the Big 12 Conference's deepest units.

Mack is the other returning starter in addition to Archer, and both Walker and Diles made significant contributions off the bench in 2005. Combined, Mack, Diles and Walker totaled 119 tackles last season, and Diles' 50 tackles in 2005 ranked fourth on the team, even though he never started a game.

"Mack, Diehl, Diles and Walker, they have a very good chance to help us out a lot, even though they're not household names," Prince said. "They've gotten a lot of experience this spring in the new system."

One thing for sure, Diles said, is that the new defense is better suited to showcase the talent the Wildcats possess at the linebacker position.

"Our job is to fly around and make plays," he said. "It's pretty much set in stone with this defense. You just fly around and tackle the guy with the ball. That's how this defense is going to be played compared to last year's (defense)."

So, can the 2006 linebackers, with all their experience, help turn around a K-State defense that ranked 43rd in 2004 and 45th last year after seven-straight years of being ranked in the top six in total defense?

Walker thinks so, and he said he hopes it shows Saturday at the Spring Game.

"I'm not going to lie; we've got beasts on defense," Walker said. "Our secondary is legit, the defensive line is getting a pass rush, and the linebackers are out there getting it all together. It's a great defense, and I think people will see that. We get a lot of freedom, especially in the Cover 2. You just have to go out there and be an athlete."

"I'm not going to lie — we've got beasts on defense. Our secondary is legit, the defensive line is getting a pass rush, and the linebackers are out there getting it all together. It's a great defense, and I think people will see that."

Reggie Walker
LINEBACKER

One thing is for certain: Archer is always there, doing his part to make the K-State defense an impenetrable wall in 2006.

"I'm striving to get better, and I'm striving to get our linebacking corps to be the best that we can be," Archer said. "I want us to work together and be the leaders of the defense and to be able to get other guys motivated. That's the main goal right now. As far as the season, when it comes, I want to win games."

Alsup back for 6th year

Christopher Hanewinckel
COLLEGIAN

Staff Report
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Carlos Alsup ran onto the field at Snyder Family Stadium on Nov. 19, 2005, it was supposed to be his last hurrah.

It should have been a final chance for a standing ovation during the Senior Day festivities and the opportunity to be part of the class that went out with coach Bill Snyder.

Instead, Alsup is getting another shot, another chance to be a senior, only this time he will be a 23-year-old one who already has a degree, but still has a whole lot to prove on the football field.

Alsup was given the nickname "grandpa" by his teammates and a sixth year of eligibility by the NCAA after the often-injured running back filed for a medical hardship waiver at the end of the 2005 season.

"At the end of the season, I was talking with my parents and coach Snyder, and I felt it was in my best interest to come back and fulfill my career as a football player," Alsup said. "At least I can get two successful ones (years) out of it."

Under normal circumstances, a Division-I athlete has five years to compete in four seasons, according to NCAA regulations.

But the NCAA will consider granting an athlete a sixth year of eligibility if a medical hardship prevented the athlete from participating during a season.

Alsup was not able to compete for two years because of medical injuries and qualified for a medical waiver.

"He was obviously hopeful, as all players are who are in that situation," coach Ron Prince said about Alsup filing for a waiver. "It's a very difficult situation when you have a medical injury where you lose a year, and so I think when you have one of those circumstances, it's a positive for the player. Whether I was the coach or not, I think he deserved the chance to have a chance to come and play. I'm really happy that he did."

As a freshman, Alsup was given a redshirt that allowed him to practice with the team, but not play, and keep his four years of eligibility.

Then it all came crashing down for Alsup.

In 2003, he was listed as the No. 2 running back behind Darren Sproles, but an injury in the second game of the season sidelined him for the rest of the year. The injuries followed him into the next season, and Alsup never got onto the field in 2004.

"I wasn't necessarily surprised," quarterback Dylan Meier said of Alsup's decision to return for a sixth season. "He's one of those guys that are just great to be around; he's probably one of the funniest guys on the team. But he's an awful good player, and if we put him in the right schemes and situations, he will strive.

"He's been hampered his whole career here, but we're trying to get him over that bug, and it's really great to have him back."

Unfortunately, the injury bug seems once again to have, bitten Alsup.

He did not dress in pads for Saturday's practice, leaving senior Thomas Clayton as the sole running back remaining out of K-State's top-three returning running backs. An injury to sophomore Parrish Fisher a week earlier sidelined him, too.

"Hopefully everything will be good, and you'll see me on Saturday," Alsup said. "I'm trying to."

Injuries sideline top running backs; others get time

By Cedrique Flemming
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Ron Prince said he is using spring practice as an opportunity to develop some of the players with less experience into players he can use next season.

"I'm looking for a number of players who have either been special teams players to this point in their career or backup players to step up and play well for us," Prince said. "There are guys who now have an opportunity to play with the first or second units who have not had that type of experience up to this point in their careers."

There are several running backs who don't normally practice with the first team, but other players' injuries are allowing them to play with the first string and show the coaches what they can do.

Sophomore Parrish Fisher and sixth-year senior Carlos Alsup were Nos. 2 and 3 on the depth chart last season, and both have been recently sidelined at practices due to injuries, opening the door for other running backs to step up.

Senior Donnie Anders, junior Terry Petrie, sophomore John McCardle and freshman Courtney Greer have all seen a substantial amount of action during team drills this spring.

"They all have gotten some significant reps this spring," Prince said. "They are obviously players who I am looking for to see their talent on a more consistent basis.

"When you are in a backup position and you are trying to fight for playing time at the running back spot, then special teams are critical, and that's one of the ways that you get on the bus and have a chance to run the ball."

He has appeared in 11 games throughout his career as a Wildcat and returned kickoffs in two games last season.

Petrie played in six games last season as a special teams player and moved from defensive back to running back in the offseason after recording four total tackles.

The extra playing time he received in the spring was an excellent opportunity for him to showcase his talents, Petrie said.

"There is going to be some competition at running back, no doubt," Petrie said. "I was at the bottom of the depth chart before the spring, but now I feel like I'm in the mix of things because I have been able to get more reps.

"I have shown that I can be focused, and I'm expecting to help out the team in whatever way I can."

McCardle also is making the switch from defensive secondary to running back. He played mostly special teams last season and totaled eight tackles.

One thing Prince said he expects from all of his running backs is that they will become more complete players.

"We are trying to make sure everyone has the overall game, because that's what every running back now needs to have," Prince said.

"If a running back can only run with the ball, then eventually he becomes a liability. We want all of our running backs to be multi-faceted, and they are all making progress towards that."

Senior Thomas Clayton started eight games and led the team in rushing with 637 yards and four touchdowns last season.

He has been taking most of the snaps with the first team during spring practice, and he welcomes the competition, he said.

"The depth we have at running back is going to do nothing but help the team out," Clayton said.

"There are a lot of young guys who are getting the chance to practice a lot more lately, and the experience they are getting now is going to pay huge dividends in the future."

Coach Ron Prince takes a minute during drills to talk with senior offensive lineman Greg Wafford. Prince brings five years of experience from Virginia — where he was an offensive coach — to K-State.

Coaches' experience benefits offensive line

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Plagued by injuries and inexperience, the K-State offensive line often was seen as one of the reasons the Wildcats finished with a 5-6 record in 2005.

But with a new year comes a fresh outlook.

"We're here together, and we're in this together," junior guard John Hafferty said. "It doesn't matter who starts, because we're going to have each other's backs. I love this group."

That familiarity has created unity.

"Last year, we didn't really know each other that well, but as the years go by, you really grow ties with each other," sophomore tackle Gerard Spexarth said.

Tim McCarty, first-year offensive line coach, fosters the tight-knit atmosphere and encourages players to learn on their own first, Hafferty said.

"He's not about pointing the finger," Hafferty said. "He lets us learn from our mistakes and helps us out."

McCarty has found a common ground with his team, knowing when to be a friend and when to be a coach, Spexarth said.

"He knows how to have fun, and he knows how to work," Spexarth said. "You have to have both sides because you can't just be a hard-ass all the time, and you can't just be laid back all the time."

Before coming to K-State, coach Ron Prince was the offensive coordinator at Virginia in 2002-05 and offensive line coach in 2001-05. With Prince's past offensive line experience, the Wildcats receive twice the instruction.

"It feels like we have two offensive line coaches, with coach McCarty just doing an excellent job and coach Prince, who is very experienced as an offensive line coach," Hafferty said.

That extra attention from Prince has created more pressure on the line, Spexarth said.

"He expects a lot out of us, but in order to be the best you can be, you've got to have high expectations for yourself," Spexarth said.

The leadership role that comes with being a senior forces Wafford to set a good example for his younger teammates, he said.

"I've got to be mentally tough because if I'm down, they'll be like 'Greg's down,'" Wafford said. "I try to keep myself strong so I will be able to tell them and not be a hypocrite."

Through experience, he has learned the offensive linemen need to deflect outside influences, Wafford said.

"There's pressure to prove something, but it's only the pressure from ourselves, because we can't worry about what everybody else wants us to do," Wafford said.

A glimpse of spring

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN
Fans sit in the stands of Snyder Family Stadium to get a peek at what spring drills, with first-time coach Ron Prince and his players, look like. This is the first time in 17 years fans and media have been allowed to attend practice.

Prince impressed with d-line so far

Sophomore defensive lineman Ian Campbell braces himself during a spring drill. Coach Ron Prince said he has been impressed with Campbell's ability to rush the quarterback this spring.

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

6 defensive linemen have caught new coach's eye during spring practice, including 1 freshman, 2 sophomores

By Cedrique Flemming
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Ron Prince has had four weeks of spring practice to watch the players on his roster, and he has said nothing but positive things about the players from one particular position.

"I'm very pleased with how the defensive line is coming together," Prince said. "I'm really excited about the way that (freshman) Eric Childs is rushing the quarterback, along with (sophomore) Ian Campbell."

Prince said the offense has had a hard time practicing because senior Blake Seiler is disruptive and always is making plays for the defense.

Seiler started all 11 games last season, and he finished the year with 34 total tackles.

He said the new defensive scheme is easier for the defensive line to learn, and he is happy with the growth of the line after only a month of practice.

"I think we're flying around and picking up the defense really well," Seiler said. "It's not too complex, and it's good that everybody knows what they are doing, because it gives us more of an opportunity to focus on playing together, instead of playing our individual assignments."

He said one of his goals is to convince defensive coordinator Raheem Morris that he is more than just a pass rusher but that he also can stop the run and make tackles at the line of scrimmage.

Childs redshirted last season and said it is still too early to tell who the starting linemen will be when the season rolls around.

"As of right now, I wouldn't even say who is going to get the most playing time because everything is changing from day to day," Childs said. "I take most of the reps now, but even when all these high school kids come in, someone might show me up."

Senior Quinton Echols started every game last season and finished sixth on the team in total tackles with 45, and also contributed 1.5 sacks. He has been practicing with the first and second squads during the spring.

Cline appeared in 10 games last season and recorded eight tackles.

Moran started seven games and, after recording 21 tackles, was an honorable mention freshman All-American and a freshman All-Big 12 Conference selection by The Sporting News.

Prince said he is impressed with Moran so far this spring and can't wait to see how he will excel when the season starts.

"One player who has had as good a spring as anybody is Junior Moran," Prince said. "I'm really pleased with how he is coming along, and I'm really excited about his development and his future."

Meet the coaches

Ron Prince
Head Coach

With Saturday's Spring Game, coach Ron Prince will have gone through his first spring practice as the leader of the Wildcat football program. In his first 90 days on the job, which Prince dubbed "Phase One," spring practice was Prince's first opportunity to see the team he will guide on the football field in 2006. Prince, who came to K-State after a stint as the offensive coordinator at Virginia, has said many times that he has no plans to watch any film of last season until after the conclusion of Saturday's scrimmage. That way, every player on the team will have had at least 15 practices to prove why he is the best man for his particular position. Prince did not want to have any "preconceived notions" about any player heading into spring practice and instead opted to let the hardest-working players step up to the challenge.

As for the game Saturday, Prince will be more of an observer, as defensive coordinator Raheem Morris and offensive coordinator James Franklin will serve as the coaches of the White and Purple squads, respectively. Instead, Prince will serve as a color analyst on the radio for the first half of the game.

Tim McCarty
Asst. head coach/offensive line

McCarty brings 22 years of coaching experience to K-State, including five as an offensive line coach at Shawnee Mission North High School, Dodge City Community College and Greenville College.

James Franklin
Offensive coordinator/QBs

Franklin has been in the coaching ranks for 11 years but has yet to be put with the quarterbacks. However, his three years as quarterback at East Stroudsburg College should come in handy.

Tim Horton
Running backs

Horton comes to K-State after coaching running backs at the Air Force Academy for one year and wide receivers for five. The Arkansas alum has six total years of coaching running backs on his resume.

James Jones
Tight ends

Jones is in his 10th season coaching, despite having no college football experience. He's never coached tight ends but has nine years of experience on the defensive side of the ball.

Mo Latimore
Defensive line

Latimore, in his 22nd season at K-State, is the veteran of the coaching staff. He boasts 18 years as a Wildcat coach, so it will be interesting to see how he adjusts to a new system.

Raheem Morris
Defensive coordinator/DBs

Morris comes back to the college level after three years coaching with the Tampa Bay Buccaneers. His most recent role with the Buccaneers was as assistant defensive back coach — his same job here.

Tim Tibesar
Special teams

Tibesar has the shortest coaching record with nine years, but he has coached at five different colleges, including two in California, so he should be familiar with Prince's West Coast offense.

Matt Wallerstedt
Linebackers/Recruiting coord.

Wallerstedt should have good insight for the linebackers, seeing he has played the position at K-State in 1984-1987. He joins Latimore as one of two coaches returning from last season.

Pat Washington
Wide receivers

Washington comes from, most recently, Tennessee and Baylor, where he 's been coaching wide receivers for a combined 10 years. He's been to 17 different Bowl games as a coach and player.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State Spring Game record crowd of 31,875 fans descended upon Snyder Family Stadium on Saturday night to get their first extended look at new coach Ron Prince's Wildcats in action.

Would a starting quarterback emerge from five viable candidates? Would the defense fly to the ball and make clean, fundamentally sound tackles? Would any unknown players shine under the lights and pressure of a game-like atmosphere?

While some of those questions were answered in the White team's 21-14 victory against the Purple, some remained, and new ones emerged.

"That's what you would expect at a spring game," Prince said. "It was a little bit sloppy; we had some balls on the ground, some penalties, some things that you're hoping won't happen, but you're realistic and know that they will.

"I was very pleased with the contact level. I thought that was important for us to get. I thought it was important for the quarterbacks to be in a situation where they would be live and have a chance to be hit."

Combined with freshman Josh Freeman and redshirt freshman Kevin Lopina of the Purple team and senior Allen Webb of the White squad, the K-State quarterbacks threw for 285 yards and four touchdowns, led by Allen Webb's 79 yards and one touchdown on 5-of-6 passing.

Coach Ron Prince still has not made a decision on who his starting quarterback will be for the upcoming season.

While Prince would not say if he was closer to naming a starter, he did say he liked the competition at quarterback.

"What I will say is that Dylan Meier did everything that he was supposed to do with the ball early," Prince said. "He did a nice job, and obviously, the other kids on the Purple team, there were three of them in there, and it's very difficult to establish a rhythm there. A lot of the things that have gone into the practices are things that I'm looking at."

Meier looked strong in his first appearance since the 2004 season after sitting out all of 2005 recovering from shoulder surgery. Meier

Fan Fest attracts large crowds of Wildcats for food, music

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There was something for everyone at the first-ever Fan Fest on Saturday with a barbecue contest, beer garden, Battle of the Bands and carnival rides.

BARBECUE CONTEST

In the Wildcat Barbecue Battle, several applicants grilled against each other in three different categories, including K-State Affiliated Organizations, Tailgating Organizations and the Open-Professional Division.

■ K-State Affiliated Organizations
First place: Hospital Management Society
Second place: Theta Xi

■ Tailgating Organizations
First place: The Sloppy Mop
Second place: Ribs & Racks
Third place: Doorbusters

■ Open-Professional Division

There were 48 teams that competed in the Open-Professional Division, which was divided into categories of chicken, pork ribs, pork and brisket. The teams were given points in each category, which then were tallied to come up with a grand champion, reserve grand champion and reserve champion. The grand champion also received an invitation to the American Royal Barbecue contest in Kansas City, Mo.

■ Chicken category
First place: GANDYQ
Second place: Hole in the Wall Barbecue
Third place: Belly Up Barbecue

■ Pork ribs category
First place: Double Stack Barbecue
Second place: Smoke Pit
Third place: Belly Up Barbecue

■ Pork category
First place: Ribs and Racks
Second place: Lazy JS
Third place: Powercat Pyro

All-night walk celebrates survivors

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students and other volunteers filled the track at Memorial Stadium on Friday evening to participate in Relay for Life.

The event, in its fifth year, began at 6 p.m. and ended at 6 a.m. It was sponsored by the American Cancer Society, with proceeds going to cancer patients, programs and research.

The event celebrates cancer survivors. Volunteers walked the track at the stadium, illuminated by candles, for the duration of the night. As the night darkened, candles in the shape of the word "hope" were lit in the stands.

The night began with the national anthem, sung by the K-State Singers, followed by a member of K-State's Relay for Life committee who gave a brief overview of the purpose of the event.

Many cancer survivors shared stories of struggle and triumph.

Andrea Macy, sophomore in pre-nursing, told the crowd of her battle with cancer and how the American Cancer Society has helped her.

"In 2001, I was a sophomore in high school and was diagnosed with a form of leukemia, at which time my bone marrow was found to have 47 percent cancer cells," Macy said. "I started chemotherapy on Christmas Eve and I was lucky in the fact that I only had to lose my hair once."

Macy explained how the relay has been a big part of her life since then, because the American Cancer Society provided services like paying for gas for trips to see her doctor. She also mentioned Camp Hope, a camp provided by the American Cancer Society that allows children to spend a week away from doctors and their illness.

The 10 survivors present began the relay with a lap around the track by themselves. Applause from those present lasted for the entire time it took the survivors to complete the lap. The remainder of the participants then joined them on the track.

"This is the first time I've done the relay in Manhattan, but I've done it in Garden City, (Kan.), my hometown, before," Lexi Billinger, sophomore pre-professional elementary education, said. "I have a friend who is a cheerleader that did it with (the Garden City) group, so I decided to do it as well."

Others thought more should have turned out for the event.

"I'm doing this for community service hours, but I love the camaraderie," Scott McDonald, freshman in pre-architecture, said. "I really wish they had a better turnout though; it seems like there's nobody here."

Macy said the participants who showed up to support the survivors were appreciated.

"It's am amazing show of life and a great way to remember those who have past," Macy said.

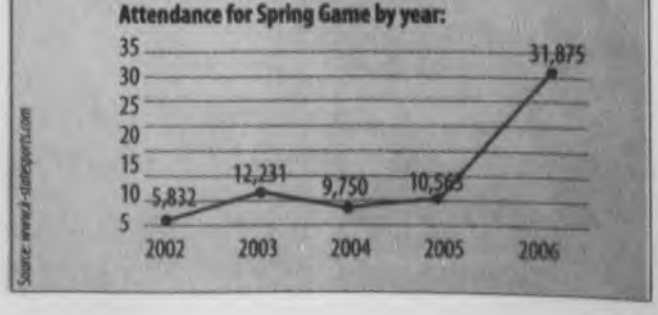
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS NEWS HIGHLIGHTS

BTK earns privileges

WICHITA — Good behavior has earned BTK serial killer Dennis Rader the right to watch television, listen to the radio, read and draw in his prison cell. Even with the new privileges, an official noted that Rader remains in the prison's most restrictive environment. He is let out of his 8-by-10-foot cell only one hour a day, five days a week, to shower and exercise.

Gas up in last two weeks



CAMARILLO, Calif. — Retail gas prices across the country jumped an average of nearly a quarter per gallon in the past two weeks, according to a survey released Sunday. Self-serve regular averaged $2.91 a gallon, up from $2.67 two weeks ago, said Trilby Lundberg, who publishes the nationwide Lundberg Survey of 7,000 gas stations.

U.S. soldiers, Iraqis killed

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Insurgents killed three American soldiers in the Baghdad area Sunday and fired mortars near the Defense Ministry in a spree of violence that killed at least 27 Iraqis as politicians began work on forming a new government. Twenty-seven Iraqis also died in other violence Sunday, including seven who were killed when three mortars hit just outside the heavily guarded Green Zone in Baghdad.

School spirit

K-State's first Fan Fest was more than a barbecue contest and a Battle of the Bands. It boosted attendance for the Spring Game to record numbers.

7 things you didn't know 7 days ago

Vice president visits Fort Riley

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

FORT RILEY – Amid concerns about Iran's nuclear ambitions and ongoing questions about the war in Iraq, Vice President Dick Cheney traveled to the Army post to speak before thousands of soldiers.

About 10,000 soldiers and others attended the Tuesday afternoon event on the Cavalry Parade Field on the fort's south end. Cheney visited Fort Leavenworth in January, but his trip Tuesday was the first by a president or vice president to Fort Riley since an Easter 1943 visit by President Franklin Roosevelt.

TEENS ACCUSED OF MURDER PLOT

RIVERTON, Kan. – Five teenage boys accused of plotting to kill other students in a shooting rampage at their high school were arrested Thursday after the alleged scheme appeared on the Web site MySpace.com.

Sheriff's deputies found guns, ammunition, knives and coded messages in the bedroom of one of the suspects, Sheriff Steve Norman said. He said officials at Riverton High School began investigating on Tuesday after learning that a threatening message had been posted on MySpace.com.

2 LACROSSE PLAYERS ARRESTED

DURHAM, N.C. – Two Duke University lacrosse players were arrested on rape charges Tuesday in a scandal that has rocked one of America's elite campuses and raised explosive questions of race, class and the privileged status of college athletes.

The two players were booked and released on bail. District Attorney Mike Nifong said a third player also could be arrested.

RUMSFELD WON'T RESIGN

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Donald H. Rumsfeld said Tuesday he hasn't considered resigning despite calls for him to do so by a half dozen retired generals, and that whether he should remain as secretary of defense is up to President Bush.

Asked at a Pentagon briefing whether he would consider resigning to ease political pressure on Bush and Republicans in Congress, Rumsfeld said, "No."

67 KILLED IN BUS CRASH

VERACRUZ, Mexico – A vastly overcrowded passenger bus veered off a highway emergency ramp and crashed through a metal barrier Monday, plunging more than 650 feet into a ravine in eastern Mexico. At least 67 people were killed, including four children.

The bus already had traveled for more than 10 hours as it returned from an Easter week gathering in the western city of Guadalajara to the passengers' home state of Tabasco, on the Gulf Coast.

GITMO DETAINEE LIST RELEASED

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico – The U.S. government released the first list of detainees held at the Guantanamo Bay prison on Wednesday – the most extensive accounting yet of the hundreds of people held there, nearly all of them labeled enemy combatants.

In all, 558 people were named in the list provided by the Pentagon.

NEW BIN LADEN TAPE SURFACES

BAGHDAD – A newly broadcast audiotape believed to be from Osama bin Laden slams the West for cutting off funds to the Palestinian Hamas-led government and calls on al-Qaeda followers to fight a proposed international force in Sudan.

In the tape, aired Sunday in part on Arabic-language TV network Al-Jazeera, the speaker repeatedly blasts a "crusader-Zionist war" against Islam, citing other activities in Chechnya and Somalia.

Campus bulletin board

Campus Calendar is the Collegian's campus bulletin board service. Items in the calendar can be published up to three times. Items might not appear because of space constraints but are guaranteed to appear on the day of the activity. To place an item in the Campus Calendar, stop by Kedzie 116 and fill out a form or e-mail the news editor at collegian@spub.ksu.edu by 11 a.m. two days before it is to run.

- Dr. Michael E. Scharf, entomology faculty candidate from the University of Florida, will present "Termite Sociogenics: A Growing Field" at 9 a.m. today in 129 Waters Hall.
- Susan Patrick will present "Challenges, Opportunities and Trends in Distance Education and Global Workforce Training" at 10:30 a.m. Wednesday in the Beach Museum of Art.
- The Council on Parking Operations will hold a forum on proposed rule and fee changes at 3 p.m. Thursday in the K-State Student Union Big 12 Room.

Corrections and clarifications

There was an error in Friday's Collegian. The poet who performed at "Take Back the Night" was Erin Erhart, not Eric. The Collegian regrets the error. If you see something that should be corrected, call news editor Matt Girard at (785) 532-6556 or e-mail collegian@spub.ksu.edu.

200 Saturday of Service volunteers build 1,000 fish habitats for Tuttle

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This year's Saturday of Service turned out to be just a morning of service.

The group of volunteers that planned to spend from 9 a.m. to noon at Tuttle Creek State Park ended up finished.

"(It took) not quite an hour, maybe a little over," said Todd Lovin, park manager.

The volunteers build fish habitats in buckets at the lake, Lovin said. They filled a bucket about halfway with concrete, and mixed in sticks and pieces of wood.

The habitats create a good place for fish to hide and will be put into the lake by another group of volunteers at a later date, he said.

Lovin said he hopes to see a turnout of about 250 volunteers every year for the project. This year, Saturday of service came close with about 200 volunteers.

Even without meeting the goal number of volunteers, Lovin said the group completed about 1,000 buckets.

Before the Saturday event took place, Lovin said about a year's work by the state park and the Tuttle Creek Lake Association went into the project, collecting buckets and wood, among other things.

"What leg-work we put into it behind the scenes kind of indicates how well this is going to go," he said. "I'd say it was pretty successful."

Lovin said building the fish habitats was a two-fold event.

"It's something kind of measurable, so we can set a block of time. Plus, it's like an obligation – we want future generations to have a good place to fish."

He said members of the committee contacted the Tuttle Creek Lake Association about a service project, and the association later approached the committee with the idea of building fish habitats.

"As a coordinator of the event, my biggest fear was that no one would show up, and we'd get nothing accomplished," he said. "But then, to see all those people show up, and we were done by like 10:30 (a.m.) – it was great."

Mosimann said the project was a great way for people to get in, do some work and then get out without wasting a Saturday. He said, people were able to get something done and get back to other things, like participating in the Fan Fest for Spring Game.

He said his committee has discussed organizing another event in the fall to help drop the habitats in the lake.

"I think the bottom line is that this wasn't the first time we've partnered with the Tuttle Creek Lake Association, and I hope it's not the last," he said.

The volunteers were a mix of about 40 K-State students, Manhattan residents, Tuttle Creek Lake Association members and even a few people from out of town.

"I signed up with AmeriCorps, and this is what we do – we volunteer," Fairleigh said. "And working at the lake – I've done this type of thing before."

Fairleigh said he was impressed with how smoothly the event ran since many people worked in an unfamiliar environment.

"It was great though – no major accidents," he said.

Susan Ludwig and Jerene Bain, both K-State students, said this was their first time volunteering with Saturday of Service.

"I liked it; it was fun," Ludwig, sophomore in pre-nursing, said. "It was hard work, but I think it was worth it."

Bain, junior in social work, said she enjoyed working as a group and that she definitely would do it again next year.

"We all worked together really well – everybody found a niche," Bain said.

Astronaut presents space's effect on animals

By Adam Monroe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Astronaut and veterinarian Richard Linnehan presented the All-College Convocation on Friday at the College of Veterinary Medicine.

The convocation, which addressed Linnehan's work on the effects of micro-gravity on animals, was part of the college's "Kind Hearts, Caring Hands" day.

The space program studies the life cycle of animals in space. The experiments ensure the specimens live a healthy life, an effort that requires Linnehan's veterinarian training.

"As a veterinarian, Linnehan is able to conduct many experiments in the environment of micro-gravity," said Michelle Lett, third-year veterinary medicine student.

The capacity to test animal behavior in such extreme conditions is a relatively new ability and requires scientists to do several basic tasks and to record data before they can move to more complicated experiments, he said.

Linnehan said the benefits of these programs certainly will be seen in the long run.

"Everyone looks for the payoff, but many of the benefits of the trickle-down effect have been taken for granted," Linnehan said. "Space research has yielded drugs that help osteoporosis as well as other muscular problems."

Lett said she is excited about the opportunities for veterinary medicine students.

"I learned that there is more available than solely becoming a practicing vet," Lett said. "It really opens a lot of doors."

The lecture brought students and their families, faculty and other professionals together to learn about life sciences.

"I had never seen these life sciences up close like this, and I learned how important to science the space missions are," said Kathy Heim, mother of a K-State veterinary medicine student.

Heim said she was in Manhattan for her daughter's white coat ceremony and decided to attend the lecture. All veterinary medicine students are required to take an oath after their third year of studies in order to move on to their fourth year. It is then they begin to wear a white laboratory coat and to participate in actual cases at K-State's Veterinary Teaching Hospital.

Linnehan said one of the exciting things about the space program is how it allows students to pursue degrees in the sciences.

"We need new minds in the field," Linnehan said. "Hopefully, once we start going to Mars again, the space program will inspire people to study our fields."

Linnehan has worked with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) for more than 14 years and has been involved in several space missions. He has flown three missions aboard the space shuttle Columbia and has logged more than 43 days in space.

Linnehan's first mission was the first to combine a full micro-gravity studies agenda and a life sciences payload aboard the Columbia.

He said the key to a better future will be found in education.

TO THE POINT

Fans should support teams year-round

More than 30,000 Wildcat fans showed their support for coach Ron Prince and the K-State football team at Saturday's Spring Game. An event that is usually little more than an open practice turned into an important football game, thanks to the support.

It is important to maintain this enthusiasm when the season begins in September and through the entire season.

Last season there were rows of empty seats throughout the stadium at many of the games. But Wildcat pride was shown with the season finale when former coach Bill Snyder was carried off the field. This pride once again was present on Saturday.

True K-State support must remain strong throughout the summer and into the fall. If the team and the fans can start the season with as much momentum and enthusiasm as this weekend, the Wildcats will be able to make a lot of noise in the Big 12 Conference.

Wildcat fans' support for the football team, and all other K-State sports, should be consistent throughout the year. Next season, when team doubts surface, fans should think back to this past weekend and remember all the excitement.

There is no better way to start the Prince era than with sold-out football games filled with loyal, purple fans. Next fall, with the support of Cat fans everywhere, the team can start the season running – right to the top of the Big 12.

Rest needed

Setting daily schedule improves students' health

"I don't feel good," is what I've been hearing from my roommates. In classrooms I've heard, "I am so tired, I think I could be getting sick."

Lately, everyone claims to be sick, and I tease some of them by saying they have the mumps. But since I have heard the complaint from so many, I am beginning to think it might be something else.

MEGAN GREEN

I was reading The New York Times last Friday, and I found an article on the habits people can change to get better sleep. And then it hit me – we need more sleep.

There was a time when, as children, we went to bed at the same time and ate at the same time, period. Now things have changed.

Eating is never on a normal schedule, and you get to bed when you want to get to bed – especially this time of year, when we have so many things to do to pass our finals and graduate. Although many times we cannot get to bed early, or even at a decent time, we can do things to help our bodies sleep better and not wake up in the middle of the night worried about the paper due in two days.

Changing a few daily habits might be hard, but it could get people back to sleeping a little better, and that makes a difference in your course-work, your job and even your mood.

One option is eating at about the same time every day. This helps keep your body on a semi-schedule, which, in turn, helps your body sleep. However, sometimes it isn't always possible to stop and have a meal. So buy a protein bar or take a sandwich to eat between classes.

Take a look at what you eat during the day, because it could affect how you sleep at night. According to The New York Times, the effects of caffeine from coffee, tea, soft drinks, chocolate and some medications can last as long as 20 hours. This means you could drink a cup of coffee in the afternoon and it could affect your sleep later that night.

Another daily habit that could disturb your sleep is smoking. Smoking, according to The New York Times, raises blood pressure and heart rate and stimulates the brain. This makes it harder to start that "go-to-sleep" stage.

If you've done all of this already and it hasn't worked, maybe it's because you spend too much time in bed doing something other than sleeping – meaning maybe you watch TV in bed. Because you do this, your body becomes accustomed to being awake in your bed and not sleeping. If you only sleep in your bed, it'll help.

As a senior, I know this time of year is the hardest. No one wants to go to school, let alone do homework, but we're getting closer to the end. This doesn't mean you are allowed to feel poorly, though, so instead of "being sick," go to bed. It'll help.

Women's clothes indicate intentions to men

It is unfortunate so many people believe the lie perpetuated by the "Take Back the Night" rally.

DANIEL KIRKSEY

The aim, as stated in Bhagavathy Umamaheswar's article on Friday, is good: to raise awareness about the violence and sexual assault against women in society.

I have no desire, or reason, to stand against such a cause. The problem, however, lies in the lack of a common-sense approach to the issue.

Take the mantra, for example: "Whatever I wear, wherever I go, yes means yes, no means no."

In our world, declarations mean nothing by themselves. The declaration that something is, or is not, has no bearing on the reality of the matter.

We all went to elementary, middle and high school and remember the many clothing rules and regulations.

The recurring and common consensus among all of us during those times was one of clothing as a form of self-expression. This hasn't changed.

Only under the rarest of circumstances are clothes viewed without attached meaning. Therefore, it is acceptable to say all clothes mean something. Unfortunately, the exact meaning is difficult to agree upon.

A woman might see a transparent camisole and a super-short mini skirt simply as a comfortable, yet stylish, outfit for a Friday night and nothing more.

But is this the meaning common to all of the slightly too intoxicated males she might encounter? Of course it isn't – and that does not need to be argued.

It is at this point a woman might say she is not responsible for how others might misinterpret her expressions. This is where common sense tells me otherwise.

The interaction between two people of the opposite sex can be broken into two categories: things that say "yes" and things that say "no."

All aspects of their interaction, from the words spoken to the physical distance between them, serve as communication.

It is the responsibility of each individual in the interaction to send signals that best match what is on his or her respective mind.

Clothes are one facet of this communication. It does not matter if the mind says no; clothes communicate by themselves, and women need to understand this.

It is irresponsible for a woman to rely on only one form of communication – in this case, the spoken word.

I guess what I am really arguing is that clothes are symbols, unaffected by a woman's mindset or intention.

I am not saying a man should not be held responsible for his oversight of the other signals she sends – the spoken word, distance, etc. But I am saying he cannot be accused of misinterpreting the signal sent by the clothing.

Illustrations by Ashley Burks | COLLEGIAN

A scantily clad woman is not at fault if she does happen to be sexually victimized. I am only offering a common-sense approach to fixing the problem.

My advice for women is to dress the way that will best match what they will be thinking in most situations for the evening.

If women are worried that this might ruin a chance with the Romeo in the corner, don't – never in history has a spoken "yes" been misinterpreted by man.

Japanese festival features Anime, calligraphy clinics

By Kelsey Childress
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students, faculty and community members participated in activities like Shodou (calligraphy), a chopstick competition and an origami workshop at the annual Central Kansas Japanese Festival on Saturday afternoon in the K-State Student Union.

Participants in the Shodou workshop were taught the Japanese characters needed to make up a word or a name.

"We are teaching Japanese calligraphy where there are three different types of written language," Yoshitomo Inatomi, freshman in biology, said. "Kangi, Katakana and Hiragana are the languages. Each language has different types of style."

Along with Japanese instructors and members of local Japanese clubs, students studying Japanese at K-State also helped with the event.

"This is my first year attending, and I like seeing all the different people here," said Heather Miller, sophomore in English and Japanese 4 student.

The workshops showcasing different areas of Japanese culture were spread out on the second floor of the Union, along with booths selling Japanese food, books and clothing. In Bosco Student Plaza, there was a bake sale, a taiko (a large drum) workshop, carnival games and a photo booth that allowed the guests to write on the photo before printing it. The booth is known as a Purikura.

The festival also included many activities that demonstrated how Japanese culture relates to life in the United States. The Etegami workshop allowed participants to create postcards with a personal message using watercolor painting and calligraphy. Etegami, which means "picture letter" in Japanese, lets people take a break from e-mail and telephones connect with family and friends.

Additionally, there was a clinic about Anime, popular Japanese cartoons. The history and production of Anime was shown, and guests were encouraged to draw their own Anime.

Demonstrations took place on the ground and second floors of the Union throughout the afternoon, some of which were of Karate and Aikido.

Lester Loschky, adviser for the K-State Aikido Club and assistant professor of psychology, taught a short lesson on the techniques and theories of Aikido.

"The most important thing about Aikido is that we don't use more force than is necessary to control an attacker," Loschky said. "(Aikido) is a form of non-violent martial arts. It is very popular among police and prison guards because of its effectiveness."

The K-State Aikido Club has about 45 members and meets at 7 p.m. in 301 Ahearn every Monday, Wednesday and Friday. Visitors are encouraged to come, and Loschky said about 15 people participate in each session.

Celebration stresses environment-friendly habits, food choices

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sunset Zoological Park, 2833 Oak St., celebrated Earth Day on Saturday with a life-sized inflatable whale and a bee dancer.

The purpose of the bee dance was to teach children how bees communicate through motion, said Rachel Soash, curator of education at Sunset Zoo.

There were six booths set up around the zoo with displays about Earth Day. The zoo also featured "wonder spots" like the bee dance to educate people.

"They're to teach people about how they can help and make the Earth a better place," Soash said.

The inflatable whale allowed children and others to enter and hear talks about whales from Karin Glosenger, Manhattan resident and docent, or volunteer educator, at Sunset Zoo.

Laundry detergent and toilet paper were some of the items on display that were created in such a way as to not harm the environment, Hill said.

Also at the display was information about seafood that can be purchased in the Midwest and other types of seafood that are available on the West Coast.

The purpose of the seafood guides was to show which seafood is readily available and which is fished or farmed in environmentally friendly ways.

"We're under the assumption that the whole world's working a little harder," Hill, research assistant in animal sciences and industry, said of the environmental movement.

A booth at the big cat exhibit allowed people to feel the difference between a tiger and a snow leopard pelt.

Woodard has been working at the zoo since seventh grade and said she has gotten to know some of the quirks of zoo life.

"What's cool about the tail on the snow leopard is they wrap it around their neck like a scarf," Woodard said.

K-State's Chase Bayuk throws a pitch to a Kansas player Sunday afternoon at Tointon Family Stadium. The Wildcats won Sunday in their three-game series against the Jayhawks.

K-State wins Sunday, loses series to KU

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas third baseman Erik Morrison tossed a bat in disgust and said the words that were running through the minds of almost everyone at Tointon Family Stadium: "When it left my bat, I thought we were going to extra innings."

OK, maybe not the exact words. What was coach Brad Hill thinking?

"Game over," Link said. "I knew I was going to get there."

Link was right. With two outs in the ninth inning on Sunday, he made a diving catch of Morrison's sinking fly ball to strand the tying run at second base and preserve a 5-4 K-State victory.

Defensive miscues cost K-State dearly in the first two games of the series, as KU won 8-5 on Friday and 5-2 on Saturday. On Sunday, however, KU (29-16, 9-9 Big 12 Conference) made costly errors, and the Wildcats (24-12-1, 4-10-1 Big 12) took advantage.

In the sixth inning, junior Eli Rumler hit a ground ball that bounced off Morrison's glove. The error allowed seniors Joe Roundy and Barrett Rice to score and gave K-State a 4-2 lead.

A two-out error by Morrison opened the door for K-State to add an insurance run in the seventh. After the error, Roundy scored senior Brandon Farr with a single and put K-State ahead 5-2.

Justin Ellrich pulled KU to within a run with a pinch-hit homerun off freshman Ben Hornbeck in the eighth. However, those were the only runs given up by the K-State reliever in the game.

Hill said strong performances from his relievers and starter Chase Bayuk put K-State in position to win.

"We had good pitching," Hill said. "(Chase) Bayuk and (Ben) Hornbeck did a nice job. Eddie (sophomore Daniel Edwards) came in and shoved it in there pretty good. Our pitching staff did a great job."

Bayuk (6-2) gave up two runs in six innings and earned the win. Edwards recorded the final two outs and picked up his second save.

Kodiak Quick (7-3) gave up four runs in six innings and took the loss for KU.

On Saturday, a Tointon Stadium record of 4,026 fans watched as KU grabbed an early 2-0 lead on a two-out single by Morrison. The Jayhawks scored four unearned runs against K-State starter Adam Cowart (5-4), who departed after just 3.2 innings. Cowart was saddled with the loss despite only giving up one earned run.

K-State scored one run in the second inning and had a chance for more, but Farr popped out with the bases loaded to end the inning. Farr went 0-for-4 on the day, snapping his

RUN | Kastor captures London marathon

Kastor

The 33-year-old American was alone in the lead after 15 1/2 miles, hadn't slipped on the slick, rainy roads and was on target to break her U.S. record with a sub-2-hour, 20-minute marathon.

There was no need for Kastor to worry. She finished in 2:19:35 to beat Lyudmila Petrova of Russia and Susan Chepkemei of Kenya in cool, drizzly conditions Sunday. Felix Limo out-sprinted defending champion Martin Lel to take the men's race in 2:06:39.

CAR | Schumacher wins San Marino GP

Schumacher

He covered 62 laps around the Enzo and Dino Ferrari circuit in 1 hour, 31 minutes, 6.486 seconds, with Alonso 2.0 seconds behind. McLaren's Juan Pablo Montoya was 15.8 back for third.

It marked the Ferrari driver's record seventh win at Imola and the 85th of his career. Apart from last year's U.S. Grand Prix, when only six cars competed because of a tire dispute, it was Schumacher's only win since the end of 2004.

MLB | Red Sox Series ball heading to Hall of Fame

The Boston Red Sox and their former first baseman, Doug Mientkiewicz, have come to an agreement to send the ball from the final out of the 2004 World Series to the Hall of Fame.

Mientkiewicz

"An amicable agreement was reached many weeks ago, and it provides a permanent home at the [Hall of Fame], with opportunities for some public display as well at Fenway Park," Red Sox president Larry Lucchino said via e-mail on Sunday.

Pitcher Keith Foulke fielded the ball off the bat of Edgar Renteria on Oct. 27, 2004, and threw to Mientkiewicz for the final out of Boston's four-game sweep of the St. Louis Cardinals.

Mientkiewicz held onto the ball, gave it to his wife and then secured it in a safe deposit box and claimed it as his own, joking that it was his "retirement fund."

The Red Sox said they were the rightful owners of the ball, and even though Mientkiewicz loaned the team the ball for a year, the team went to court last November to get permanent ownership.

The suit was dropped a few days later, and the sides agreed to arbitration.

Meier shows his comeback is complete

You've got to love Dylan Meier's story.

He's a fifth-year senior quarterback trying to make a comeback from shoulder surgery that kept him out all last season after an injury-riddled 2004 season in which he played nearly every snap in pain.

MICHAEL ASHFORD

Scratch that. He's not trying to make a comeback, he's doing it.

Watching Meier direct the White offense to a touchdown on its first drive during Saturday's Spring Game was perhaps the most impressive occurrence of the day.

On the first play, Meier rolled to his right, and instead of dumping the ball off to his receiver five yards downfield, he took off running. Twenty-one yards later, after he had been knocked out of bounds by safety Courtney Herndon, Meier popped up and clapped his hands.

He was back.

"I don't think I've run out there in about two years," Meier said. "I was so ready to just come out and play. I was happy. On the first play, I got to hold onto the ball and work out any kinks that might have been there. It felt good, though."

It looked good, too.

Meier went on to throw an 8-yard touchdown pass to tight end Donald Raymer eight plays later on the gutsiest pass of the day. Meier squeezed the ball between two defenders at the goal line with a perfect display of touch and zip that announced to the 31,875 fans in attendance that Meier's shoulder is just fine. But only after months of rehab.

"At first, it was a long, long battle getting my velocity back," Meier said. "Sure enough, it took a good 13, 14 months for it all to come back naturally.

"Sometimes, quarterbacks focus on throwing the ball hard without even thinking. Now I'm to that point where if I'm just standing on the sideline throwing, I can say, 'I'm going to throw this one as hard as I can,' but without freely thinking it. Right now, I'm to a stage in my development and growth where I can throw without even thinking about."

This is good news for fans, for Meier and for his teammates. K-State has no shortage of talent at quarterback. Allen Webb and Allan Evridge each started games last season and won some games. Kevin Lopina is from one of the nation's most successful high school programs in De La Salle High School in California. Josh Freeman is a physical specimen unlike any other.

But Meier has something else.

Maybe it's his laid-back approach to life or his passion for playing the bongos. Maybe it's the fact that he doesn't take the

Quarterbacks Meier, Webb lead White team to 21-14 victory

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Ron Prince has repeatedly shied away from naming who will start at quarterback for K-State next season.

Saturday's annual Purple and White Spring Game probably did not make Prince's quarterback decision any easier, as four of five K-State quarterbacks threw touchdown passes en route to the White team's 21-14 victory.

Prince said no quarterback gained a decided advantage in the quarterback race, but he particularly liked what he saw from senior Dylan Meier.

Meier marched down the field on the White squad's first possession, completing 4-of-4 passes, including a touchdown pass to senior tight end Donald Raymer.

"What I will say is that Dylan Meier, I thought, did everything he was supposed to do with the ball early," Prince said.

K-State's new coach also spoke highly of Meier's backup, Allen Webb, whose 47-yard fourth-quarter touchdown to senior wide receiver Yamon Figurs put the White team ahead for good.

"You have got to say that it was a very positive effort by Allen Webb to control the clock, so we know he can manage that in the fall," Prince said.

Meier and Webb combined for 132 yards on 12-of-16 passing, including two touchdowns and one interception.

Webb said all five quarterbacks played well, but he, too, was particularly impressed by Meier.

"To me, Dylan stood out the most because of what he has been through on his road to recovery," Webb said, referring to the severe shoulder injury that sidelined Meier last season. "It looks like he hasn't lost a step."

Meier said experience – and fate – contributed to the White team's seven-point win.

"It was meant to be," Meier said. "Experience is invaluable. I guess the old man has still got it."

On the opposite sideline, sophomore Allan Evridge, freshman Josh Freeman and redshirt freshman Kevin Lopina combined for 153 yards on 13-of-22 passing, two touchdowns and one interception in the Purple team's losing effort.

Freeman said he felt nervous when he stepped onto the field in front of the more than 30,000 fans in attendance.

"Coming out, I was a little nervous, a little shaky," Freeman said. "But afterwards, in the second half, I calmed down and tried to take advantage of the opportunity."

With 6:16 left in the third quarter, Freeman completed an 8-yard fade to junior wide receiver Jordy Nelson in the back of the end zone, tying the game at 14.

Freeman finished the evening with 57 yards on 5-of-7 passing.

Prince said he was proud of how well Freeman handled himself in a game situation.

"He made a couple really good throws," Prince said. "You can see he has some pretty good skills. It is just a matter of refining those within the system."

Golfers start for Big 12 Championship today

By Cedrique Flemming
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The time is now for the men's golf team.

There are no more regular season tournaments – it's time for the postseason.

K-State will compete in the Big 12 Conference Championship today and Tuesday at Southern Hills Country Club in Tulsa, Okla.

The Golfweek/Sagarin rankings indicate this field is one of the toughest fields assembled, as four top-15 teams will participate.

No. 2 Oklahoma State looks to defend its Big 12 Championship with four players in the top 50: No. 1 Pablo Martin, No. 18 Jonathan Moore, No. 29 Tyler Leon and No. 44 Trent Leon.

Texas A&M is ranked No. 6, while Baylor is No. 12 and Texas Tech is No. 14.

The Wildcats are ranked 69th, and the highest-ranked Wildcat individual is senior Ben Kern, who sits at No. 86. He said this championship par-71, 7,016-yard course will test every angle of his golf game.

"This course will be a tough test for everyone," Kern said. "It has to be good because they use it for PGA Tour major championships. I feel like I am hitting the ball well and playing with a lot of confidence."

K-State's best conference championship showing was a fourth-place finish in 2004, and the last time the tournament was held at Southern Hills in 2003, the Wildcats tied for sixth.

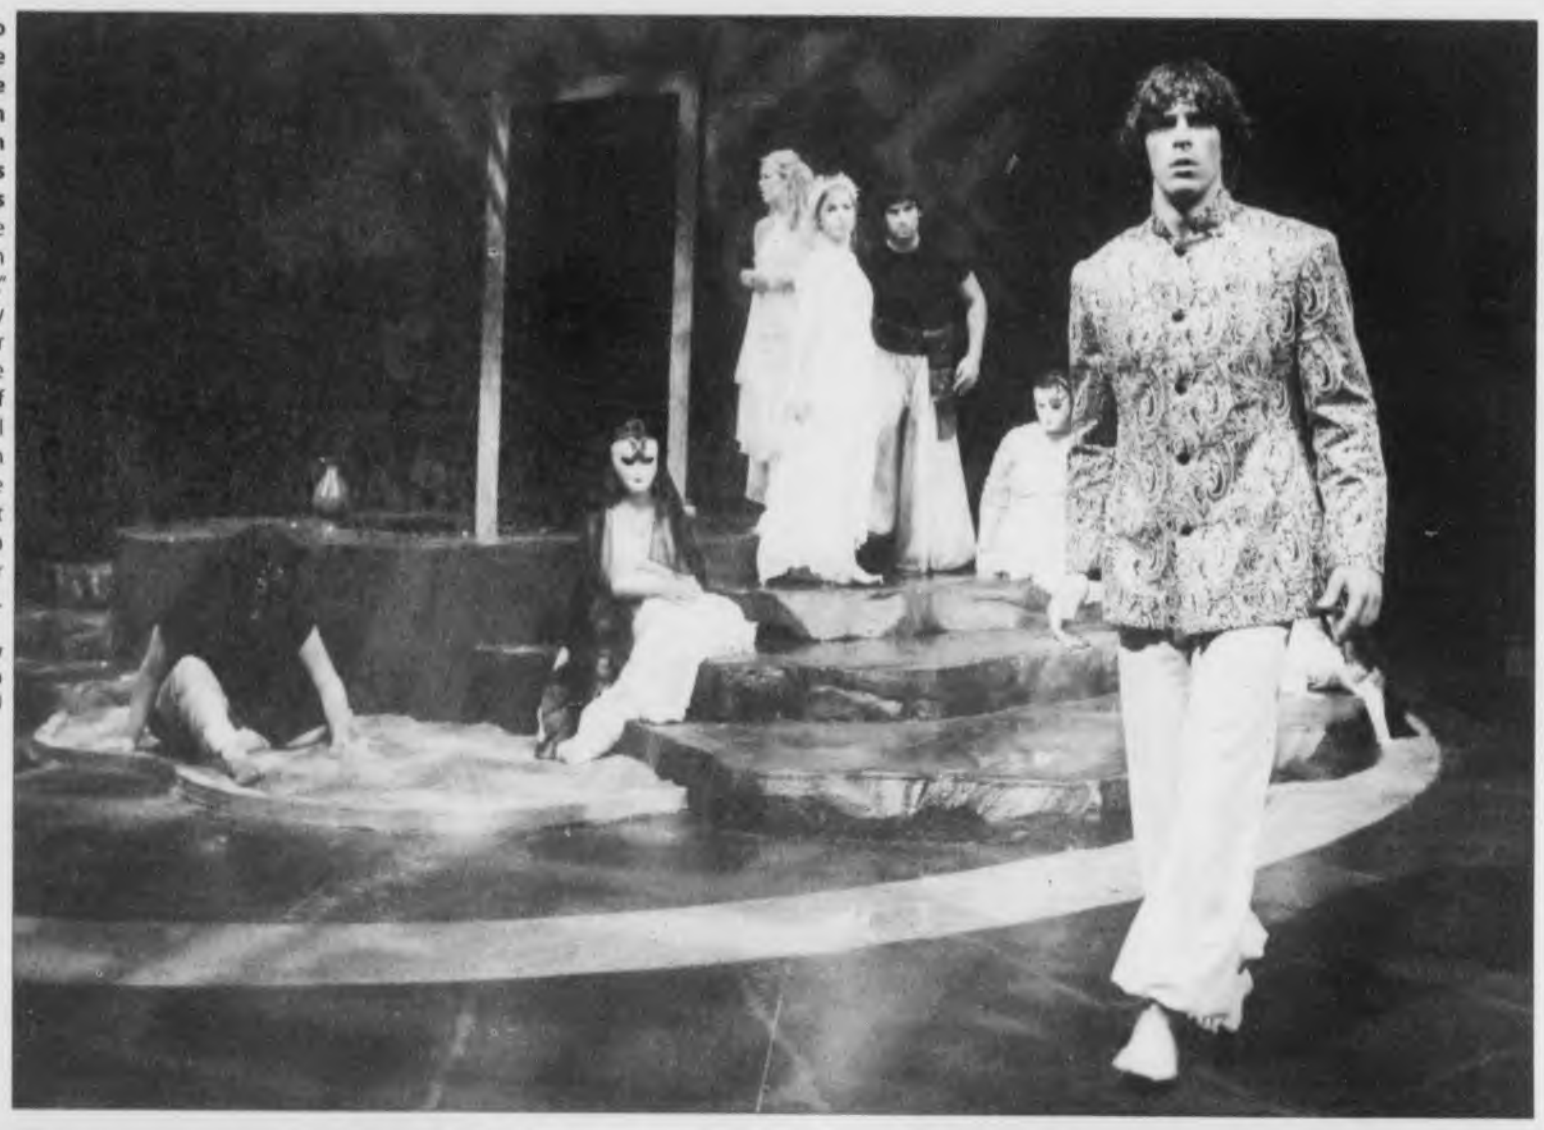
This is the fourth-consecutive time and seventh total time this year K-State will take this lineup to a tournament, and, of the five, only Cummins and Kern have participated in the Big 12 Championships.



The same five players carded the second-lowest 54-hole score in school history with a combined 17-under par at the ASU Thunderbird Invitational on April 8-9

Kinney said he likes the mix of experience and youth.

"Tyler and Ben have been around, and they can show us young guys how to do certain things," Kinney said. "We know what to expect from them, and I think us younger guys have stepped up our game this year, and hopefully it will show in the conference championship."

K-State produces newest adaptation of play, swapping fountain for large pool of water as centerpiece for play's 60 characters

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State theater department is performing a play 2,000 years in the making.

Roman poet Publius Ovidius Naso, known as Ovid, penned the 15-volume "Metamorphoses" some two millennia ago. Ever since, Ovid's descriptions of the creation and history of the world as seen through Greek and Roman mythology has inspired writers and performers.

Recently, Chicago-based dramatist Mary Zimmerman adapted the epic to an award-winning stage production, which has been performed both on and off Broadway and now is being presented in Nichols Theater.

For the K-State group, the play presented some logistical challenges, primarily that Zimmerman's adaptation and all subsequent performances have centered around a large pool of water.

When the group explored the option of creating such a pool, the idea was canned. Nichols Theater simply could not support the weight.

To circumvent this problem, a smaller fountain was constructed to replace the larger pool. According to the Director's Notes, the K-State group is the only known group to perform the play without the large pool.

In addition to water, the breaks between the individual scenes involve a different arrangement of rituals with the elements of earth, fire, water and wind. The transitional rituals also were reinforced by music made with Tibetan bowls and Sanskrit chants.

Metamorphoses

When: 8 p.m. Wednesday through Saturday
Where: Nichols Theater
How much: $11.50 for public, $9.50 for seniors, $7.50 for K-State students

The 12 performers assumed different roles throughout the play, which features more than 60 characters.

Michael Wieser, sophomore in theater performance, said the switches between scenes required focus.

"In those few moments right before you go on, you get into that frame," he said.

Some of the role exchanges involve potentially taboo situations, like a girl cursed by Aphrodite to desire her father. The girl, played by Debra Morland, graduate student in theatre, plans to deceive her father into sleeping with her.

"I focused a lot of attention on her being torn between right and wrong," Morland said. "I thought of what it felt like to have your heart completely broken."

Another scene depicts the story of Eros, the god of love, and his wife Psyche, who is forbidden to see him. In the scene, Eros, played by Jefferson Cox, senior in psychology and theater, is presented with wings and a shoelace's worth of underwear.

Cox said the costume belied his conservatism, and the bareness of the scene was a new experience.

"That was the first butt scene I've ever done," he joked.

The play presented humorous as well as controversial topics, and seemed well-received by the crowd.

Britain queen's 80th

LONDON - Surrounded by family, friends and hundred of guests, Queen Elizabeth II attended a service of thanksgiving at Windsor Castle on Sunday at the end of five days of festivities marking her 80th birthday.

The queen, who has reigned for 54 years, attended the service with her 84-year-old husband Prince Philip, their three sons, their daughter and their grandchildren. Also among the 700 guests were former prime ministers Margaret Thatcher and John Major, Prince Charles' sons, William and Harry, and numerous other royals.

"Your Majesty, not so much through word as by unself-conscious good example, you encourage us; you give us heart," he said, telling the queen that she helped Britons "understand that happiness, fulfillment and humanity can be gleaned from self-forgetfulness."

The queen celebrated her birthday on Friday with a walk among well-wishers followed by a dinner with her closest family members at Kew Palace in suburban London.

On Saturday, 80 cars went on display at Buckingham Palace, the queen's London home. A "Bullnose" Morris Oxford Tourer represented 1926, the year the queen was born, while a Jaguar XK150 was 2006's vehicle.

THIS WEEK... A look at events that occurred during this week in history, other bizarre holidays, happenings

TODAY Pig in a Blanket Day

Because that's what a "Pig in a Blanket" is. Somebody, somewhere decided this was a special treat, so, he created a special day to celebrate this culinary delight.

How does one go about celebrating Pig in a Blanket Day? Cook up some sausage. Make some pancakes. Wrap the sausage inside of the pancake. Add maple syrup.

Chow down.

TUESDAY World Penguin Day

World Penguin Day is a great opportunity to learn about and appreciate one of the few natives of Antarctica. On this day, spend a little time learning about them - a pictorial book or Internet site is fun.

You can also watch a documentary on these cute, popular and grounded birds.

Today also is a time to wear black and white - penguin colors.

Wearing a tuxedo in their honor is an option. It also is popular today to tell a penguin joke or two.

WEDNESDAY 1989: Lucille Ball died

Comedian Lucille Ball died at age 78. During her career, she and husband Desi Arnaz transformed Television, creating the first long-running hit sitcom.

"I Love Lucy" became one of the most popular TV sitcoms in history, ranking in the top three shows for six years and turning the couple's production company, Desilu, into a multi-million dollar business. Ball worked little in the later years of her life. She died of congestive heart failure following open-heart surgery earlier in the month.

THURSDAY 1521: Magellan killed in the Philippines

FRIDAY Kiss Your Mate Day

Researchers tell us that kissing, an important part of romance and intimacy, is the first thing to go in a relationship. If you currently don't kiss your mate everyday, use today to re-establish kissing in your life.

Here are some Kiss Your Mate Day tips and rules: There is no upper limit to the number of times you can kiss your mate today. It is highly recommended that you limit your kisses to just one mate. You can kiss your mate wherever you want (location/place).

You can kiss your mate wherever you want (anatomically speaking). Giving candy or flowers is not required, but we remind that those who do will receive more kisses.

Walk, fun run raise $28K for heart disease research

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Adam Stoddard, 10 months old, was born with congenital heart defects – heart defects present at birth.

The most severe of these defects is transposition of the great arteries, which means Adam's heart is incapable of pumping blood in a normal cycle to all areas of his body, Diane Stoddard, Adam's mother, said.

"He has beaten all of the odds, and he's amazing everyone," Stoddard said.

Adam survives because of two holes in his heart, which allow oxygen to enter the bloodstream and his blood to cycle through his body, Stoddard said.

In light of everything the family has gone through, all have become active in advocating awareness of congenital heart defects – the most common birth defect – of which the causes are unknown, Stoddard said.

Adam was the youngest red cap at the 2006 Flint Hills Heart Walk.

Heart disease survivors, marked by red baseball caps, gathered with friends, family members and activists on Saturday morning in City Park to walk and raise money for the battle against heart disease.

"My family has a history of heart disease, and my great-grandma, specifically, died of heart disease," said Ashlyn Kite, junior in park management and conservation. "But it's not just for my family. I'm here for the whole cause in general."

About 150 people raised more than $28,000 in Saturday's event. The money will benefit the American Heart Association.

The money raised in the Riley County Heart Walk will be used for grants to benefit K-State research, Kent Glasscock, planning committee co-chair, said.

K-State has received about $1 million in grants for heart research, Glasscock said.

"This is an important event for all of us, especially those of us who are survivors," he said.

"The truth about making progress against heart disease is that it begins with each of us caring about our own health."

Participants walked laps around City Park until noon. One lap is a mile, and participants were asked to walk for 30 minutes, Glasscock said.

Also offered was a fun run in which runners completed a route that began at City Park, went up Poyntz Avenue, across Sunset Avenue, down Laramie Street and back to the park.

The American Heart Association Heart Walk has taken place in Manhattan for more than 10 years and nationally since 1992, said Michelle Geering, Central Kansas regional director for the American Heart Association.

Saturday's event was one of the most successful heart walks Manhattan has been host to, Geering said.

"I think it is the most we've ever raised in one event here in Manhattan," she said.

Musical group performs popular Indian songs in 3 languages

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Student Union was alive with the sounds of India on Saturday.

The group KC Brothers performed Saturday afternoon in Union's Forum Hall.

The performance was part of the India Student Association's "India on Screen," which began Wednesday with a screening of "Monsoon Wedding."

The group performed popular Indian songs, many of which came from Indian cinema – commonly referred to as "Bollywood." The performances encompassed a variety of national and regional songs and included three languages.

Satyabrata Das, president of the ISA, said the events, sponsored by the Union Program Council and the Diversity Program Council, have been in the works since last fall.

Das, graduate student in biochemistry, said movies and music were chosen to attract viewers and serve as a fulcrum for education.

"People can come and enjoy and learn about different cultures," he said.

The KC Brothers are not entirely new to K-State, though.

Vocalist Raja Govindarajan said he and another group member performed at a similar event here three years before.

A special guest at this performance was Detroit-based singer Renuka, who seemed to be a hit with the audience, as several of her performances saw attendees dancing from both feet and seat.

Govindarajan said the high energy of the students, the dancing and the interaction make playing in student venues a fun experience for the band.

"We love it," he said.

The event lasted several hours and might have gone longer had the band not scheduled a show for later that day.

"It was wonderful, really just great music of India," said Harish Minocha, retired professor of veterinary medicine.

India on Screen also featured "Rang De Basanti," Sunday night and will conclude at 6:30 p.m. Wednesday with a showing of "Velu-Nakayan," one of Time magazine's all-time 100 best movies in Rathbone Hall's Pasley Hall.

led the White team on a nine-play, 68-yard drive on its first drive of the game capped by an 8-yard touchdown pass to senior walk-on tight end Donald Raymer that split two defenders at the goal line.

"I've always felt like I can put the ball where it needs to be," Meier said. "Velocity-wise, I think it's come. At first, it was a long, long battle getting my velocity back.

"Right now, I'm to a stage in my development and growth where I can throw hard without even thinking about."

As for Raymer, who finished the day with three catches for 23 yards and a score, Prince said he, along with senior running back Donnie Anders and sophomore linebacker Reggie Walker, were players who flashed signs that they could move up the depth chart come fall.

"I'd like to see some of those middle-of-the-roster players," Prince said. "Once I evaluate the tape, and as a staff have a chance to go look at it, we'll find guys like Donnie Anders did a really good job tonight, and Reggie Walker, and some of the players that I was hoping to see take a step forward and do just that.

"We'll obviously go back and check out the tape, and see exactly who made a jump."

Defensively, senior safety Kyle Williams, junior cornerback Byron Garvin and senior linebacker Zach Diles, all on the White team, led the way with six tackles each in K-State's new Cover 2 defense.

Senior linebacker Brandon Archer, named a 2006 team captain along with junior wide receiver Jordy Nelson, senior offensive lineman Greg Wafford and senior defensive lineman Blake Seiler before the game Saturday, said he was impressed with the way both defensive squads handled a game situation in front of so many fans.

"Starting from scratch and being able to put a whole new defense in, being where we are today, we definitely accomplished something," Archer said. "Guys were having fun out there, showing fans that we've gotten our defenses and offenses down. I'm satisfied with our progression right now."

The Wildcats now move into the offseason, in which Prince said the focus will shift to each player refining his conditioning and fundamentals while continuing to learn the new schemes installed this spring.

"I feel like we're on schedule, no more and no less," Prince said. "I wasn't displeased with it at all. We're not ready for the '85 Bears. There's a lot of heavy lifting for everybody in our organization to do to get us ready for September."

Denny Mildenberger, part-owner of Over the Fence Barbecue in Thorton, Colo., said he and his group had fun at the contest.

"We're K-State graduates, so to come home to cook has been an honor," he said. "It's just been a total blast."

Over the Fence Barbecue came in 22nd overall and finished as high as 14th in the pork category.

Mildenberger said the atmosphere at Fan Fest was important to the events.

"This is what barbecue is all about," he said. "This is what K-State is all about. This is what football is all about. People coming out, having a good time and meeting new people; this is what it's all about."

Walking around the barbecue area was a sextet from the area that called itself "The Notables of Manhattan." With Emily Rassette on the tenor saxophone, Shirley Lemmons on the clarinet, Gary Beck on the trumpet, Stuart Workman on the trombone, Chris Banner on the tuba and Tom Cook on the snare drum, they walked around serenading the crowd.

Beck said the group plays and gets different rewards.

"We do play for food, as the signs on our stands say," he said. "But we also play for money. It's fun entertaining people and getting good free food."

BATTLE OF THE BANDS

The Battle of the Bands featured five bands from the Manhattan area. Playing were Flame Hand Robot, Pineapple Truck, Mikey Needleman, Kipper's Cradle and Awaiting Ash.

Kipper's Cradle was announced as the winner of the battle during the third quarter of the football game.

Nikki Flint, senior in kinesiology, said although she was unsure if she would attend the actual game, she was glad she came to the pre-activities.

"It was something to do on a Saturday afternoon," she said.

18-game hitting streak.

Freshman Justin Murray pitched 4.2 innings of scoreless relief to keep K-State in the game, but the Wildcats could not muster an offensive charge against KU starter Ricky Fairchild (5-4).

Fairchild limited the Wildcats to four hits in six innings.

In the seventh, K-State scored on a balk to pull within three runs.

However, a pop-up by Rice ended the inning and stranded two runners on base.

In Friday's contest at Hoglund Ballpark in Lawrence, the Jayhawks broke a 5-5 tie in the seventh on a two-run triple by John Allman. Allman's triple came after a walk and a two-out error by sophomore second baseman Brett Scott. Hornbeck (3-1) gave up both unearned runs and took the loss.

Allman went 3-for-4 in the game and scored two runs for the Jayhawks.

His third-inning double against sophomore starter Brad Hutt scored two runs and put KU ahead 2-0.

MEIER | Quarterback's comeback an impressive feat game of football too seriously.

Whatever it is, Meier has a presence on the football field that exudes confidence and displays a raw emotion that says, "I'm going to put everything into helping my team win games."

But don't doubt his determination, either. Just look at how he has worked himself back into playing condition.

"No one on this team has doubted Dylan," wide receiver Jordy Nelson said. "We knew once he got back from what happened to him a couple years ago, he'd be ready to roll. He's there."

K-State heads into the offseason with a lot of work to do. There's always work to be done when you're a team coming off two sub-.500 seasons.

It's no given that Meier will be under center when the Wildcats open against Illinois State on Sept. 2, but don't count him out. That would be foolish.

"It's been a long haul, and I've been through a lot," Meier said. "It was all meant to be, and I'm as strong now as I've ever been, and that's both physically and mentally.

"I think that's the silver lining in all of it. You don't realize how much you miss something until it's taken away. You've got to take advantage of every opportunity; any door that knocks, you've got to open it one way or another. Here we are. Let's go."

If Meier starts in 2006, or even plays – which he will – that might be the most impressive story of all.

Scratch that. It will be the most impressive story.

Conductor brings 40 years of music, laughter

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Gerald Polich, conductor of K-State Singers, Cadence and the Men's and Women's Glee clubs, has helped students make music for the past 40 years.

Polich, associate professor of music and Montana native, received his undergraduate and graduate degrees from the University of Colorado, Boulder, prior to coming to K-State. Polich was initially hired as a conductor for the K-State Singers. At the time, the students were performing in United Service Organizations tours across the globe.

Polich said he came to K-State without knowing what was in store.

"I came in here with a blank slate," he said. "I didn't know anything about the school or anything about the group."

While at K-State, Polich has taught about 20 courses and now conducts three student-singing groups. He began conducting the Men's and Women's Glee clubs in 1972 and has been conducting the 12-man ensemble Cadence since it began in 1998.

He said the time has flown by, but he still plans on staying around.

"As long as it's interesting, challenging and fun, I will probably be here," he said.

Shane Thoreson, member of K-State Singers and senior in kinesiology, said Polich's talent and teaching style makes singing in the group enjoyable.

"He's a guy who kind of comes in and takes control of the classroom," Thoreson, who is also business manager for K-State Singers, said. "But at the same time, he is a really laid back person. He has a very proficient music ability but chooses songs that are popular for audiences. He makes shows very fun."

Polich also allows students to be involved in all aspects of the group, Thoreson said, including taking positions of leadership.

"He allows you to explore the music," Thoreson said. "He lets students take a lot of responsibility with the group."

Matt Wagner, president of the Men's Glee Club and junior in management information systems, said Polich has the ability to teach his singers the correct way to sing.

When the group makes a mistake while singing, Wagner said Polich will stop the group and mimic the error as badly as possible, making the group laugh at themselves.

"He brings out the guys' ability to sing," Wagner said. "He's a good guy to get along with but tells the guys to get down to work."

Polich has a light-hearted attitude to directing and teaching, Wagner said, but he also keeps the respect of his students.

"He really has enjoyed the students and working with them," Wagner said. "He's not just a professor or a teacher. He's our friend."

Woman reports rape

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A 22-year-old female reported she was raped Saturday to the Riley County Police, Lt. Michael Quintanar of the RCPD said.

The alleged incident occurred in the northeast part of town between 1:30 and 3 a.m., Quintanar said.

The alleged perpetrator was known to her, and the incident is not part of the string of rapes that have occurred in Manhattan in the past few years, Quintanar said.

Student arrested on 2 counts, 1 for battery

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Prashant Bhai Dhirubhai Patel, junior in finance, was arrested Saturday on a Riley County warrant on charges of vehicular homicide and aggravated battery, Lt. Michael Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department said.

The warrant was issued on two counts dating back to Jan. 7, 2006. The first count was for aggravated battery and involved a vehicle that struck Robert Hernandez causing bodily harm, Quintanar said.

The second count related to the death of Stephen Bowers, but Quintanar could not elaborate due to the case having been forwarded to the Riley County Attorney's office.

The attorney assigned to the case was not available for comment.

Bond was set at $5,000.

Fort Riley men arrested

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tausolo Alapati Aieti and Pati Jake Tiumalu, both of Fort Riley, Kan., were arrested Saturday on charges of battery and aggravated battery, Lt. Michael Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department said.

The alleged incident occurred when three Fort Riley soldiers were approached by five males in Aggieville, Quintanar said.

Kevin D. Broderick, Robert K. Kennedy and Frank Meza Jr., were going to their car when confronted, Quintanar said.

After Broderick was beaten into unconsciousness, Tiumalu allegedly kicked him about the body, Quintanar said.

Meza received an injury to his nose, and Broderick received cuts to his face, head, hands and legs, Quintanar said.

Broderick was taken to Mercy Hospital, 1823 College Ave.

Aieti's bond was $500, and Tiumalu's bond was $10,000.

With mumps outbreak continuing, officials tout immunization records

By John Hanna
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – Amid a mumps outbreak, health officials Monday showed off an Internet-based immunization registry to make sure Kansans don't miss vaccinations against such diseases.

The system is 10 months old and allows its users – mostly local health departments for now – to check people's vaccination records, even if they move or change physicians. It's part of a larger effort to boost Kansas' relatively low childhood immunization rates.

The goal is to persuade all of Kansas' 99 local health departments, plus private clinics, hospitals and doctors' offices, to register vaccinations in the system dubbed KSWebIZ. So far, 36 health departments and a handful of private offices and clinics are participating.

Officials from the Kansas Department of Health and Environment and Shawnee County Health Agency had a news conference as part of National Infant Immunization Week. But it came as health officials worry about a growing number of mumps cases in Midwestern states, including Kansas.

Dr. Howard Rodenberg, director of KDHE's health division, said one issue in the mumps outbreak is that some Kansans had only one vaccination before entering school, or none at all. Doctors and public health officials recommend two doses of the MMR vaccine against measles, mumps and rubella before a child enters school.

Rodenberg said he can't say whether Kansas would have fewer mumps cases had KSWebIZ been in place earlier.

"I do think we would have a much better handle on those who got immunized and who didn't, which would help us to get a better assessment of the pattern of disease and maybe help us to have more effective interventions," Rodenberg said.

As of Monday, Kansas reported 227 confirmed or probable cases of mumps in 32 counties. In a typical year, Kansas sees only a few cases; in 2005, there were none.

But the mumps outbreak isn't the only reason for KDHE to publicize the registry.

A report issued last month noted that in 2004, Kansas ranked 43rd among states in the percentage of children under 3 who have received proper vaccinations, at less than 78 percent. The report was commissioned by a new public-private effort to boost vaccination rates.

KDHE Secretary Rod Bremby noted that for years, doctors have recorded shots in pink booklets that parents were supposed to keep at home. He said that method worked – as long as parents didn't lose the booklet or a child's school or doctor didn't change.

Indecent liberties reported

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A case of indecent liberties with a child was reported to the Riley County Police Department, Lt. Michael Quintanar of the RCPD said.

The alleged incident occurred sometime between Jan. 1, 2004, and Jan. 1, 2006, and involved a 13-year-old female, Quintanar said.

"This was a person known to the family," Quintanar said.

Blasts kill 23 in Egypt

CAIRO, Egypt — Three nearly simultaneous bombings hit an Egyptian beach resort popular with foreigners Monday at the height of the tourist season, killing at least 23 people a day after Osama bin Laden issued a taped warning against Westerners. The bombers struck the Sinai seaside city of Dahab in the early evening.

Moussaoui trial at jury

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Prosecutors showed the most gruesome and heart-rending photos of the Sept. 11 attacks again on Monday and told jurors that only Zacarias Moussaoui's death could give the victims justice. The defense asked his jury to spurn retribution and not let a delusional and inept terrorist bait them into making him a martyr.

Fort Riley charges soldiers

Fort Riley — Charges have been referred against two Fort Riley infantry soldiers for the training death of a fellow soldier. The charges were forwarded Monday against Staff Sgt. Jeremy L. Muntz and Spc. James K. Tillery for the Jan. 25 shooting death of Pfc. Donald E. Compton, 20. It occurred as members of Company A, 1st Battalion, 16th Infantry were conducting training exercises on the post.

Q: What is your duty and position?
A: Deputy Commander of the 2nd Battalion, 137th Infantry Regiment, Kansas Army National Guard. No. 2 guy responsible for 700 soldiers and 200 combat vehicles.

Q: What is your job here?
A: Chief of the Joint Visitors Bureau for the Multinational Task Force – Iraq. We work directly for Gen. Casey, theater commander, handling, moving, housing and protecting his strategic visitors into the theater. This includes military, civilian and government VIPs from news reporters up to the vice president.

Q: What did you think about when you found out your unit was being deployed to Iraq?
A: 1 – This is the right enemy in the right place at the right time. 2 - Because we are going over there, we are keeping them from doing evil over here. 3 – We, America's soldiers, are willing to fight and die in order that their (even the terrorists') children will have a chance to grow up and live in freedom and liberty. (The terrorists) are willing to kill our children and anyone else in order to force the world to be the way they want it to be – dictatorial, repressed, stagnant. There is no moral confusion or equivalency here.

Immigration tuition bill affects K-State students

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the national legislature debating immigration policies, advantages granted to undocumented citizens has been a hot topic in the national media.

However, immigration also has been a key issue in the state of Kansas since the passing of House Bill 2145 in 2004.

"There are a whole lot of things about the immigration policy that aren't right, and we're really struggling with those as a country," Rep. Tom Hawk, D–Manhattan, said. "I don't think anybody knows what the answer is."

House Bill 2145, the immigrant tuition bill, states that if an undocumented immigrant has attended a Kansas high school for three years, graduates from a Kansas high school or obtains a Kansas-issued GED and has begun the legal process of becoming a U.S. citizen, he or she is eligible to receive in-state tuition at a Kansas post-secondary educational institution, said Pat Bosco, dean of student life.

"It's been a remarkable benefit for our students and their families who are affected by this unique situation," Bosco said. "It's been well–received by our university community. I can't respond to what others feel."

K–State has fewer than 10 students who are either attending or considering future attendance to whom this legislation applies, Bosco said.

There are some restrictions as to what benefits these students are allowed, such as federal funding.

"Unfortunately, the families and students that are positively affected by this legislation are not included in any federal financial aid opportunities," Bosco said. "What this law does is assist those students who are very narrowly defined by Kansas law to receive in-state (tuition) fees."

In addition to not being eligible for federal financial assistance, the legislation is not effective for students who have established residency in another state, or who have a valid student visa, according to HB 2145.

However, these students are eligible for K–State scholarships funded by private donors, Bosco said.

A lawsuit was filed against HB 2145 shortly after it went into effect, for which an appeal is now pending in the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals, Hawk said.

"The court may or may not hear the case. We don't know," Hawk said.

Furthermore, there have been several attempts by the legislature to repeal the provisions of HB 2145. Some legislators feel it is illegal for undocumented students to get in–state tuition, Hawk said.

While Hawk said he is sympathetic to other legislators, this viewpoint does not match his own.

"I think we're doing the best thing for the children by allowing them to go to school," Hawk said. "I want everybody to become as well–educated as possible. I think that's what makes this country great."

With the legislative session coming to a close, the issue probably will not resurface during this session, Hawk said.

Andrea Pardo, who was the first K-State student to benefit from HB 2145, said the elimination of this legislation is a frightening thought for her and her family.

"They came here to work because the situation in Mexico was really hard for us," Pardo said of her parents. "They just couldn't afford to give education to me and my brother."

Pardo said she pays close attention to the legal proceedings regarding this bill, because it will directly impact her future.

"If the goal to repeal the house bill becomes a reality, that means I will not be able to come to K-State and finish my degree," Pardo said. "It's not just about me, but there are so many students who are graduating from high school that would like to get an education."

Students are appreciative of the legislation and are trying to make the most of the house bill while they can, Pardo said.

However, even with the existence of the immigrant tuition bill, these students still have obstacles to overcome.

"It's very hard. You are coming, and people say 'you should just go back, you're illegal,'" Pardo said. "But if they were in that situation, I bet they would have done the same thing my parents have done."

Boom in design software use might decrease drawing skills

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Graphic design software might weaken classic drawing skills and lead to a decline in creativity, according to a recent CNN report.

According to the report, students spend too much time manipulating graphics and not enough time drafting, formulating ideas and using their imagination.

"There seems to be a huge rush to use the computer," said Mark Bacon, graduate student in architecture.

Architecture students at K-State spend two to three years learning drafting, drawing and other classical skills before they can use graphic design programs. The question is not whether classic drawing skills are needed, though. It is a question of the correlation between what is taught at the university and what happens at an architecture firm.

"It's been that most work lately is done on the computer," Bacon said.

Many students said they are attracted to design software because it is quicker and perceivably more accurate than traditional drafting, which students have said can be frustrating and take hours to finish.

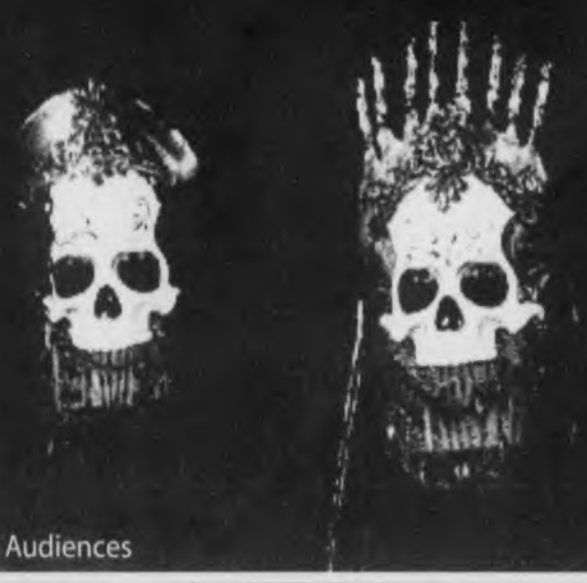
Students in graphic design said they have the same dilemma. Some projects either could be done more quickly on a software program such as Adobe Illustrator by Adobe Systems Inc.

"I think a lot of their resistance to traditional hand-drawing is the perceived higher speed and higher polish of computer-generated images," Rachel Melis, assistant professor of art, said.

Melis said there are reasons that students should spend time drawing and designing with pencil and paper.

"The computer cannot think for them and the level of attention to detail, mark-making, space, composition and craftsmanship necessary for drawing will enhance their ability to think in any media," Melis said.

Although graphic design majors focus on software earlier than architecture majors, Melis said she encourages her students to draw projects before using the computer.



"Many of my students discover through the drawing process that they generate more creative ideas by hand in a messy sketchbook than when staring at a clean computer screen," Melis said.

Both classical drawing and software design are necessary to developing the necessary visual and creative skills of a young architect or graphic designer, said Robert Grame, assistant professor of art.

Grame said he believes there needs to be a coexistence between software design skills and classic drawing skills.

"Because drawing is related with the ability to see, perceive, understand and know, our program, like any other contemporary design program in this country, strongly believes in the importance of drawing as a basis for design-making," Grame said. "It's not about erosion – it's about balance."

TO THE POINT

Students should recall basics, embrace change

In most areas of study at K-State, students are required to learn the basics of their fields before moving on to more technologically advanced methods.

This is how it should be. Architecture and graphic design students first learn sketching with pencil and paper, fostering creativity and testing if students possess the abilities necessary to succeed.

While the fundamentals of any field, from learning to write one's name in grade school to understanding the art of drawing blueprints by hand, are important, it also is crucial for college students to be equipped to embrace technology.

People with the ability to use new software programs are more attractive to employers in all fields. Students cannot rely solely on what they have learned in lower-level classes to carry them to success in a career. Instead, students must seek out opportunities to expand their knowledge in their fields. Students can, and should, explore options through community colleges, online courses and internships.

However, once students have advanced, they cannot forget the lessons learned in 100-level courses. Glitches in technology happen, and when they do, basic skills are necessary to work around these obstacles.

The principles of any field are key to understanding the technological leaps society makes daily, but a flexibility that embraces newer and more efficient methods of work is even more significant.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Dandelion power

Definition of weeds should be reconsidered

I've come to the realization that I enjoy dandelions, a viewpoint that most will consider bizarre.

JONAS HOGG

Why not? They shoot out charming yellow flowers before turning into unassuming puffballs. Simple, yes, but pleasant.

As such, I fail to grasp the great American jihad against the little bits.

They certainly interfere with the great American yard – a tradition so obnoxious and mind-boggling that it could only be produced by the richest, dullest and most obsessive-compulsive culture on the planet.

For what reasons does the Americanized world wage pesticide against the plant? One supposes they are considered weeds, which seems a subjective title. After all, roses and oak trees become weeds if they're not growing where people want them to.

It is for this reason that I become convinced of the disparity between weed and non-weed. Who is to decide?

I think we worry too much about what lives in the yard.

Through my travels it's not a phenomenon to be found elsewhere. The Germans don't do it, nor the Central or South Americans, nor the Kuwaitis (who generally seem grateful that anything lives under that blasted sun).

It could be that dandelion-hatred is simply a manifestation of the American desire to bring order to things; for all its accomplishments I fear America will be remembered as the neurotic accountant of the world, which almost seems accurate.

Has anyone stopped to consider that the combined might of the United States has been unable to halt the spread of dandelions? Legions of weeders and the best minds of Dow Chemical defeated, overwhelmingly, by a plant.

We are not, perhaps, as advanced as we would like to think.

So, what choices do we have with the little buggers?

We could continue the hand-wringing over whether the beflowered monstrosities will invade our yard. We weed and spray and complain in a manner that accomplishes nothing as far as anyone can tell.

We could, in an attempt to preserve the sanctity of our lawns, burn them down and salt the earth. To some, having nothing at all seems preferable to having the wrong something.

We could, in a moment of supreme clarity, realize that dandelions are, at worst, flowers and, at best, tasty on salads. We could acquiesce that dandelions are not likely to cede the fight anytime soon and do not bother anyone other than those looking to be bothered.

Along with this we could realize that dandelions, like everything else, have a place in the world and should simply be left alone to accomplish whatever it is they do.

I have, of course, no faith that the latter will occur. Americans are a meddlesome bunch. Dandelions belie the notion that everything under the sun requires regimentation. The average citizen would sooner believe in Santa Claus than the idea that things should be left alone.

So the war on dandelions shall undoubtedly continue until something of equal insignificance captures the mind of the average joe. Until then, the dreaded puffball shall continue its stand against the evolutionary marvel and the world superpower.

Taking action for 1 night can make a difference

We can't change the world in one day.

We can't stop the wars, feed the hungry and mend broken lives in one 24-hour span of time.

LACEY D. MACKEY

But maybe we can make one step to save a life and make one more voice heard above the deafening noise of this world.

That is what thousands of people across the United States will come together to do for one night this week.

They will be the voices of those who cannot speak for themselves. They will stand in the gap for those who have become invisible.

In 2003, three ordinary guys from California flew halfway across the globe to document the civil war in Sudan.

After hearing that many fled to the south for safety, the men traveled to Uganda, south of Sudan and discovered a group of refugee children running for their lives.

The children were trying to escape the strong arm of rebel soldiers who have forced many of the children to become soldiers in the civil war, teaching them to kill, torture and die for their emotions.

The men videotaped the lives of the children, and after they returned home, they made a documentary titled "Invisible Children: Rough Cut."

The film's shocking depictions of the lives of these children has spread across the nation, and people are getting involved to help change the lives of the invisible children.

The Global Night Commute is one way to be a part of that change. Thousands of people across the country will commute to their city's designated location this Saturday night and sleep outside on behalf of the children who try to survive each day and night in Uganda.

The night is a cry for awareness on behalf of the children of Africa as well as a plea to the U.S. government to help end the 20-year war.

Katie Whitney, freshman in open option, watched "Invisible Children" and said she was amazed at what she witnessed.

"At first, I was heartbroken for these children, but then at the same time, you see all the joy at the same time," she said. "They've made families out of these children."

After watching the documentary, Whitney said she felt prompted to action.

"This movie is so motivating," Whitney said. "It makes you feel like you can do something. It hits you really close and makes you feel like you can make a change."

Whitney is helping to coordinate a student caravan to Topeka on the night of Saturday, April 29. The group is planning to meet at 6 p.m. in the East Stadium parking lot, drive to Washburn University in Topeka and take a 2-mile trek to the Capitol building to sleep for the night.

Whitney said the film has helped broaden perspectives and allowed people to look past their own conditions.

While she said she is hopeful for a good turnout for the Global Commute, Whitney said after the day comes and goes, she will still be working to help the children in Uganda.

"It doesn't just stop," she said. "It's not just going to go away. It's not done."

So if you want to make a difference, change the world and help another.

Let your heart break a little. Cry for the children.

Make today mean something. Then we'll talk about tomorrow.

Humanism a subset of feminism? Isn't that backwards?

Only complete losers smoke on 4/20, so shut up.

I saw Kody Cooper at Wal-Mart today, and for being such a moron, he's still pretty hot.

I knew it was going to be a bad day when I spilled my morning cup of coffee. Then I read Kirksey's newest column and things went from bad to worse.

Silly: Seriously believing that millions a year O.D. on pot. Fourum silly: Seriously believing this and calling someone else "naive."

Deb and I were playing tetherball when the drugs began to take hold.

Kirksey: Were I like thee I'd throw away myself.

Kirksey's a toad. Ugly and venomous.

Oh, how I loathe dance pants.

Seriously, who cuddles in the middle of a psychology lecture? Stop it.

Thank you to the ladies that gave me a ride to my house Friday night, refusing to let me drive home. You're awesome.

Did Daniel Kirksey just try to justify rape?

Do whales poop? And if so, does it go to the bottom and rot on the ocean floor? Does Sponge Bob eat it? What happens?

My girlfriend thinks they toot, but I think that's just because it rhymes.

Right to free press should be respected; newspaper correct to report on arrests, crime

Editor,

Baker University was touched by the criminal justice system twice within one week. The first incident occurred April 2 in Manhattan when a Baker University student was arrested on drug charges.

The second incident occurred April 7 between 7:15 and 8:15 a.m. when a group of individuals stole copies of the Baker Orange from the racks on campus. This theft of newspapers, valued at $2,338.60, is a serious crime.

It is an expectation of the public that the media report about such news. One of the most difficult tasks for journalists is to report on stories that readers don't want to accept. It is understandable that readers may not want to know about tragedies that are difficult to comprehend. To not report about such events is to fail to record their occurrence and falsely represent history.

The right to a free press is essential to a democratic society. It is acceptable to support the individual who was arrested in connection with the drug allegations. However, it is not acceptable to prevent others in the community from finding out about this arrest by stealing the paper.

The members of Kansas Associated Collegiate Press support the staff of the Baker Orange for reporting on the arrest and for publishing the story. We condemn the action of those who removed the newspapers in what we view as an act of censorship.

We support the Baker administration in its pursuit of justice and are hopeful that those who breached other's rights to a free press meet quick and swift disciplinary measures.

Finally, we applaud the Baker Orange staff and faculty for their perseverance and commitment to providing the truth.

Stacy Sparks | KANSAS ASSOCIATED COLLEGIATE PRESS PRESIDENT ON BEHALF OF THE MEMBERSHIP OF KACP

Customers should frequent non-smoking establishments to spur change in free market

Editor,

The Manhattan City Commission should stay away from the overreaching government control of smoking bans.

Those opposed to the ban who claim restaurants and bars will lose customers are dead wrong. The only way bars and restaurants will lose money is if the government says that private business cannot serve food or drinks. People will always eat and drink even if they can't smoke.

Those in favor believe there is a compelling interest in banning smoking based on the health of citizens. For a business to be successful they need two things: labor and revenue. Those who oppose smoking have the choice to take their business elsewhere. Same is true for people looking for employment. People are aware of the risks of secondhand smoke and cannot plead ignorance.

The best way to change is through the power of the pocketbook. The United States economy is based on a free market system. High demand and low supply spur profits. There is a demand for smoke-free establishments in Manhattan. I am willing to bet that if a business owner opens a nonsmoking establishment, their profits would skyrocket.

People want to frequent establishments where they do not leave smelling like smoke. Owners that allow smoking provide a service to those who do want to smoke. Profits will increase for all establishments in Aggieville when owners have the choice. The decision for smoke-free establishments should be by private business owners. The free market works; we just have to give it a chance.

Brett King
SOPHOMORE IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

Supporting a smoking ban would show businesses care about consumer's health

Editor,

Everyone is talking about rights these days. Many smokers believe they have the right to smoke in public places, as they have done for centuries.

This though, impinges upon my rights. My mother told me, "You just learn to accept it, and avoid places where smokers go." But I don't believe anyone should have to do this.

It's nearly impossible to avoid these places. Smoking is allowed in many restaurants, bars, etc. It's our social attitudes towards the subject that make this acceptable. It's ludicrous that this still goes on.

Second-hand smoke is detrimental to my health and everyone around me. I feel like I am jeopardizing my life every time I walk into a bar or a business that allows smoking.

A drug company can be sued because they unintentionally put a product on the market that can cause health calamities. Immediately, they have to pull this off the market because it's a threat to society.

Why don't we have the same ideology when it comes to smoking in public places? Smokers are robbing my clean air with their second-hand smoke, which is unintentional, but there is no denying that this happens.

It's the social acceptability of smoking that needs to be reversed. We need to take small steps to change it. If area businesses do not pass this ban, it will show that these businesses care more about profits and less about the health of their customers.

Use of names in Columbine column could mislead others into repeating actions

Editor,

I was appalled at Thursday's column on the shooting at Columbine High School. The apparent lack of respect displayed by the article was very upsetting for me.

The author states that these individuals were not monsters; only their acts were monstrous.

The minute these young men brought guns into a school and started shooting, they became monsters.

The names have been enshrined on Web sites by other misguided youths, and have given them people to rally behind. The acts of those two individuals should never be forgotten, but their names should drift into obscurity.

I attended a school that was a middle-class, white suburban school just like Columbine, located on the opposite side of Denver.

My school was hit very hard by the reality of what happened, and how it easily could have been us.

I did see the memorial that was set up shortly after the shooting and have never been anywhere so quiet, and yet the expressions of the people said so much.

On April 20, 1999, our schools felt less safe, and a community was trying to find answers as to why kids were killing other kids.

A discussion of the reasons why two kids turned into monsters should be held.

The discussion should never not include the great pain a community felt and the terror the students and faculty felt.

Displays in free speech zones should be handled equally, students could vote on signs

Editor,

Last October there was, what some would call, an "inappropriate" display showing very graphic pictures of aborted fetuses. Many students complained, but nothing was done. On April 20 there was a large drawing of a marijuana leaf with the word "Legalize" written over it by the Union, and it was marked off like there had been a murder.

Because of these two incidents, and the unequal way they were dealt with, I feel the university should regulate any sign, drawing or organization wishing to be displayed on our campus. Currently there are no regulations of what's displayed on campus as long as it's in a "free speech" zone and doesn't prohibit students from going to class. If neither of those two regulations are breached, anything and everything is fair game.

I would like to suggest that the university implement a campus display link on the K-State Web site that allows students to vote on upcoming campus displays. It would require any organization wishing to use our campus to submit a summary article along with pictures of its display two weeks prior to their desired display date.

The Collegian could then run these articles and leave it up to the students. The students could get online and vote for whether or not they want the display on campus. If there is an overwhelming majority of "no" votes, the display would be vetoed. I feel that something must be done about the displays on campus or else it may end up looking like a permanent crime scene.

At least they're not the Royals

The Kansas City Royals should come with a warning label.

AUSTIN MEEK

"Rooting for this franchise might result in the following side effects: nausea, vomiting, insomnia, chronic depression" – and the list goes on.

In addition to causing Tourette's Syndrome, rooting for the Royals makes you an eternal pessimist. One expects the worst possible outcome in every situation. You expect to miss every four-foot putt. One expects to get audited by the IRS. One expects your hamster to die.

It's all part of the losing culture.

I am a lifelong Royals fan, but this column isn't about the Royals. I mention the boys in blue simply to provide justification for my behavior at Sunday's baseball game between K-State and Kansas.

First, let's set the stage: the Cats had scratched and clawed their way to a 5-4 lead in the final game of a crucial series. With two outs in the top of the ninth inning, the Jayhawks had the tying run at second base. Don Czyz, the Mariano Riviera of college baseball, was waiting to come in and slam the door if KU could somehow grab the lead.

KU's Erik Morrison hit a flare to left center. At this point, time seemed to slow down to half-speed, like it does at the end of every sports movie ever made.

I've watched hundreds of Royals games in my lifetime and all of them seemed to end the same way. The other team comes up with a big hit. The Royals make a crucial blunder. I've come to expect disappointment. So forgive me, but I thought Morrison's ball was going to drop. I thought KU would score the tying run, push another run across, and win the game.

Then something funny happened.

Out of nowhere, K-State freshman centerfielder Tyler Link – all 5 feet, 7 inches of him – dove underneath Morrison's sinking fly ball and saved the game. Morrison sank to his knees beside first base. K-State players rushed the field.

Coaches will tell you that games are decided by little things, like execution, preparation, mental toughness. But sometimes all that goes out the window and everything comes down to one play.

On Sunday, K-State made the play.

Let's keep this in perspective. If the Big 12 Conference Tournament started today, the Wildcats would be on the outside looking in. They suffered from critical defensive lapses in the first two games of the KU series. In conference play, they have struggled to find consistent pitching, hitting or defense. This was only one game. But it was a big game.

"Game over," Link said in his slow Texas drawl. "I knew I was going to get there."

That kind of confidence is infectious.

That's what it takes to turn around a losing culture. When it comes to losing, nobody can touch the Royals, but K-State's baseball program has endured a few lean years, as well. Coach Brad Hill's task is to mold his players into winners, and the early returns seem promising.

Hill has instilled in his team a genuine disdain for losing. Losing hurts Brad Hill, even after a win.

"We ain't gonna get very far in this conference showing up once a week," he said following Sunday's game.

Hill is right – this team still has a few things to learn about winning. But Sunday's game was a good start. It might even be cause for a little optimism.

Rallying over red

Cats upset Huskers, bring an end to season

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's tennis team ended its regular season, rallying from 1-3 to defeat No. 41 Nebraska 4-3 on Sunday in Lincoln, Neb.

The comeback is a sign of progress, coach Steve Bietau said.

"It's an important milestone for us," Bietau said. "They won a match in a way that they have never done before."

The match began with the Wildcats taking the doubles point, winning two-of-three matches. Senior Jessica Simosa and freshman Katerina Kudlackova won at the No. 1 doubles, and sophomores Olga Klimova and Fernanda Da Valle won at No. 3.

"We started off playing well in the doubles and won there, but at the beginning of singles, things went in the opposite direction," Bietau said.

K-State (10-9, 6-5 Big 12 Conference) lost the first set on all six courts and quickly lost the second set at three positions, going down 1-3.

At that point the concern was avoiding a blowout, Bietau said.

"Something needed to change at that point. Any change would have been welcome," Bietau said. "Maybe even just losing a little slower because at that point, there certainly wasn't any thought of winning the match.

"We just wanted to stop the bleeding."

After splitting sets with Pamela Castillejos, Da Valle found herself down 0-5 in the third set.

Da Valle rallied to win the third set, 7-5, and the match (1-6, 6-3, 7-5).

After sitting one point away from elimination on three occasions, Klimova fought her way back to win the second set, 7-6, against Ewelina Skaza. Klimova then took the third set to win the match (4-6, 7-6, 6-3).

With the team match tied at 3-3, the last point came down to Simosa's No. 3 singles competition with Milena Schulz-Gartner.

With the Wildcats' lone senior on the court, Bietau said he could breathe a little easier.

"She has the most experience on our team, and she is pretty clear under pressure," Bietau said. "It was more apparent that she knew what to do."

Heading into the Big 12 Tournament, the win against the Huskers should provide some momentum, Bietau said.

"This was a good win for us," he said. "With such a big comeback and the way they were in so much trouble, surviving and persevering is pretty incredible."

The Wildcats are the No. 7 seed in the tournament and will face No. 10 Oklahoma on Thursday at Baylor in Waco, Texas.

Track team finishes strong at KU Relays

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State track team traveled to Lawrence Thursday through Saturday to compete in the Kansas Relays and came back Sunday with additional NCAA qualifiers and a first-place finish.

Qualifying for NCAA Midwest Regionals at the meet were sophomores Kyle Seiler and Morgan Bonds, senior Josh Scheer and the men's 4x400-meter relay team composed of freshmen Tevas and Tevan Everett, junior Casey Becker and senior Christian Smith.

Bonds
800 WINNER

Bonds won the 800-meter run with a time of 2 minutes, 9.81 seconds.

The 4x400-meter relay team clocked a time of 3:9.58, which was good enough for second place and a season-best.

On the second day of competition, Seiler recorded a personal-best javelin throw, with a toss of 212-03, securing him fourth place.

Rogers finished fifth with a toss of 181-11, and sophomore Loren Groves took fourth with a throw of 191-00.

The track team will travel to the Drake Relays in Des Moines, Iowa, on April 27.

K-State volleyball continued its successful spring slate with a 6-3 record over the weekend at a tournament at Loyola Marymount. The Wildcats are now 23-6 in three tournaments this month.

Farr

K-State went 2-0 against Cal State Northridge, 2-1 against Long Beach State, and 1-1 against UC-Santa Barbara and Loyola Marymount. Over the nine games, K-State registered a hitting percentage of .260.

Redshirt freshman Ginta Gabruseva led the Wildcats with 22 kills and hit .280. Sophomore-to-be Megan Farr had the highest hitting percentage for the Wildcats with a .420 and 11 kills.

NBA | Artest suspended 1 game for hitting

NEW YORK — Ron Artest of the Sacramento Kings was suspended one game without pay for hitting Manu Ginobili of the San Antonio Spurs in the head with his forearm.

Artest

The suspension was announced Monday by the league. Artest will miss Game 2 of the Western Conference series on Tuesday.

The contact occurred in the third period of the Spurs' 122-88 win Saturday night against the visiting Kings.

Artest was hit in the mouth by Ginobili's elbow on the game's opening possession. The cut inside his upper lip required three stitches.

BKC | Texas' Tucker to enter draft, sans agent

AUSTIN, Texas — Texas junior forward P.J. Tucker announced Monday that he is putting his name in the NBA draft but will not hire an agent.

Tucker

Tucker led the Longhorns in scoring (16.1 points per game) and rebounding (9.5). Despite that productivity and improving his overall versatility, the 6-foot-5 inside player is considered a tweener by NBA standards.

Tucker acknowledged that he's not yet guaranteed a spot in the league's pre-draft camp in Orlando from June 6-10. He knows he'll have to prove to NBA scouts before then that he has a perimeter game.

"I've got to be able to knock down NBA 3s, that's the biggest thing," Tucker said.

BKC | Doherty leaves Florida Atlantic for SMU job

DALLAS — SMU hired former national coach of the year Matt Doherty on Monday to try reviving a program that hasn't gone to the NCAA Tournament in 13 years.

Doherty

Doherty signed a five-year deal, but financial terms weren't disclosed. Doherty, coming off a 15-13 season at Florida Atlantic, replaces former Oklahoma assistant basketball coach Jimmy Tubbs, who was fired April 6 after two losing seasons and an internal investigation that uncovered NCAA violations.

Doherty, who won a national championship as a player for North Carolina, broke into coaching with Notre Dame in 1999-2000. He took over the Tar Heels the next season and earned the coach of the year award from The Associated Press.

Humidity can have different effects depending on hair type

By Mark Sibilla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the 1939 movie "Danger Island," serial-novel hero Mr. Moto, a fictional Japanese secret agent, famously stated, "It's not the heat; it's the humidity."

Those who have spent any amount of time in Kansas during the summer know the truth to this statement. Excessive humidity can wreak havoc on the human body, and the humidity in the air certainly doesn't do any favors for hair. However, there are ways to combat humidity and maintain hairstyles in humid weather.

First, the definition of humidity. The humidity mentioned in weather reports is known as 'relative humidity.' According to Internet encyclopedia, Wikipedia, www.wikipedia.org, relative humidity is defined as the ratio of vapor pressure of water in the air.

In high humidity, hair will absorb the moisture from the air, said Wida Egan, clinic floor supervisor for Crum's Beauty College, 512 Poyntz Ave.

Egan said how the humidity affects the hair has no difference among the genders but depends entirely upon the texture of the hair.

Fine hair contains more cuticles, the outer, protective layer of the hair that can be seen, and as the extra moisture is absorbed that causes the hair to be weighed down and become limp. Curly hair absorbs moisture at the bend, and as it absorbs moisture, the hair will revert to the curl, which causes the curl to tighten and appear frizzy, Egan said.

The best way to protect hair against humidity is to apply products to the hair with anti-humidity agents, Egan said.

"Every professional line, and possibly some over-the-counter lines, has some product with an anti-humidity agent," Egan said. "We carry Redken, which come in a variety of gels, crèmes, hairsprays and shampoos. These help lock out moisture, which helps keep the style in place better."

If hair is naturally dry due to style or chemicals, Egan said the hair will naturally seek moisture from the air, so anything that can be done to prevent this is recommended.

"It is best to put a treatment on the hair on a weekly basis to help lock in moisture," Egan said. "That way the hair won't look for moisture in the air."

Having a hairstyle that complements your hair is another way to combat humidity-ravaged hair. According to the international hair directory, Hairfinder www.hairfinder.com, working with the natural hair type is an excellent way to maintain style in the summer heat.

For a person with fine hair, a layered cut works the best, because layers help add dimension and texture to the hair, which prevents it from appearing limp and lying flat against the head, according to Hairfinder.

Those with thick, curly hair should choose a cut that is longer and angled. Length helps create more weight on the hair strands, which helps prevent excessive scrunching and frizzing; hair that is angled, or slightly layered, will keep the hair from looking too bulky, according to Hairfinder.

Students react differently to how their hair behaves in humid weather.

Megan Duffy, junior in animal science and industry, said she has fine, curly hair that naturally gets frizzy in humid weather.

"I love my curly hair, but I get kind of bummed out when it's humid out, because I know how my hair will react, so I usually pull it back on humid days," Duffy said.

During a visit to Florida, Eryn Forbes, sophomore in animal science and industry, discovered that she likes how the humidity affected her hair.

"(The humidity) makes (my hair) look amazing. It turned my hair into little ringlets. I didn't have to do anything to it," Forbes said. "I do buy gel to keep my hair from frizzing, but I wouldn't buy anything anti-humidity. I found I like to just let the humidity do its thing."

Comedies dominate MTV award nominees

"The 40-Year Old Virgin" and "Wedding Crashers" lead with five nominations each, MTV announced Monday. Both films will compete for best movie along with "Batman Begins," "King Kong" and "Sin City."

"Virgin" star Steve Carell is up for three awards, including best performance, best comedic performance and best on-screen team with Paul Rudd, Seth Rogen and Romany Malco.

Carell

MTV has added a category for best hero and will present an mtvU Student Filmaker Award. For the first time, acting awards won't be divided by gender, and instead will be grouped under best performance.

A host and performers will be announced later.

The 2006 MTV Movie Awards will take place June 3 at Sony Picture Studios in Culver City, Calif. The show will air at 8 p.m. on June 8 on MTV.

Lack of originality almost sinks Rascal Flatts album

"Me and My Gang"
★★★★☆
Album review by Michael Ashford

Sometimes you have to wonder if there will ever come a day when there will be no more originality in songwriting. After all, there are only so many notes a person can sing.

In Rascal Flatts' latest project, "Me and My Gang," the country trio comes close to running into this problem, as several songs sound melodically similar to songs from the guys' last album, "Feels Like Today."

This often takes place when artists or bands do not write their own music, as is the case with Rascal Flatts. Too often, the music takes on a canned, reheated sound that is obvious from the first listen.

But, to their credit, Gary LeVox, Jay DeMarcus and Joe Don Rooney chose a few songs that save the album.

It moves on to what might be the album's saving grace, the heart-wrenching ballad, "What Hurts the Most."

It tells the story of an ended relationship, but the fear of doubt still lingers.

"What hurts the most/ Was being so close/And having so much to say/Then watching you walk away/ And never knowing/What could have been/And not seeing that loving you/Is what I was trying to do."

This is easily the most original piece on the album, and it gives the album life.

"Backwards," is a classic country song, i.e., a real foot-stomper. What more could you ask for in a country song than a bar, a break-up and a wild celebration afterward?

Courtesy Art

The fourth track, "I Feel Bad," is where the unoriginality comes in. The song's chorus sounds like "When The Sand Runs Out," with different words.

Other tracks that sound like songs from the previous album include "My Wish," which might make people think of "The Day Before You," and "To Make Her Love Me," which sounds like "Holes."

Mixed in are songs such as "Yes I Do," the album's seventh track – another song that helps give the group credibility with this venture.

"Yes I Do" has a sort of island feel to the beat when the song starts and moves into a flowing song of regret and longing for a lost love but with a fun, upbeat tempo to it.

Seeing a trend here?

The song is interesting though, because LeVox, the lead singer, admits faults in the first verse and backs it up with a "Yes I Do" to lead into the chorus. In the second verse, LeVox professes he doesn't care anymore, and then before the chorus, turns it around and says "Yes I Do."

"Ellsworth" is a touching song about a grandmother stricken with what is presumably Alzheimer's disease. The woman is forgetful of everyday events, but when she thinks about her husband and the time they spent in Ellsworth, Kan., in 1948, the memories rush back.

The album also takes on a religious persona with "To Make Her Love Me" and "He Ain't the Leavin' Kind."

In "To Make Her Love Me," LeVox pleads with God to help open the eyes of the woman he loves, while "He Ain't The Leavin' Kind," testifies to God's unwavering commitment to mankind.

The title track is a rocking ode to the band's posse across the nation, driven by a hard-charging beat and a flashy fiddle that is perfect for a field party around a bonfire.

While Rascal Flatts flirts with some unoriginal content on "Me and My Gang," there are enough new-sounding melodies to warrant making the album part of your collection. "What Hurts the Most," "Backwards" and "Yes I Do" define the album and make it a wise purchase.

Forum panelists offer insight into daily life in Iraq

By Kelsey Childress
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

About 40 people attended the Manhattan Alliance for Peace and Justice forum on the war in Iraq Monday night in the Big 12 Room of the K-State Student Union.

"This program tonight is supposed to enlighten us on what is happening overseas," Matthew Cobb, alliance president, said. "We need to open our hearts, minds and spirit as to what is happening on the ground in Baghdad. There is no side tonight. Step into their shoes and listen to what they have to offer."

One of the featured speakers was Cliff Kindy, a member of Christian Peacemaker Teams, who spent five months each year for three years in Iraq and also has been to Colombia, the Gaza Strip and Chalapas, Mexico. "My wife and I have an organic market garden. That is how we make our living," Kindy said. "And that is where I heal from my visits to other countries."

The forum also featured U.S. Army Capt. Christopher Shaffer, who is serving at Fort Riley. Shaffer graduated from the U.S. Military Academy at Westpoint, Va., in 2002 and was in Iraq from April 2003 to April 2004.

"In Iraq, I guarded a water bottle treatment plant in Baghdad," Shaffer said. "There are a lot of other people who are more qualified to be here than I am. Tonight, I'm not here to debate, I'm here to describe what I did and what I saw."

After the introductions, Cobb asked Shaffer and Kindy a series of questions about their experiences in Iraq.

The first question was about leadership, and finding the strength to lead from the inside out. Both men emphasized the tension of the situation.

"When you're in a stressful situation, the layers of emotion that would be socially acceptable are cut down. When you are mad, it bubbles to the surface. It is same if you are happy," Shaffer said. "I realized that I needed to be peaceful and calm. You walk down the street that is filled with a thousand people, and you don't know who is good and who is bad."

Kindy described a situation where two Iraqi men asked to meet with his group, and after telling his men about their struggles, they declared that they were assigned to destroy the building that housed Kindy's group and kill everyone inside.

Joslyn Brown | COLLEGIAN
Cliff Kindy, Christian Peacemaker Teams and steering committee member, speaks as part of "Wisdom Distilled from Iraq: Service Learning Experiences from Combat Veteran and Peace Observer.

"It was at that moment I said to myself, 'I am going to die,'" Kindy said. "But we stayed calm. We continued to see them as human beings because we listened to them."

Cobb asked the men about their lives after they went to Iraq, and how helping the Iraqi people has affected their lives.

"You realize how materialistic we can be sometimes," Shaffer said.

"A lot of them only know the United States by our pop culture. They didn't want their girls to start dressing like Britney Spears. The culture that we propagate is how we are perceived."

Student art shown in hospital

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Handcrafted sculptures by K-State students will be displayed this week at Mercy Regional Health Center.

Students in Julie Gibbs' three-dimensional design class will present their works, sculpted from natural materials, at Mercy Regional Hospital's Healing Garden. The exhibition will be on display Wednesday through Monday. Visitors are welcome.

Gibbs, graduate student in fine arts, said she chose the project for her class from ideas presented in the book "3 Dimensional," written by Lynda Andrus, professor of art. Gibbs said the projects teach the students the elements of design.

Gibbs chose the hospital after she visited a friend and saw the open space available.

"I thought, 'Wow, wouldn't that be a wonderful place to have a sculpture,'" she said.

Most of the materials used for the pieces include natural objects such as sticks, clay, hemp, stones, potted plants and fabric. Students worked in groups of two or three to create their sculptures.

Ellen Cummings, sophomore in fine arts, said working on the project with a partner has been a new experience.

"It's very interesting to work with some of the community," she said.

Cummings is working with her partner on the "Fountain of Healing," created mostly of sticks, other organic materials and fabric.

Cummings said the piece is supposed to fit into the surroundings, and when planning for the sculpture, she and a partner noticed a sprinkler system nearby and got the idea for their project.

Brett Jankord, sophomore in fine arts, said he and his partner picked items from nature and featured earth-tone colors to create their piece.

For those viewing his work, Jankord said he wanted people to be able to enjoy a new addition to the surroundings.

"I want them to be able to see something a little different instead of just the aesthetic environment," he said.

Jankord said the project has been a good experience.

"I've really enjoyed working with more organic materials," he said.

2 brothers purchase hot tub rental service

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State student recently sold Captain Wildcat's Hot Tub Rental to two brothers.

Brett Allred, senior in management, said he sold Captain Wildcat's Hot Tub Rental because he is graduating. The rental service consists of two large hot tubs and a trailer.

"I thought of the idea for the hot tubs last year. It was just out of the blue and random," he said. "It seemed like a good idea at the time, but a lot of people did not think it would work out."

Allred created Captain Wildcat's Hot Tub Rental during winter break in 2004-05. He said he made back all of the money he put into the business, plus an additional $9,000.

"I didn't really know what I was doing, but I just made it work," Allred said. "It took a lot of experimenting."

Allred said he thought the brothers who purchased the hot tub rental business, Brian and Richard Thompson, would make more of a profit than he did.

"More and more people are finding out about the hot tubs and are wanting to rent them," he said. "I am really going to miss (the hot tubs) – it was such a great set-up."

Brian, sophomore in preprofessional construction science and management, said he and his younger brother went in together to buy the hot tubs. The brothers bought the hot tubs for between $4,000 and $6,000, Brian said.

"I heard they were up for sale, and I saw money signs," he said. "I want to make money for college so I don't have to be such a strain on my parents."

Brian said he is still in the process of learning how to maintain the hot tubs and is planning on making the hot tub rental business a part-time job.

He also plans to increase business and said he plans on charges similar to Allred's.

Richard, a senior at Olathe East High School, said he was looking forward to the hot tub business being his part-time job when he moves to Manhattan to attend K-State this fall.

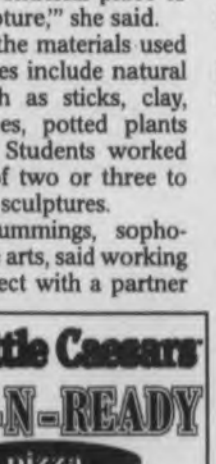
"I went to some parties where there were hot tubs, and I thought it was a good idea," he said.

Richard said his brother suggested they go in as partners for the business.

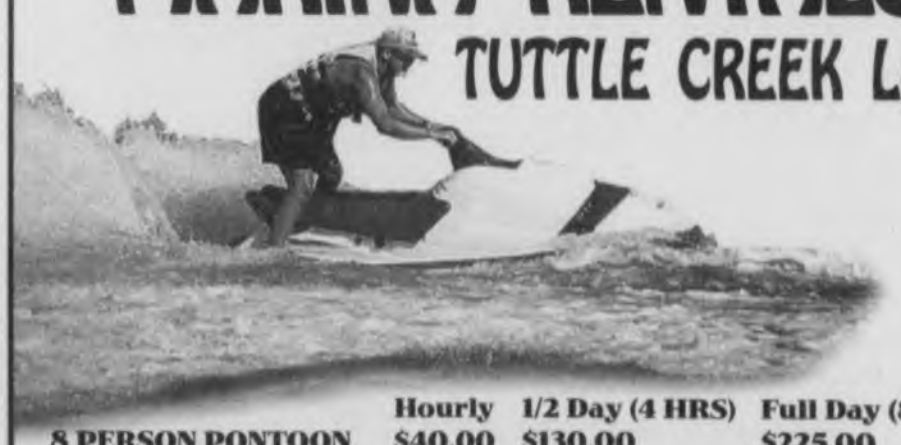
"He suggested it to me because I have more money than he does," he said. "He thought it would be a good experience for me so I wouldn't have to find a part-time job for my first year of college."

Richard said they were planning to do additional marketing to house parties.

Richard said he and his brother have plans to change the name of the rental business but are not sure to what yet.



"We are going to try to get a single hot tub if we can find one for real cheap," he said.



Richard said they are considering offering discounts for particularly cold weekends.

"I think the first part of the semester we will have no problem renting it out every weekend but if it gets slow we will try and do discounts," he said. "There is no point of it sitting there and not getting used."

County Commissioners consider lowering mill levy

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Commission has begun an informal discussion of lowering the county's mill levy to help control high property valuations.

A mill levy is the dollar amount taxpayers pay for every $1,000 of assessed property value. Each city has a different mill levy. The current mill levy for Manhattan is 115.796 units and 120.553 units for Ogden, Kan.

Riley County Commissioner Al Johnson said Riley County Appraiser Sam Schmidt recently went through the appraisal process in Riley County and indicated individual valuations had an average increase of about 20 percent, with some property values as high as 50 percent. Community valuations also were up about 10 percent.

Johnson said the valuations likely have been in response to the growing need to house an increased number of soldiers returning to Fort Riley.

He said the county was not within the average percentile of growth, which is possibly making property appraisals go up even higher.

Johnson said he would recommend lowering the mill levy to generate sufficient funds for the budget.

The commissioners informally have discussed lowering the mill levy, but because they have not begun working on the annual budget, Johnson said it is too soon to discuss the specifics of lowering the levy.

"It's premature to be talking too much about what the requirements would be," he said.

Riley County Commissioner Bob Newsome said the commission would not begin to address the issue seriously until they receive more information about the 2007 budget, possibly around the beginning of July.

Riley County Commissioner Michael Kearns said increased assessments in Riley County are in the same ballpark as some surrounding counties, such as Pottawatomie and Geary.

Kearns said it would be good if the mill levy was lowered, but the commission needs to see what the final numbers look like.

If the mill levy is lowered, Kearns said the commission would need to address what would happen in future years.

But, Kearns also warned against premature action against the levy.

"You don't want the yo-yo effect," he said.

Even if the mill levy is lowered, Johnson said actions should be taken within state legislation to address the unusual situation Riley County has experienced with the sudden influx of residents.

While lowering the levy would have an initial effect on decreasing property tax, Johnson said more needs to be done for the future.

"That's like trying to treat the symptoms," he said. "If this continues, only the wealthy would be able to live in this community."

Controlling the mill levy is one of the only ways local government can combat the high property valuations, but Johnson said when things get back to normal, the levy is often the first thing to be altered.

"The downside is you can lower the mill levy, but when the situation ends, you have to raise it," Johnson said. "Then people don't like that. No one wants to do that."

Marina offers boating, food services

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan residents Kathy and John O'Malley have been boaters for years, and when they heard Manhattan's marina was being sold several years ago, Kathy said they jumped at the chance.

"He (John) tells everybody that we never wanted to pay out to have our boat in, so we had to buy the marina to put the boat in," Kathy said.

When she was young, Kathy said boating and going to the lake were popular things to do. Now the group is trying to bring it back.

The marina, which is located at Tuttle Creek State Park, is open from April 15 to Oct. 15. Kathy said it is nice to have a seasonal business, but the marina keeps them busy and has solid use from about the middle or end of May to Labor Day.

The owners added a $130,000 expansion to the marina this year, including 14 new boat slips. It now has 62 boat slips total, which are full, Kathy said.

"It's very exciting," she said. "We're ecstatic."

A new layout deck also was added for anyone wanting to sunbathe, Kathy said.

The marina rents out boats, pontoons and jet skis for customers and sells food, including grilled items. Kathy said they do all kinds of functions, including birthday parties.

Jessie Unruh, president of K-State's Wakeboard Club, said the group goes to the marina several times each week and enjoys the work the new owners have done.

"As far as I know, a lot of people have noticed," Unruh, senior in mass communications, said. "There's so much more space."

Jarrid Herrmann, senior in agricultural technology management, is a member of the Wakeboard Club and has been to the marina several times.

"They're very friendly," Herrmann said of the management staff. "They've really cleaned the place up."

Though the marina has been available for several years, Autumn Wright said she is always surprised by the lack of awareness about the marina.

"It amazes me how many people don't know that we have a marina," she said.

Because her husband works during the day as an electrician, Autumn said working with the marina keeps her busy.

"We really enjoy working outside and being on the water," she said.

Autumn said she and Kathy grew up together and have had a fun time working together and sharing ideas for the marina.

With the expansion and 14 new boat slips, Autumn said the summer will be full.

"That's going to bring in all those new families," she said. "We're going to be busy this year."

Greek councils win outstanding service, leadership awards

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's Panhellenic and Interfraternity councils attended the Mid-American Greek Council Association annual meeting in Chicago, where both were awarded several honors.

The Panhellenic Council consists of members from the 16 sororities on campus, while the Interfraternity Council includes members from the 30 fraternities.

The awards give recognition for outstanding programming in different areas, Scott Jones, director of greek affairs, said.

"I believe part of their mission is to ensure the continued growth and health of greek communities," he said. "The way they measure and evaluate the level of excellence is through a series of questions about programming and managing issues."

Jones said each council member is given a series of questions that they have to answer and provide documentation for.

"They're put together in notebooks," he said.

The notebooks are evaluated by two council members from another campus who score each of the questions, Jones said. The total score is then tallied in each category, and those who score at or above a certain level are recognized as outstanding.

"If you submit notebooks in all of the categories, you're eligible for the overall award," he said.

Councils are judged in separate divisions, determined by the size of the greek system at the represented school, he said. The MGCA includes a 24-state region.

According to a media relations press release, the Interfraternity Council, which competed in the Sutherland Division III, was recognized for outstanding achievement in community service and philanthropy; leadership and education development; risk reduction and management; academic achievement; council management; membership recruitment; and public relation. In addition to the above categories, the Panhellenic Council, which competed in the Jellison Division IV, was recognized for outstanding achievement in self-governance and judicial affairs.

"I think it is a pretty accurate reflection of the work that they've put in for the entire year, and to be recognized in the number of categories that they were is indicative of their ongoing commitment to excellence," Jones said.

The Panhellenic Council has won the overall award in 2005. The Interfraternity Council won their overall award this year.

"I was really proud of all the students. I think we did a really good job – we put our best foot forward and worked hard all year," said Lisa Fant, assistant director of greek affairs.

New tax placed on music downloads

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Revenue departments in 15 states and the District of Columbia recently began taxing music downloaded and bought from the Internet.

Kansas is not one of the states affected by the new tax, said Bob Clelland, taxpayer advocate for the Kansas Department of Revenue.

"This is a tax we do not currently have but it could come up at any time," he said.

Clelland said the tax would be collected at the company level, meaning the company hosting the music would have to charge the tax when a user purchases a tune.

"Much of the taxes you impose are voluntary," Clelland said. "Any sales taxes are a voluntary report of the retailer. The individual who purchases the item loses all significance in the deal."

The new tax recently was enforced in Utah after the Utah State Supreme Court ruled that the transfer of bytes and bits meets the definition of tangible personal property, said Charlie Roberts, public information spokesperson for the Utah Department of Revenue. Roberts said he is unaware of any problems as a result of the new tax in Utah.

"These businesses are treated the same as any other businesses that are audited and required to pay the tax," he said.

Roberts said if an individual purchases music from a company not in Utah they are required to write the item on their personal form.

"They have that responsibility to ensure the tax is paid," he said.

Samantha Mundwiler, senior in history, said she downloads from iTunes and would not be happy if the new tax was enforced.

"I can kind of see where they would want to make money on it, but its 99 cents a song so I don't think they will be getting a huge amount of profit from it," she said.

Mundwiler said the tax could affect how many songs she would buy.

"I would probably still download but it would have a small impact on how much I would buy," she said.

Moussaoui case given to jurors for deliberation

By Michael J. Sniffen
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ALEXANDRIA, Va. - Prosecutors showed the most gruesome and heart-rending photos of Sept. 11 again on Monday and told jurors that only Zacarias Moussaoui's death could give the victims justice. The defense asked his jury to spurn retribution and not let a delusional and inept terrorist bait them into making him a martyr.

With those final arguments, the life of the 37-year-old Frenchman was placed in the hands of the same nine men and three women who early this month found him responsible for at least one 9/11 death even though he was in jail at the time.

Now they must weigh the suffering and the glee the confessed al-Qaeda conspirator took in it on the witness stand against his role, his mental health and background to decide whether he deserves the death penalty or life in prison without possibility of release.

The jurors deliberated three hours and went home for the day. They will resume Tuesday morning.

Prosecutor David Novak showed photos of a charred body in a Pentagon office, body parts at the base of the World Trade Center, and of young children who lost a parent.

"No one can give them justice but you," Novak said. "You are the voice of this nation."

He told jurors a death penalty would say, "We are the United States of America, and we are not going to put up with a bunch of thugs who invoke God's name to kill nearly 3,000 Americans."

Displaying a photo of the youngest 9/11 victim – 2 1/2-year-old Christine Hansen holding an American flag – who died on her way to Disneyland, Novak recalled Moussaoui's "utter lack of remorse" when he took the witness stand and asked, "How can any human being rejoice in her death?"

With such arguments, defense attorney Gerald Zerkin said, "the government opts for retribution." But "this is about history," he said. "It is about how our justice system responded to the worst terrorist attack on our soil."

He said even the Nuremberg trials of Nazis after World War II handed out only 11 death sentences for "the worst atrocities in the history of man" and paved the way for reconciliation.

Moussaoui is a "a veritable caricature of an al-Qaeda terrorist," "the operative who couldn't shoot straight" and "the only al-Qaeda operative inept enough to be captured before 9/11," Zerkin said.

"He is offered as a sacrificial lamb" while no charges are brought against 9/11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, coordinator Ramzi Binalshihb and other captured al-Qaeda leaders, Zerkin said.

He said the government "has held out the prospect of Moussaoui's execution as the cure" for the pain of the victims. But because their pain is so severe, "his death cannot and will not make them better."

Zerkin recalled other relatives of victims who testified on Moussaoui's behalf that they began to recover when they found ways to do something positive.

Moussaoui's testimony about how he relished the pain of the victims "is proof that he wants you to sentence him to death," Zerkin said. "He is baiting you into it. He came to America to die in jihad and you are his last chance."

5 Kansas teens charged for threatening to attack school

By Roxana Hegeman
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

COLUMBUS, Kan. – Five teenagers were charged Monday with threatening to carry out a shooting spree at their southeast Kansas high school in an alleged plot that authorities say was foiled after details appeared online.

Prosecutors charged Charles "Coy" New, 18, Robert Hunt, 17, Caleb Byrd and James Tillman, both 16, and Andrew Jaeger, 15, each with one count of incitement to riot and one count of making a criminal threat. All five appeared in court Monday, where Judge Robert Fleming set bond at $50,000 for New, who was charged as an adult. The four juveniles were being held until a May 3 status hearing.

New would be under house arrest if he were to post bond.

"These are serious allegations and they scared me as I read them," Fleming said.

However, Fleming said Assistant Attorney General Stephen Maxwell's request to set New's bond at $500,000 was excessive.

"At this point, the state is very concerned with public safety," Maxwell told the judge.

If convicted, the teens could face seven to 23 months in jail on the charge of incitement to riot and five to 17 months in jail on the charge of making a criminal threat. Each charge also carries a fine of up to $100,000.

Families of the five teens filled the courtroom during the hearing. One family passed a package of tissues around. Another woman wailed just minutes before the hearing began after the bailiff handed the family some court papers.

Deputy Attorney General Eric Rucker said it would be premature to say whether more charges would be filed since the investigation continues. "It is a very fluid case," Rucker told reporters.

"We have not ferreted out all the facts, but we are comfortable with the charges filed today," he said.

Samuel Marsh, a defense attorney for Tillman, praised the attorney general's office for "not overreacting to hysteria" by filing more-severe charges. Marsh also said "the truth will come out" as the legal process runs its course.

The teenagers were arrested Thursday – the seventh anniversary of the Columbine High School massacre in Colorado – after a message about the alleged plot to attack Riverton High School appeared on the Web site Myspace.com. All five teens were held over the weekend.

Cherokee County Sheriff Steve Norman has said the teens planned to wear black trench coats and disable the school's camera system before starting the attack between noon and 1 p.m. Thursday. Sheriff's deputies found guns, ammunition, knives and coded messages in the bedroom of one suspect.

JoAnna Derfelt, an attorney for Jaeger, said the incident shows students have not gotten the message about the seriousness of the Columbine attack.

"You don't say bomb on an airplane. It's the same thing. You don't say Columbine in school," Derfelt said. "Columbine is not something to talk or joke about, and I think that message hasn't gotten to kids yet."

She also said her client has been portrayed inaccurately. She said Jaeger is a Boy Scout, a good student and is close to his family. "He is not a loner," she said.

SOLDIER | Strong support system makes separation bearable

most from back home and why?
A: Having a day off. Really truly off with no requirements of any kind. Not shaving once in a while, the chance to just be a slacker for a few hours. I also miss fresh bread, soft and fluffy.

Q: How is your family coping with the situation of you being deployed?
A: I am fortunate that my wife and I are and always have been true partners. She is the most remarkable person I know and is running our affairs entirely. She has a great support system of friends and family. She stays very busy working on her masters degree and volunteering all over Topeka. My children are both pubescent and miss me terribly but are also glad I'm not around to probe into their personal lives and embarrass them in front of their friends. They are old enough to understand how important this is. We all agree it would be better if I were home but understand when the time comes and your nation calls that you have to grit your teeth, stop whining and get on with it..

Q: What do you do to pass the time or unwind to keep your mind off of duty in a War Zone?
A: My job involves traveling all over Iraq for several days at a time. I escort very senior dignitaries on a daily basis. When I'm not on a mission, I have just enough free time to exercise, do laundry and catch up on all my other military work (paperwork). I try to read for an hour or so every night. I miss reading a lot.

Q: What has been your most memorable moment here?
A: I escorted Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld for four days, including Christmas. I watched this remarkable man let himself be pawed over and hugged, stand for thousands of photos, sign hundreds of autographs, shake every hand offered, for four days, with a smile on his face and joy in his heart. This man loves the American serviceman and woman and truly appreciates what we are doing here. He never left a place until every soldier was satisfied. Incredible devotion to duty.

Q: Has your opinion about Iraq changed since you've been here?
A: Yes. I believe more than ever that this will be a great nation in only a few short years. The people here work hard, have an entrepreneurial spirit and want their lives to be better. They know they have a chance never before given to an Arab-region peoples: to live in freedom and democracy for the first time in 10,000 years. There are lots of problems here but this is an ancient region, the cradle of civilization, and they have the pride to make a better future happen.

Q: Do you think the news coverage presents an accurate account of the Iraqi conflict?
A: Are you kidding me? The national media outlets are so far out of touch with the real story here they might as well be making it up. All they care about is getting video of blood. Death sells and brings in viewers. The real story is in the daily SWEAT-M analysis that is going on all over the country: Sewer, water, electricity, academics, trash and medical improvements and development. All more and better every day. Also improvements in the training and deployment of the Iraqi Army and police forces, and in the development, spread and adoption of the rule of law after 10,000 years of the rule of the tyrant.

Q: Do you think the election process will work for Iraq and the Iraqi people, and do you think Iraq will ever achieve some democratic form of government?
A: The process already has worked three times. As I write this, the prime minister has been selected and other ministers are being negotiated. It is important to note they have chosen a parliamentary-type system, not an American system of government. It will take a little patience to work out how many ministers and how many and who will be delegates to the national assembly. Each election participation has increased and the buy-in improves. I'm no Pollyanna. I recognize the difficulties ahead, especially in keeping the various factions from going their own ways as independent mini-states.

Q: What are your personal experiences with the Iraqi people and how do you think they perceived you?
A: The Iraqis I have met (a lot, all over the country) are friendly, social and eager to be appreciated. There is a lot of poverty still, as there was under Saddam. But as the economy improves, more people get to work and provide for their families. This is a requirement for the men over here. Regardless of whether we like it or not, this culture values men over women and a man who cannot care for their family suffers shame. Shame is very, very bad here. Sorry, I'm kind of rambling. I have tried to learn a little Arabic and they really appreciate the attempt to be polite and greet them in their own language. Also, I give away buffalo nickels to everyone I meet and through pictures and bad Arabic, explain I'm from Kansas where the buffalo roam. Also, I show pictures of my children and wife. This is a powerful tool to connect, as family is so important over here. Family and honor are what this place is all about.

Q: Do you agree with all of the decisions made by President Bush concerning the situations in Iraq? Why or why not?
A: It is so easy to second guess one year or three years later. Anyone can Monday Morning Quarterback. It's the man in the arena that matters. Yes, had we realized the entire national police and all local governments were going to collapse, along with the military victory, then another approach would have been a good idea. But no one saw that coming. Had we seen the development of Iraq as the theater of combat for the current (and next 40 years) global war on terror, then different steps could have been taken to prepare for the IEDs and suicide bombers. But no one saw that coming. Not even the left-wingers who now profess to have all the answers. So, no, our president is not perfect or omniscient. But he is pretty damn good and I'm proud to have him as my Commander in Chief.

Q: How much longer do you think we will be in Iraq?
A: I personally believe (not as a soldier or spokesman for the U.S. government - only as Rog, the guy who reads a lot of history and pays attention to world news and patterns and trends) that our forces will drop from 160,000 to fewer than 80,000 by the end of the year and will be down to 40,000 the year after that. I believe, like in Japan, Germany and Korea (where we still have troops 60 years later) that some American forces will remain for an extended period – at the invitation and insistence of the Iraq people and government – as a buffer against the aggression of Iran and Syria.

Q: How has being deployed changed your outlook on the future?
A: It has reinforced my opinion that the United States of America is a force of good in the world. And that the continued advance of freedom and individual liberty over dictatorship and totalitarianism is a requirement for long-term world security and peace. I know it's a contradiction that we must fight to have peace, but the history of the world shows this is true. Those who will not fight for their freedoms are doomed to disappear from the Earth.

Q: When this is over, do you think it was worth it?
A: I recently wrote to my children explaining I am here today for them, their children and their grandchildren. Our president has finally drawn a line in the sand and said that this non-state terrorism must stop and he has distinguished between the methods and targets of terrorism versus the methods and targets of those seeking freedom under oppressive dictators. Advancing freedom, individual liberty and the rule of law over the rule of whim and caprice of the dictator, king, or tyrant is always worth it. It is probably the only thing truly worth fighting for.

Amy Aadalen, member of K-State Singers and junior in pre-professional secondary education, said she feels blessed to be under Polich's direction.

"He is extremely knowledgeable about music, but at the same time, he knows how to have fun," Aadalen said. "He really builds relationships."

When the group goes on music tours, Aadalen said Polich jumps between the role of father figure and friend.

"He's really, really generous and buys a lot of our meals for us or takes us to different tour sites," she said. "But at the same time, he's our friend. He hangs out with us. He jokes around with us. But when it comes time to perform, he always has something to tell us to do. He knows when it's time to play and when it's time to work."

At the K-State Singers Spring Show, the group sang its traditional closing song "God Bless America" with Polich singing a solo part. Since he was on sabbatical last year, the group wanted to bring the tradition back.

The group also presented Polich with a plaque, commending him for 40 years of service to the group.

"I thought he looked close to tears," Aadalen said. "He was surprised and thrilled."

that there was a better way to track immunizations," Bremby said.

So far, Shawnee County's is the largest local health department to participate in the registry program. The state estimates about 557,000 Kansans have 1.9 million vaccinations logged on the system.

"As people move from county to county, those records aren't lost," said Anne Freeze, the Shawnee County agency's director.

But Rodenberg acknowledged the system won't work as well as it can until all health departments and many private offices participate.

"Some of the issues are related to computer capabilities," Rodenberg said. "Some of it, too, is just the newness of the product. As a new product comes on board, there are always some people who lead; there are many more people who are going to follow."

Students with mumps have end-of-semester options

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If students have the mumps, they should stay in their residence and not attempt to attend classes, Carla Jones, assistant vice president of student life, said.

"If they have it, they should call our office," she said.

Cases of mumps in Kansas have increased to 277, including confirmed and probable cases, according to the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

The cases have been reported in 31 Kansas counties, with 102 cases appearing in Douglas County.

Other counties that have reported cases of mumps are Riley, Geary, Pottawatomie, Ellis, Scott and Sedgwick.

Local health departments also are investigating an additional 36 cases of potential mumps, the KDHE said.

The Riley County Health Department, 2030 Tecumseh Road, has confirmed one case of mumps, but that person was actually from Geary County, Kathy Dickey-Wilson, clinic supervisor, said.

There are still eight to 10 suspected cases on which the health department has yet to receive results, Dickey-Wilson said.

An e-mail sent to K-State students from Lafene Health Center said the mumps is an infection of the salivary glands caused by a virus, and people who are infected can be contagious a few days before to four days after the onset of symptoms.

While few people die of mumps, complications can include meningitis, inflammation of the testicles or ovaries, inflammation of the pancreas and deafness, the e-mail said.

Students who have mumps or are suspected to have mumps have options available as far as finishing the semester and their classes, Jones said.

At this point in the semester, students can request an incomplete if they know they will not be able to take finals or finish classes due to having the mumps, but the decision to give an incomplete will depend on the professor, she said.

The rules for an incomplete depend on the college in which the student is enrolled.

If students feel they need an incomplete and the professor disagrees, they should go to the dean's office of the particular college in which students are enrolled.

If the dean's office is unable to help the student, they should contact the Student Life Office, Jones said.

Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene, said Lafene has seen a few suspected cases of mumps.

"Confirmation of testing results are not yet available," she said.

Freshman linebacker arrested Monday

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ross Diehl, freshman in open option and redshirt freshman linebacker, was arrested Monday on aggravated battery charges, Lt. Michael Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department said.

Diehl
LINEBACKER

Diehl was arrested on a warrant relating to an incident dating back to Feb. 11, in which he struck Kyle Damas, junior in management information systems, in the face.

"He is accused of punching Kyle in the face, breaking his facial bones," Quintanar said.

In this case, the aggravated battery charges are a felony, because of the severity of the injuries and the instance of causing great bodily harm, Quintanar said.

The Kansas Legislature statute under which Diehl was charged is Article 34, Crimes Against Persons, defined as "recklessly causing bodily harm to another person, with a deadly weapon, or in any manner whereby great bodily harm, disfigurement or death can be inflicted."

Bond for Diehl was set at $1,500.

Challenge course uses teamwork to solve mental, physical tasks

Student Fee Bond Proposals

A follow-up on Part 6 of 6
An in-depth look at SGA's allocation of $200,000 to build a challenge course at K-State

For about two years, Emily Lehning dreamed of a place on K-State's campus where students could go to build teamwork, communication and leadership skills.

Lehning, assistant dean of student life and coordinator of New Student Services, wanted a challenge course, or, as it's often referred to, a ropes course, where groups of students can tackle physical challenges by solving mental problems through teamwork.

The problem was that there was never enough funding to put the idea in action.

Until now.

On March 16, the Student Governing Association approved a resolution with a vote of 32-2-0 to allocate $200,000 of a $1.5 million student fee bond surplus to construct and maintain a challenge course at K-State.

The $200,000 was $85,000 more than originally requested.

"When we heard about the possibility of receiving the allocation money, we were excited, but at the time, it was an idea still in the dream phase," Lehning said. "That money made it all possible."

A challenge course is a combination of physical tasks ranging in difficulty from low elements that might be on the ground or close to the ground, like a balance beam, to high elements where participants are 20 or more feet in the air.

The hope is that groups complete the course while building teamwork and communication skills with the help of a facilitator who helps groups achieve their goals, Lehning said.

"This is all meant to come to the end that the group identifies at the very beginning that they want to work on by going through the challenge course," Lehning said. "It's a combination of a mental and physical challenge that the group works through together."

With funding now in place, Lehning said plans are in the works to build K-State's Challenge Course on campus.

The proposed site of the course is on the wooded land north and west of the Turnover, low salaries could lead to teacher shortages

By Hannah Crippen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Uneven interest, retirement, turnover and other problems have led to a shortage of teachers in the area.

The 2006 Job Search Handbook for Educators reported that Region four, which includes Kansas, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Missouri, Iowa and Minnesota has 33 fields – more than half of all fields surveyed – in considerable or some shortage.

Six fields – elementary-kindergarten, elementary-primary, social studies, physical education, health and dance – are experiencing some surplus of teachers.

Region four is in considerable shortage of teachers in bilingual education, mathematics, chemistry, physics and special education.

The Handbook reported the beginning salary for a teacher in Kansas is $26,855. The average salary for the 2002-03 school year was $38,030. In comparison, the average beginning salary in California is $34,805, and the average is $55,693.

Dottie Evans, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, said the reasons behind the teacher shortage are not as simple as low salaries or too few potential teachers to fill an abundance of openings.

"It all depends on the particular field," Evans said. "It's not an across-the-board kind of thing, because on the one hand, in teaching there's always going to be a turnover. I think we're going to see a problem as older teachers retire. It may come to a point where there aren't enough teachers."

She said this probably will not happen for five to 10 years.

Karen Roberts, executive director of teaching and learning for Manhattan-Ogden USD 383, said mentoring/induction programs for new teachers are a tool used to prevent turnover.

"We work with the new teachers three days before school starts," Roberts said. "We also meet with them

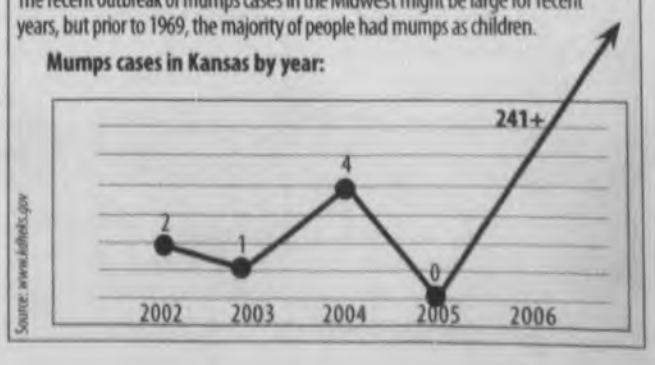
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS NEWS HIGHLIGHTS

Bush eases restrictions

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Under election-year pressure to reduce surging gasoline prices, President Bush on Tuesday halted filling of the nation's emergency oil reserve, urged the waiver of clean air rules to ease local gas shortages and called for the repeal of $2 billion in tax breaks for profit-heavy oil companies.

Iraqi government blasted



BAGHDAD, Iraq — Terror mastermind Abu Musab al-Zarqawi revealed his face for the first time Tuesday in a dramatic video in which he dismissed Iraq's new government as an American "stooge" and called it a "poisoned dagger" in the heart of the Muslim world.

Iran nuclear program

TEHRAN, Iran — Iran ratcheted up its defiance ahead of a U.N. Security Council deadline to suspend uranium enrichment, threatening Tuesday to hide its program if the West takes "harsh measures" and to transfer nuclear technology to Sudan. Ali Larijani, the top Iranian nuclear negotiator, renewed a vow to end cooperation with the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency.

Mumps
The recent outbreak of mumps cases in the Midwest might be large for recent years, but prior to 1969, the majority of people had mumps as children.

DIVERSIONS

A waste of time — but hey, it's better than lecture

Where are they now?

THORA BIRCH
Thora Birch was the cute little sister in "Hocus Pocus" and "All I Want for Christmas" in the early '90s. She continued to work through her teens, with guest appearances in TV shows, and then took a short break. She returned in 1999 and won critical acclaim for her role in "American Beauty." She then moved on to the movie "Ghost World" and was later nominated for a Golden Globe. Now 24 years old, she is looking forward to trying her hand at directing.

JONATHAN BRANDIS
Brandis received his first starring role in "The Neverending Story II" and went on to star in the science fiction series, "seaQuest DSV," for which he is most famously known. He also appeared alongside Chuck Norris in "Sidekicks." He was looking to direct instead of act. On Nov. 12, 2003, however, he died from injuries suffered from attempted suicide. He was 27 years old.

RAVEN SYMONE
Raven Symone was the three-year-old who could put Cliff Huxtable in his place and made audiences laugh in the early '90s during the last seasons of "The Cosby Show." Symone went on to release a music album in 1993 and was a member of ABC's "Hangin' with Mr. Cooper," but her career began to cool off. In 1998 she was Eddie Murphy's daughter in "Doctor Doolittle" and later returned in the sequel. Symone currently has her own show, "That's So Raven," on the Disney Channel and released her third album in 2003.

KIRK CAMERON
The teenage heartthrob of the '90s, Kirk Cameron was extremely popular during the run of "Growing Pains." After the show was cancelled in 1992, his fame slowly faded, and he has since left mainstream film. He now works mostly with religious-themed productions. He partners with evangelist Ray Comfort in training Christians in evangelism. He met his wife, Chelsea Noble, on the set of "Growing Pains" when she played his girlfriend. They have six children.

WSU professor encourages colleges to recruit diverse student bodies

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Universities need to cater to increasingly diverse student bodies, Ronald Kopita said in a lecture Tuesday.

Kopita, vice president at Wichita State University, gave a Chester E. Peters Lecture in Student Development in the K-State Student Union Little Theater.

Today's college students are diverse, and more than 80 percent of all students who attend universities are commuters, Kopita said.

With these students, universities need to determine what will attract them to campus and get students to attend more than online classes, Kopita said.

"Students lose out on a meaningful college experience if they're never on campus," he said.

Diversity at universities was an important topic of the speech, and Kopita discussed women, minorities, international students and disabled students, as well as ways a university can accommodate them.

With the retirement of the baby-boomer generation, which Kopita said includes those born in 1946-64, the number of adult students returning to college is shrinking.

The recruitment of minority students should be a priority, especially in the Midwest, he said.

Kopita used the example of a university that translated its brochures into Spanish and built funding into a financial aid package so students from warmer climates could afford clothing. A local business also offered winter clothing for the students, he said.

When Christine Reyes, program assistant for the dean of the College of Education and graduate student in education, mentioned Wichita and the number of Hispanics in the area, Kopita asked a question of his own.

"Are you interested in transferring?" he asked.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, answered for her.

"No," Bosco said.

Reyes said she doesn't believe colleges are doing a good job of recruiting minority students.

"There are lots of social issues involved," she said.

Many people in largely Hispanic areas might be offended if they were handed a flyer in Spanish, she said.

When a large part of the population speaks Spanish but doesn't read it, writing in Spanish doesn't help, she said.

It also offends some people who resent being the recipient of something in a language the sender assumes they speak because of their surname, she said.

One of Kopita's main concerns was the loss of international students to Europe and Australia, he said.

"We are losing students because of the roadblocks that the government has thrown up," he said of the requirements to enter the United States.

People in student affairs can help the government understand the need for international students to attend U.S. colleges, he said.

Another significant concern was the performance contract in which colleges are required to account for goals that can be measured by the government, he said.

"We thought this was the flavor of the month," Kopita said.

A problem with the performance contract program is that colleges operate on a calendar year, and government operates on a fiscal year, which leads to confusion and external pressure points, Kopita said.

External pressure points occur when schools are forced to follow governmental standards and be held accountable or lose funding, instead of using institutional self-improvement, he said.

"No Child Left Behind is a belief system," he said. "This is reality."

K-State ranks high among nations' research universities

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State is one of the top research universities in the nation, according to the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching.

K-State is ranked in the top 4 percent, along with 93 other universities, according to the foundation.

K-State has been near the top of research universities, but with a new ranking system, solidified its position in the top level of research universities, said James Guikema, associate vice provost for research.

"It reinforces to us that we are in the top group, and that should help out everyone involved in research here," Guikema said.

The Carnegie Foundation rating system is based on several areas: research and development expenditures in science and engineering; research and development expenditures in non science and engineering fields, and doctoral conferrals in humanities fields, social-science fields, science, technology, engineering and mathematics fields.

Ron Trewyn, vice provost for research and dean of the graduate school, said K-State has an open research foundation, with students making up a large part of the research team.

"K-State does a better job of involving students than most other universities," Trewyn said. "If a student is interested in starting a research project, the opportunities are available at any college."

The cooperation between faculty and students of different colleges is an important aspect of research development at K-State, Provost M. Duane Nellis said.

"We have an environment without barriers," Nellis said. "We've tried to create an environment where colleges all across campus can work together to improve our research."

In 2005, K-State received $110.9 million in sponsored research funding, the highest total in school history. These included grants from the Department of Defense, NASA, Department of Agriculture and several other federal and local agencies.

The total research funding at K-State in 2005, including grants, gifts from alumni and friends and various other contributions from private and public institutions, was $198.7 million. This total was $27.2 million higher than the total in 2001, a 13.7 percent increase in funding, Trewyn said.

"We need to look toward improving the infrastructure and growing the number of people involved in order to continue this current growth," Trewyn said.

OPINION

TO THE POINT

Joint efforts needed to fight teacher shortage

Nationwide, several issues are affecting education. While funding cuts and overcrowded classrooms create much of the stir, one consistent problem is the shortage of teachers.

The increasing cost of a college education plus the low starting salaries for teachers has deterred those who planned to go into the less-popular fields of science, math and special education.

When a student pays $3,000 or more per semester for an education, and the average starting salary for a teacher in Kansas is $28,530, paying off student loans becomes a daunting task.

There is no denying the conflict, and solutions must be found through more cooperation between federal, state and local governments. Since most public education funding comes from local property taxes, increasing federal funding would ease the burden on districts seeing the brunt of the teacher shortage.

Additionally, providing grants for college students who plan to teach, especially in the less-popular fields, could provide an incentive to pursue a degree without fear of future debt. Other controversial solutions like emergency credentialing should be more fully evaluated and considered.

The lack of funds at the federal level is not a rebuttal to be ignored, but the national priority of education as our key to the future should come first.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Nip/Tuck life away

Meaning found through TV show's 3 lessons

KELSEY CHILDRESS

Many philosophers, scientists and researchers have spent years and years pondering the answers to life's mysteries.

There are basic topics to cover, like finding the fountain of youth, if UFOs are real and if Atlantis really existed. While these questions have produced some studies and evidence of their existence, or what people deem as evidence, there is one issue on which no one can seem to agree. The answer to the question – "What is the meaning of life?"

Most will argue the answer varies from person to person, but usually the type of answers most common are "Love" or "Live life to the fullest."

Having the power to broadcast my opinion to 20,000 readers, sharing my answer to that ill-fated question seemed to be a healthy challenge.

For me, the meaning of life is made up of experiences that come from a series of moments in which something is learned. It is not a goal, a feeling or a state of mind. The meanings of life are lessons taught to us by someone outside ourselves.

For this reason, I believe the true lessons of life can be derived from the FX television show "Nip/Tuck."

Lesson No. 1: Never hire a life coach. Obviously, not all of them are trans-gendered, but they do seem to cause problems. When someone is hired to solve problems in other people's lives, there is something wrong.

If there is an emotional or personal problem in your life, fix it yourself.

Don't waste money on a "professional" who will tell you how to do it the way you would have in the first place, had you not been so unsure of yourself.

Have more self-confidence; go with gut instincts. And if all else fails, just be glad your girlfriend (who used to be a man but didn't tell you), isn't cheating on you with her adopted son, who is the same age as you.

Illustrations by Jordan Mizell | COLLEGIAN

Lesson No. 2: Finding a "fountain of youth" through plastic surgery doesn't always equal happiness. Basing self-worth on outer beauty or how others perceive you will never have a positive ending.

Additionally, spending thousands of dollars to look like Jennifer Lopez will not make you a star or completely change your life. Don't place too much value on others' opinions.

Discrimination based on how people look is commonplace in our society, but letting yourself be a victim to this is not healthy.

Lesson No. 3: Don't date Nazis, racists or anyone else who hates someone for who they are, not what they do. This might lead to them asking you to paint the African-American statues in the Nativity scene white or being tied up by a crazy racist.

Again, this never made anyone too happy. Prejudices only lead to missed opportunities.

All right, so maybe the entirety of life cannot be explained by three seasons of one of the best shows on television, but it just goes to show that you can learn something from just about anything. Look for life's lessons in the unexpected.

Repetition of wrongness of rape dulls senses

LOLA SHRIMPLIN

Enough already.

I think it effectively has been beaten into the minds of every K-State student and Manhattan resident who can read that women get raped. It happens. It happens here; it happens in Colorado; it happens in California and Berlin and Moscow and Kabul.

It happened to me; it happens to others. Every minute of every day, odds are, somewhere, a person gets raped.

But enough already. We know that. We know. We've got it.

I'm glad women on this campus are proud to be women and shouldn't be afraid to walk at night.

And according to what they say on the front page of the Collegian, they aren't.

I was a bit surprised to learn that women are talked to like animals.

Now that I think of it, though, my dad did actually run through all the family pet names before he got to ours a few times.

Does that count?

I've never actually considered myself proud to be a woman or thought I should have the same rights everyone else has. Of course I do.

Why wouldn't I have the same rights?

I'm female. I've been one since birth, and as far as being proud to be one, it's kind of like being left-handed or something. You just are. It's no big deal.

I believe if you have to consciously think about having the same rights as others, maybe you don't.

Quoting the inestimable Margaret Thatcher, "Being powerful is like being a lady. If you have to tell people you are, you aren't."

All year we've heard over and over that women are raped. Speeches have been given; marches have been marched; shirts have been hung; columns have been written, and if students on this campus don't realize by now that rape is wrong, and that it happens, then they live in underground tunnels and never get out.

From the posters that ask "Concerned about rape?" to the W.A.R. campaign, we constantly are inundated with reminders.

I understand the need to make people aware that this happens, and it is wrong. Of course it is.

Rape is wrong. But when you beat a drum this loudly and for this long, it ceases to be a warning, and people start to see it as annoying.

Kind of like the war on terror.

It becomes yet another thing to avoid on campus, another poster at which to roll your eyes, another display in the K-State Student Union by which to walk blindly.

I'm not saying to get over it. You don't do that if you've been raped.

What I'm saying is move on. Enough already. People can only cry so long before others get tired of the tears, and the individual's pain disappears into a vast wasteland known as "a group."

As in, "this happens to a lot of people, and it's too hard to think about, so I'm not going to listen anymore."

Things like this never should get to that point. It's too traumatic for the people to whom it happens, who as individuals, have every right to grieve and recover.

Guilt means love.

My roommates were just slapping and pinching each other's chests in the kitchen. You can come watch for a dollar.

To the guy who helped me with the spiders at the gas station: Thank you so much, and have fun painting.

I remember saying something like, "But my lips hurt real bad. Maybe you should drive."

I think Kirksey's approval rating just dropped lower than Dubya's.

James, you may be a parking nazi, but I can't help loving you.

To the blonde girl in leadership who was part of the war veterans presentation: You are gorgeous.

Saying assless chaps is so redundant.

Has anyone seen my friend Austin? Nobody has seen or heard from him in weeks.

To all the people that are against 4/20 and the festivities that take place on this date: Shut up and let the rest of us experience college. And, it's okay; your father loves you.

Daniel Kirksey, your ignorance is showing.

What's worse than finding a worm in your apple?

Attention dorm kids: The reason your pizza is always late, cold or has spit in it is because you never ever tip.

Daniel Kirksey, I'm sure that all of the women who have been victims of sexual assault or rape simply forgot to wear their "Please don't rape, molest, assault or harass me" shirt that horrific day. I know I wasn't, but at 13 I thought I was safe visiting my older step-sister and her boyfriend.

I'm in a mood, OK? Deal with it.

I'm saddened by your article, Daniel. I hope that you soon learn the facts about rape and violence against women and quit spreading false propaganda.

TO THE EDITOR

Teaching only abstinence won't stop teenage sex, STDs

Editor,

I read an article in the Collegian a couple of weeks ago about sex education in Kansas that left me outraged. The article detailed how the Kansas Board of Education proposed a bill that would allow public schools in Kansas only to teach abstinence in their sex-education courses.

This last Tuesday, the Kansas Board of Education passed a first part of the bill, which states that parents now have to give the schools written permission before their children can take a sex-education course.

Does the Board of Education really think if we don't educate about sex, they're magically going to stop having sex? We have to admit the facts. Kids are having sex at younger and younger ages, and if we don't educate them about the consequences, why should we be shocked when 14-year-olds are becoming mothers or when another teen contracts a sexually transmitted disease?

Ignorance is not a way to try and fix something. Attending a sex-education course isn't telling the students to have sex but informing those who are going to have sex anyway.

Sex is a controversial subject in conservative states like Kansas, but we can't ignore the problem. By ignoring the problems, we're letting our kids down. If the Board of Education passes this bill, I feel the pregnancy rates, abortion rates and sexually transmitted diseases are going to skyrocket.

We need to protect our children, by preparing them for situations they will face in the future – not leaving them to their own ignorance.

Drop-off daycare on campus would draw student-parents

Editor,

Student-parents tend to have lower income and are limited geographically for childcare. Also, some students require more childcare than full-time working parents, because they might work and go to school on the same days.

My proposal is to implement a drop-off daycare on campus for the students at a low cost.

Not only will costs be lowered, but also more flexibility will be available for student-parents. By being able to just drop the children off without signing contracts and paying up-front fees, students will have more freedom of how to use the service.

Also, there will be no waiting lists, and students will be able to rely on the drop-off when they need it. We all know things unexpectedly come up, and knowing someone will be there to care for your child is a feeling every parent deserves to have.

As for the university, it will benefit by bringing in more nontraditional students, because studies show more student-parents choose universities with incentives such as childcare.

As of right now, the three daycare centers we do have are licensed for a total of only 250 spots. A great deal of the spots that are offered are taken by faculty parents. Also, having to wait on a list to even be accepted is not easy for student-parents.

There will need to be a great deal of work and money put into project such as this, but I feel K-State and the community of Manhattan have the ability and the right people to make it happen.

Columnist falsely blames victims, cites wrong motive

Editor,

On Monday morning I bowed my head in shame to be a K-State student after the Collegian actually published a half-page opinion column that blamed women for their sexual victimization.

The entire article was sexist, ignorant and extremely cruel. Written by Daniel Kirksey, the opinion reinforced more rape myths than I could count on two hands. Here are just a couple of the absurd misconceptions that were published in the article.

Rape myth #1: Rape is provoked by the victim. Women invite rape with their appearance, behavior or clothing. The truth: Studies have shown that 60-70 percent of rapes are at least partially planned beforehand. The danger with this myth is the way it takes the criminal blame from the rapist and shifts all responsibility to the victim. When convenience store clerks are robbed at gunpoint, do we question how late the store was open or why they were working there? Of course not. Why, then, do we blame the victims of sexual crimes?

Rape myth #2: Rape is about sex, as if men who see "scantily clad" women just cannot help themselves. The truth: Rape is not about sex. Rape is about power, control and violence. Studies show the major motive for rape is aggression, not sex. Rapists often have access to consensual sex.

In conclusion, I would like to apologize to every victim of a sexual crime who had to read this article. I'm sorry that this slipped through editorial cracks. I hope you also know that there are places of support on this campus.

Selfishness, manipulation motivate rapists; don't blame women for violence against them

Editor,

Kirksey never explained which "lie" the rally "perpetuated." Surely not the truth that only the rapist is responsible for rape, that a man who steals through rape is a criminal, guilty of a felony.

Kirksey doesn't mention rapes committed against the elderly, the bedridden, children, males, women in houses, women wearing long dresses, pants and burkas.

If "clothes communicate by themselves" (Kirksey), men who are unable to process more than one "signal" should have relationships with clothing, not women.

Men who are unable to speak English to women by using "words" should stay home with their own "super-short mini skirt." And men with a shoe fetish? Must we all wear steel boots?

Men of integrity do not behave like robotic brutes, forcing themselves on others because of hair, clothing or perfume. Shall we excuse pedophiles because a child has the poor judgment to be a child?

Women have given up going out after dark, hiking alone, camping alone, sitting in the yard after dark, leaving windows open on a breezy Saturday night.

Men of honor, stand up against Kirksey's shallow interpretation of the world.

Rape is about selfishness and manipulation, not titillation from a blouse. Rape is in the mind and heart of the rapist, not the crime victim.

Kirksey, if you don't know how to get consent, check out any Web site re: Kansas law or any of the 24,900,000 Web sites about sexual consent or your own university's Web site: www.k-state.edu/womenscenter/women_center_materials.htm.

Cats finish 10th at Big 12 tourney

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State was floating around the top three during the first nine holes of the Big 12 Championship on Monday at Southern Hills Country Club in Tulsa, Okla., but slipped all the way to ninth by the end of the day.

The Wildcats ended the second round early Tuesday in 10th place and could not improve in the final round, as they finished the tournament tied for 10th with Colorado after shooting a 59-over par 899 (296-305-298). Oklahoma won the team championship by four strokes over Texas, after firing an 18-over 858 (285-289-284). Texas placed second after shooting 22-over 862 (285-287-290), and Texas A&M finished in third with a 25-over 865 (289-287-289).

Matthew Rosenfeld from Texas shot one-under-par in the final round to win the individual championship by two strokes over Brodie Flanders of Oklahoma. Rosenfeld finished at even-par 210 (71-70-69) on the par-70 course, and Flanders carded a two-over 212 (69-72-71).

Oklahoma State's Pablo Martin, the Golfweek/Sagarin No. 1-ranked player in the country, struggled in the opening round with a five-over 75, but he shot two-under in the final two rounds to move up the leaderboard.

He finished the tournament in third place, after carding a three-over 213 (75-68-70).

Senior Ben Kern led the way for the Wildcats and was the only one who finished in the top 30. He finished the tournament tied for 19th out of 60 total golfers after shooting a 10-over 220 (72-74-74)

Freshman Robert Streb was the low Wildcat in the final round after firing a two-over 72, which moved him from 48th into a tie for 34th. Streb finished the tournament with a 16-over 226 (77-77-72).

Freshman Joe Kinney finished in a tie for 42nd after carding an 18-over 228 (74-75-79), sophomore Kyle Yonke ended the tournament tied for 45th after shooting a 19-over 229 (75-79-75), and senior Tyler Cummins rounded out the Wildcats as he tied for 51st after firing a 21-over 231 (75-79-77).

Kinney was only nine-over for the tournament at one point during his final round, but he bogeyed his sixth hole and triple-bogeyed his seventh hole, which put him in a tight spot from which he would not recover.

Matter of pride

K-State moves on from losses in KU series, faces Missouri State in Kansas City

By Mark Potter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Embarrassed" was the word coach Brad Hill used to describe his feelings about K-State's effort against Kansas last weekend.

K-State (24-12-1), which committed six errors in three games against the Jayhawks, has lost three of its last four games and dropped to 4-10-1 in the Big 12 Conference.

"Our guys should have been embarrassed," Hill said. "I was embarrassed for how we played. We just didn't play with the energy, enthusiasm and fight or the will to win. It's not anything we are proud of."

Hill said this weekend's series against Oklahoma State is a crucial opportunity to turn the season around.

But first, K-State will make its annual trip to Kansas City, Kan., to take on Missouri State (20-16) in the Best of the Midwest Classic at 7 tonight at Community America Ballpark, home of the Kansas City T-Bones.

Hill said he likes playing at the Community America Ballpark, because it gives K-State fans in Kansas City a chance to watch the Wildcats play.

"It's great, because it allows us to play a mid-week game and have an opportunity to get in front of our Kansas City Catbackers and alumni over in the Kansas City area," Hill said. "I think the people at the T-Bones' stadium also appreciate the fact we are going to bring in a number of purple people on a Wednesday night."

Senior Chase Mitchell (3-0, 5.10 earned run average) is expected to take the mound for the Wildcats. This will be Mitchell's first appearance after taking time off due to the death of a loved one.

Mitchell's last start was a no-decision against Creighton on April 11, when he allowed four earned runs and six hits through three innings.

Mitchell and the Wildcats appear to have a few advantages when they take the field against Missouri State, which is part of the Missouri Valley Conference.

For starters, K-State is 20-2 this season in non-conference games.

Also, Wildcat pitchers have a combined ERA of 3.85, fifth-best in the Big 12.

But hitting could be K-State's primary advantage over the Bears.

Missouri State owns a team batting average of .272, while K-State is hitting .316 for the season.

The Wildcat offense is paced by senior outfielder Joe Roundy, who has hit safely in 31 of 37 games this season.

Roundy leads the Big 12 in hitting at .414 and boasts a .512 average against non-conference foes.

Despite personal success, Roundy said he is much more interested in helping K-State win than hitting for a high average.

"I want the team to be successful way before I want to be successful," Roundy said. "I'm glad I can help the team out in any way that I can."

However, with 15 regular-season games remaining, the Wildcats are nowhere near where they want to be, Roundy said.

"We all know right now that this is a crucial point in the season, and we really need to start winning some games," Roundy said. "Last year, we would take a game off in the mid-week, and we'd lose. We just need to approach every game and give everything that we have."

If the Clippers can win, the Royals can't be too far away

ANTHONY MENDOZA

Kansas City Royals fans: your season is already over, and we haven't even entered the heat of the summer.

It could be said the season already was headed toward a tailspin after the first loss, as fans jumped ship.

Sure, ESPN.com gave the Royals the distinction as the worst franchise in professional sports in the last 25 years last week, but there is hope.

Just look west – way out west toward the Pacific Ocean. The location where the former reigning worst franchise in sports once lived. None other than the Los Angeles Clippers, with one of the worst owners in professional sports and an inept general manager calling the shots. That should sound familiar, Royals fans.

But something is different this year – the Clippers finally got it right. For the first time in 14 years, they are in the playoffs and seem to be on their way to the second round after taking a 2-0 commanding lead over the Denver Nuggets on Monday night.

For those of you not familiar with the Clippers, they are the punching bags of the NBA; the team for which players don't want to play. The evidence – the Clippers' No. 1 pick in 1989, Danny Ferry out of Duke, refused to play for the them and instead went overseas to play rather than endure the death sentence that was Clippers basketball at that time.

However, the landscape of basketball changed four years ago, but it took them until this point to make it into the playoffs. In 2002, the Clippers made a draft day heist, trading away their No. 2 pick – Tyson Chandler, a Los Angeles area high-school star – to the Chicago Bulls for former No. 1 pick overall, Elton Brand.

Needless to say, the Clippers finally got one over on someone else. In his four years with the Clippers, Brand has been an All-Star two of those seasons and has averaged 20 points and 10 rebounds the last two seasons. He also has earned the distinction of the best basketball player nobody knows about.

Oh yeah, and he was the first basketball player from Duke to leave Mike Krzyzewski's program early to enter the draft.

The move that got the Clippers into the postseason this year, though, was acquiring Sam Cassell during the off-season. The Minnesota Timberwolves did not want anything to do with the malignant guard, but he had one thing working for him – he is a player that comes with championship rings and adjusts losing attitudes.

Not sure if you can say that about the Royals big acquisitions this year in Reggie Sanders, Mark Grudzielanek and Doug Mientkiewicz.

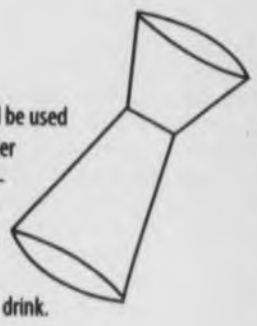
Dale Earnhardt Jr. said he hopes to achieve that same effect this weekend at Talladega Superspeedway, where he'll mark his late father's birthday by driving a replica of the famed car.

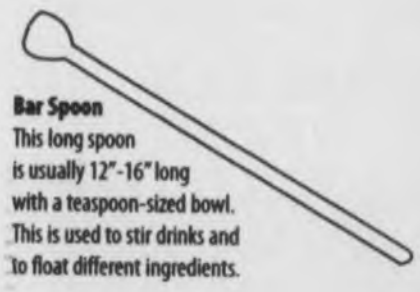
Junior's trademark red Chevy will be painted predominantly black, with white lettering and silver and red stripes. The car mimics the design the late Dale Earnhardt made famous.

NBA | Mavericks' Johnson named NBA's coach of year

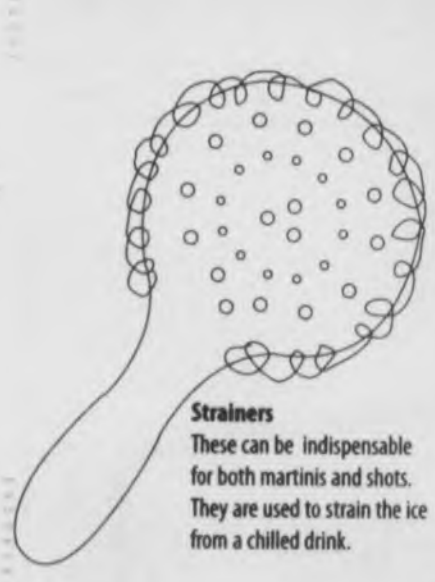


During Avery Johnson's playing days, many executives and players thought the point guard would make a great NBA coach. Still, he had to be convinced it was time to make that transition.

Now, after his first full season leading the Dallas Mavericks, Johnson was honored Tuesday as the NBA coach of the year.



Tools of the trade



Mixing Glass and Shaker tin
The mixing glass is a 16-ounce glass that is versatile and is used in almost any mixed drink, from martinis to shooters.
Beer can even be served in this glass. The shaker tin is a large cup that fits over the mixing glasses and is used to mix drinks.

Jigger
A jigger should be used until a bartender develops a consistent eye for measuring the amount of alcohol in each drink.

Bar Spoon
This long spoon is usually 12"-16" long with a teaspoon-sized bowl. This is used to stir drinks and to float different ingredients.

Strainers
These can be indispensable for both martinis and shots. They are used to strain the ice from a chilled drink.

Tips, interesting people make late-night work worthwhile

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The world of customer service can be a tough job, but generous tips and meeting interesting people can make being a bartender or a server worthwhile.

"I wouldn't want to work anywhere else at this age. I get the day-life when it's slower, and I get to hear my customers' stories about when they were in college and used to hang out in Aggieville, and night-life, where there is lots of fun and great music, not to mention the money is insane," said Ulla Strömberg, a psychology major who took time off to make more money.

She said she plans to attend K-State for a third year in fall 2006. During her time away from school, she has worked as a bartender and the head waitress at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant and Saloon.

"I think it is easier to be a bartender, because you have a three-foot space, but waitresses have to talk to their customers to see what they want," Strömberg said.

According to the Professional Bartending Schools of America Web site, "A career in bartending offers so many choices – so many built-in-benefits – that hundreds of people are giving up traditional careers or augmenting their income with part-time bartending work."

Most of these jobs require little to no experience.

"I started working in the kitchen, and I got promoted to a bartender; I had no experience," said Andrew Soule, senior in park management and conservation and bartender at Rock-A-Belly Bar and Deli.

"You have to be really friendly, be in a good mood all the time and be able to speak with customers. (It's) not a job for the timid and shy," Soule said.

Bartenders' base pay usually starts at minimum wage, but a night of $200-$500 in tips makes up for the low hourly wage, Strömberg said.

"In a regular day, I usually make around $150 a night," Strömberg said. "The most I've made was $1,400 on St. Patty's day."

Some of the waitresses dress suggestively to get bigger tips; guys usually single them out just because they are wearing an apron, she said.

She said the best part of her job is that she gets to meet people from all different sides of the spectrum.

"I get to meet people who went to K-State 30 years ago," Strömberg said.

The worst part is that sometimes people clash; they get intoxicated and all of their inhibitions go out the window, Strömberg said.

She said she really doesn't have too many complaints about her job.

"I have great customers, great co-workers and a great boss; the worst part is stepping on glass and seeing people fight."

Working in a bar gives an opportunity to see people acting differently than they would if they were sober, Strömberg said while speaking of some of her experiences at Rusty's.

"One time I got punched in the face because I told a guy not to call me a slut," she said.

These types of jobs entail long hours, late nights and a tough skin, she said.

Strömberg said being a college student and working in a bar was tough, and it took some getting used to.

"I had to make good friends with Red Bull," she said. "I had an 8:05 class; I usually got done with class around 2:30, then I had to be to work by 3."

It's all about balancing, making time to study first, then time to work, said Strömberg's co-worker Tiffany Smith, senior in psychology.

"I take a couple of days off during the week to get my homework done," Smith said.

Strömberg said she also wants to balance things, because school is important.

"I'd rather work than go out and party and have a hangover the next day," Strömberg said. "I never felt like I didn't want to go to class, because I pay to go to class," she said.

Strömberg's advice to prospective Rusty's waitresses: "You'd better be quick-witted, have thick skin and be ready to accept you'll probably never have a job as fun."

This summer she said she will be working in a bar in Missouri at the Lake of the Ozarks making about $1,500 a day, then in the fall she will return to finish her degree.

After graduation, she plans to work somewhere in the Kansas City area in the field of psychology. She doesn't want to move too soon, because she wants to be close to her mother, she said.

You would be ill-advised to try to shoot kidney beans out your nose today. (Yes, I know you were thinking of it.)

Taurus
(April 20 - May 20)
Today you will have a lot of trouble with non sequiturs. Pizza doesn't have to have cheese, you know.

Gemini
(May 21 - June 20)
You will begin an evil project, in secret. You will be successful, although why you want to produce a cross between a St. Bernard and a chihuahua is anybody's guess.

Cancer
(June 21 - July 22)
You will declare war on drugs today and will glare menacingly at your pharmacist.

Leo
(July 23 - Aug. 22)
More fun with twine, today. Isn't it great?

Virgo
(Aug. 23 - Sept. 22)
Today you will flip a coin 4 times, and it will come up "heads," "tails," "heads," "heads." Then someone will come up and say "hey, whatcha doing?" Then the phone will ring. Just a coincidence in this case.

Libra
(Sept. 22 - Oct. 22)
You should look into some of that new "dream interpretation" software. That recurring dream about being naked in a hot tub with the Pope and Bill Gates is probably a really common one.

Scorpio

Don't worry — that fortune cookie was wrong.

Sagittarius
(Nov. 22 - Dec. 21)
You will be visited by creatures named Cthulhu, Nyarlathotep, Azathoth, Shub-Niggurath, Yog-Sothoth, Ithaqua, Tsathoggua, Dagon and Bert. You will discover that all of them have atrocious table manners.

Capricorn
(Dec. 22 - Jan. 20)
Today you will develop a type of rubber overshoe that looks like a dinosaur's foot. They will become wildly popular, after your appearance on the Letterman show.

Aquarius
(Jan. 21 - Feb. 18)
Try to avoid things that are squishy today. Especially giant green squishy things that probably came from outer space. (Hint: most giant green squishy things are, in fact, from outer space.)

Pisces
(Feb.19 - March 20)
Good time to institute "show and tell" at the office. Why should kids have all the fun? You could break the ice by bringing in your stamp collection, no?

Dog washes ease process

Chris Douglas, junior in architectural engineering, gives his dog Sadie a bath Tuesday evening. Douglas regularly washes his four-month old puppy at his house. Regular baths are one way to help keep dogs healthy and well-groomed.

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The correct technique and convenient facilities can make bath time a pleasant experience for both dogs and their owners.

Regular baths are one of the best ways to keep dogs healthy and well-groomed. The Humane Society of the United States' Web site recommends owners follow a simple set of steps to make their dogs as comfortable as possible during baths.

According to the Humane Society, pet owners should first gather all soaps, shampoos, combs and towels in one place to avoid leaving a scared, wet canine alone.

Before putting a dog in a bathtub, the Web site suggests placing a cotton ball in both of the dog's ears to keep water out and lining the floor of the tub with a non-skid surface to make it feel more secure.

Owners should begin at the head when bathing their dogs and slowly make their way to the rear. This prevents fleas from moving up the animal's body to its head or face. The Humane Society recommends using a mild dog shampoo with the active ingredient chlorhexidene, unless an insecticide is necessary.

Soap might remain in a dog's coat, even when all visible suds have been washed down the drain, so a thorough rinsing is important to prevent soapy residue from drying or irritating a dog's skin.

Several Manhattan businesses have created dog wash facilities to provide pet owners with a place to bathe their pets.

Willie's Dog Wash, located at Willie's Car Wash, 1201 Bluemont Ave., allows owners to wash, shampoo, condition and dry their dogs 24 hours a day.

Will Hummel, manager and co-owner of Willie's Car Wash, said his business partner, Tom Abbott, came up with the idea to establish the dog wash.

"It's kind of a blend of dog-grooming and car-washing techniques," Hummel said.

The dog wash features a large stainless steel tub and a spray hose. After inserting payment, owners can control the order and length of the wash cycle.

Claire and Harley's Dog Bath and Boutique, 108 N. 3rd St., also offers a self-serve dog wash. Shelley Neumann, co-owner of Claire and Harley's, said dog owners just need bring their pets to the shop.

The shop provides aprons to keep owners dry and shampoo, conditioner, towels, blow dryers, brushes and cologne.

"We have lots of repeat customers," she said. "Once people use the dog wash and see how convenient it is, they're usually hooked."

However, some pet owners prefer to bathe their pets at home.

Chris Douglas, junior in architectural engineering, washed his four-month-old puppy Sadie on Tuesday evening in the bathtub at his house.

"She likes them," he said with a laugh, "although she may not look like she likes them."

ROTC wins national unit award for quality, rates, scholarships

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lt. Col. Art DeGroat, professor of military science and head of the Department of Military Science for six years – the longest term of any military lieutenant at K-State – will retire from active military duty after this school year.

DeGroat

However, DeGroat, who has been on active military duty for 22 years, will go out on top.

The K-State Army ROTC is one of only two programs to receive a 2006 Outstanding Army ROTC Unit Award.

"For me, it's very special that we're achieving recognition for having rebuilt – and now it's proven – the country's greatest military program," DeGroat said. "And it's something that's been very special to me."

Following retirement, DeGroat will work as President Jon Wefald's assistant for military affairs, a newly created position.

"I feel very, very fortunate," he said. "This will really give the opportunity continuing to do things to help the university with military-related programs. There's a lot going on in military affairs at K-State these days."

The Outstanding Unit Award is sponsored by the Order of the Founders and Patriots of America and is presented to one eastern and one western program each year.

K-State Army ROTC also received the western region award in 1993 and 1995. The program later went into a low period but has been rebuilt in the past six years, DeGroat said.

"It's culminated and received national prominence by winning this award," DeGroat said.

Mark Edwards, one of two Kansas civilian aides to the Secretary of the Army, will present the award to Wefald, DeGroat and Stephen White, the dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, at a May 16 ceremony.

A national selection committee ranked programs throughout the nation to determine which were worthy of this title, DeGroat said.

Programs were rated on several criteria, including the number and quality of commissioned officer graduates, military retention rates, results of a comprehensive examination of the department, the number of scholarships awarded to students and cadet success rates at a national summer leadership camp.

"Our program is committed to leadership excellence. It is our overall motto," Robert Pough, cadet major, said. "This award has acknowledged that we have met our goals of providing quality, committed officers."

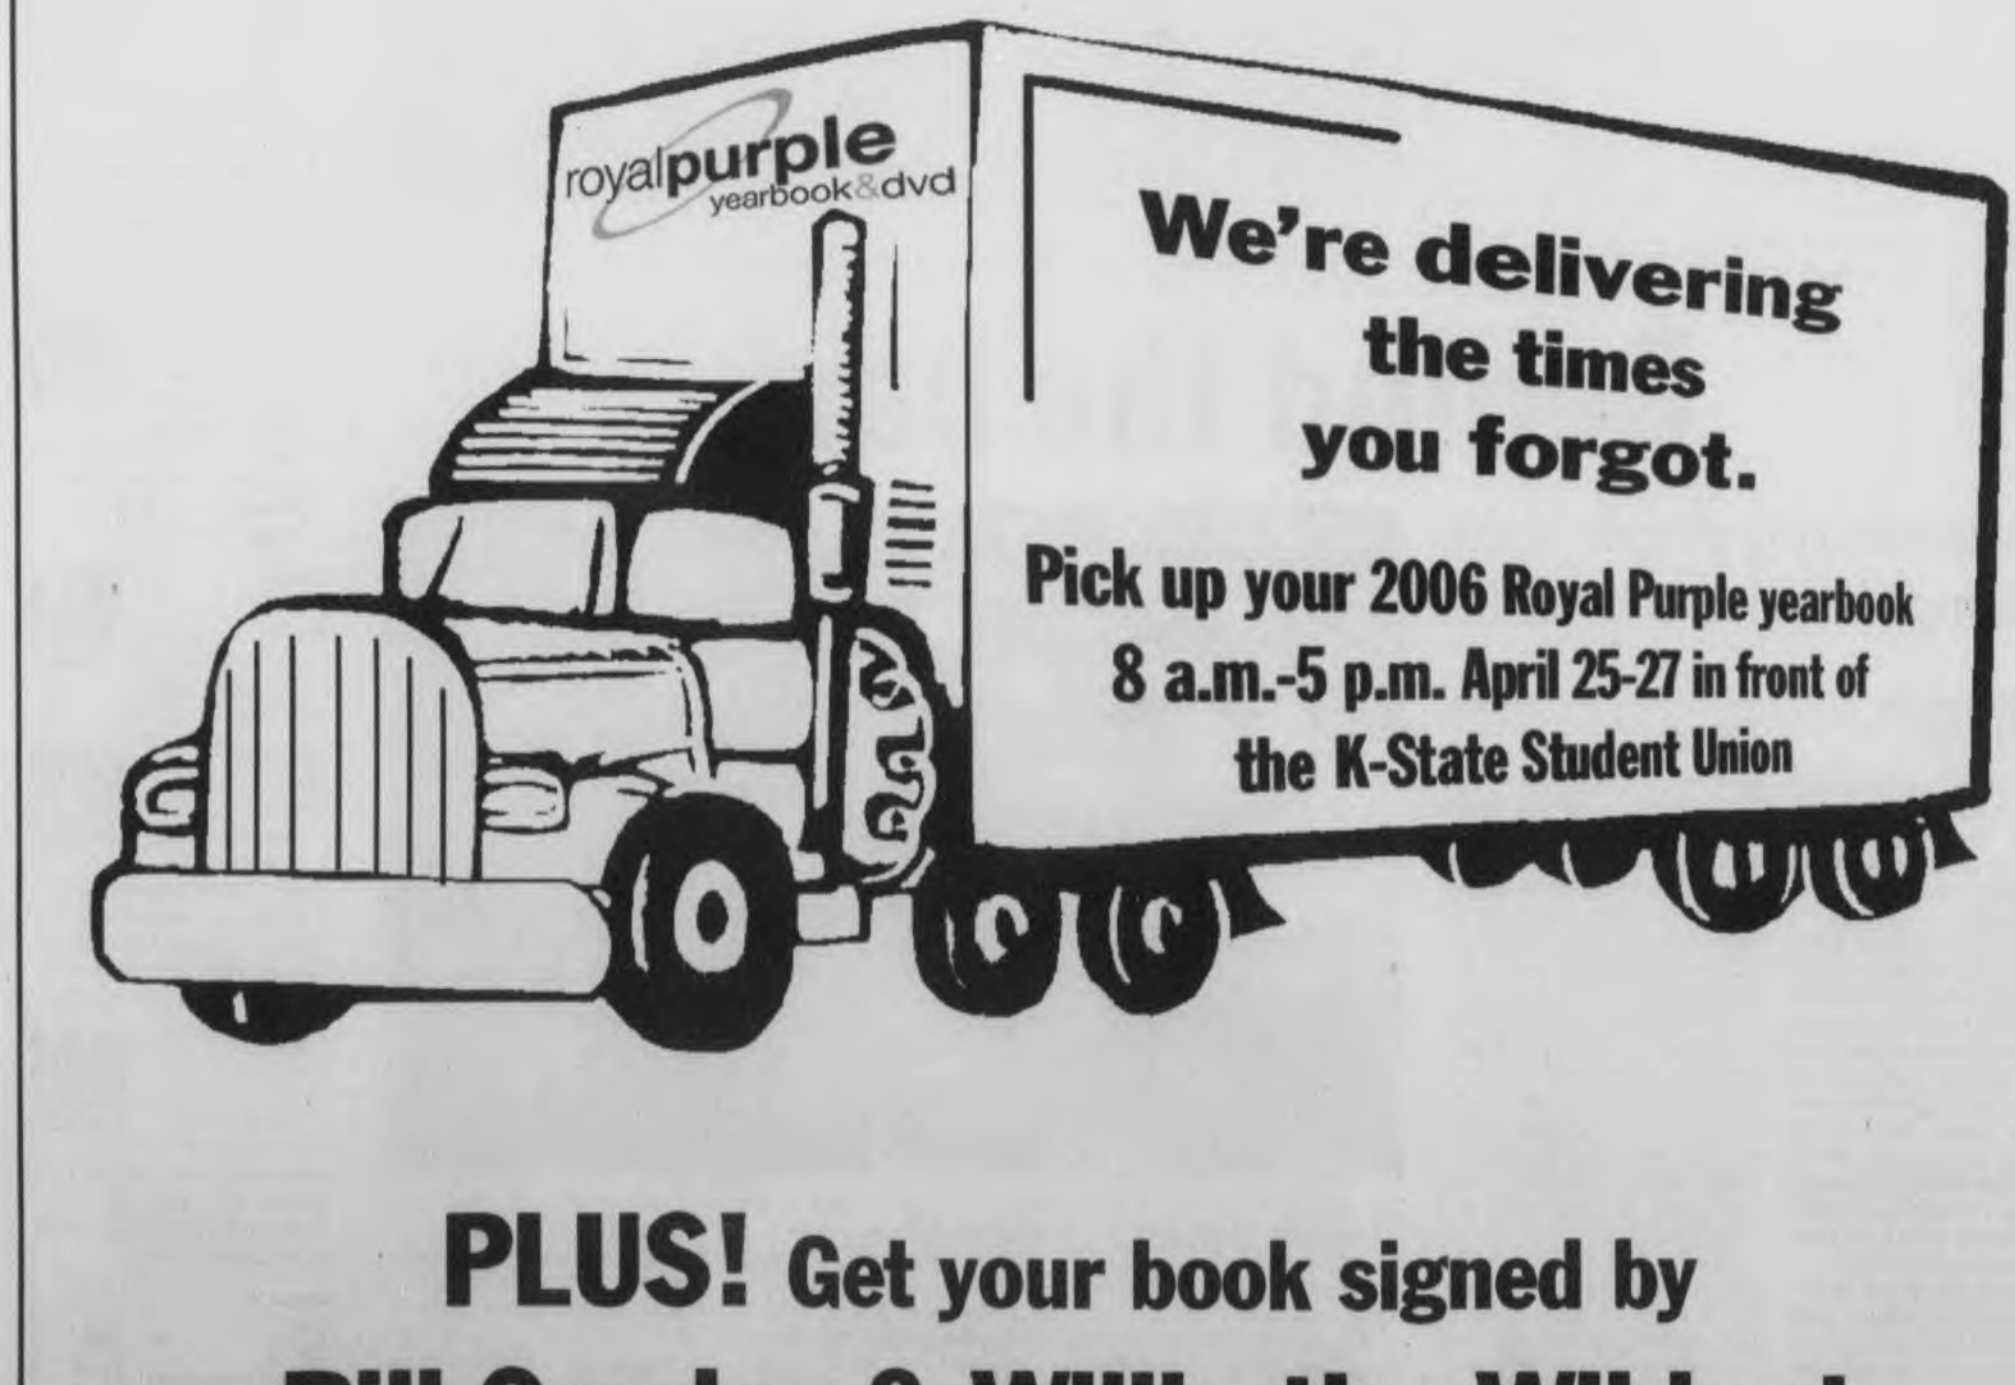
K-State Army ROTC has a 92-percent retention rate of its students, which is considered exceptionally high. The amount of scholarships awarded to students has increased 369 percent for the 2005-06 school year, DeGroat said.

"We're competing for additional scholarships at a very high rate because of our students at K-State," he said.

The program was expected to commission 13 new officers this past year, but 18 were commissioned into Army officer positions, putting K–State ROTC at a 138-percent success rate, DeGroat said.

"We've basically doubled in enrollment and doubled the production of army officers in the past six years," DeGroat said.

Furthermore, ROTC cadets are required to attend a summer leadership camp the summer after their junior year. K-State had 100 percent attendance at this camp in 2005.



The cadets also are ranked at this camp, and 50 percent of the K-State program in attendance were rated as excelling, DeGroat said.

Eric Cook, sophomore in history, said he feels privileged to be part of such a prestigious program.

"It's a great honor to be with the good group of people that I'm with," Cook said.

Pottawatomie County seeks funds to finance Blue Township sewers

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Pottawatomie County is looking for a way to finance a new sanitation service in the Blue Township district along U.S. Highway 24.

The county owes about $2.5 million on its present sewage system, and increasing numbers of returning soldiers to Fort Riley have forced the county to address means of handling a growing population.

Pottawatomie County Administrator Robert Reece said the county was given three alternatives by its consultants, Bartlett and West Engineers in Topeka. The alternatives include expanding the present system, building a new system or potentially connecting with Manhattan.

When a connection with Manhattan was suggested, Reece said he was asked by the county commission to speak with Manhattan officials about what a connection could entail.

Reece said the focus of the discussion is not annexing, defined as incorporating or joining one area to another, but rather giving the community what it needs.

"It's not a question of annexation," he said. "It's a question of providing the best service."

Reece said the commission wants to evaluate the cost of each option given, and the estimates have been close.

The one major pump station in the Blue Township area will need to be improved regardless of which alternative is chosen.

Reece said the consultants have concerns about combining technologies if the county decides to expand on the present sewer service.

Whichever option is chosen, Reece said the objective is to find a long-term solution for the area.

Citizens are encouraged to attend a public hearing at 7 p.m. May 22 at Flint Hills Christian School at which the county's consultants will share their findings and commissioners will hear from citizens.

Pottawatomie County Commissioner Barb Kolde said she hopes people will come to the public hearing and voice their opinions.

Kolde said the process has been long and frustrating.

While three options have been presented to the commission, Kolde said people with whom she has had contact have expressed little interest in making significant connections with Manhattan.

"I'm here to represent the people, and basically they prefer to be autonomous and not be a part of Manhattan," she said. "But I have no anti-Manhattan feelings."

City Manager Ron Fehr said because the township has grown so rapidly, a new sanitation system needs to be addressed.

Fehr said the discussion of annexing the Blue Township to Manhattan has been nothing the city initiated.

If Pottawatomie County seeks to make a connection to Manhattan in the future, Fehr said the overall cost would require an analysis of Manhattan's financial ability to participate in such a connection.

Manhattan might be willing to participate in a connection, and one suggestion of how to finance could be annexing the area, Fehr said.

If an annexation took place, Fehr said it would be reasonable for Manhattan to take responsibility for other services, but city officials would want to look at what those services would entail.

"There are a lot of issues out there," he said. "We would want to analyze if we could handle all those issues."

Commission reviews aquatic center, park

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Expect a decision on where the proposed indoor aquatic center will be by mid-May.

The Manhattan City Commission took another swing at the aquatic center and master plan for City Park on Tuesday night in a joint work session with the City Parks and Recreation Advisory Board.

Commissioner Mark Hatesohl said the commission expects to know by mid-May if the city can use STAR bonds to build the aquatic center at a downtown location as part of the downtown redevelopment project. He said if the city cannot use the bonds, which are paid off with taxes earned off the facilities they pay to build, he will vote to place the center in CiCo Park.

Jerry Carpenter, Manhattan High School swimming coach, told the commission his team would need separate pools for swimming and diving to practice at the new aquatic center. Without that, he said, his team would continue practicing at K-State's Natatorium.

"I'm not going to split my team and have them come at different times," Carpenter said.

The commissioners asked representatives of RDG Planning and Design, the firm designing the aquatic center, to take another look at how the indoor pools could be arranged.

The aquatic center likely will be put up for a vote by Manhattan taxpayers this fall with other city projects. Several employees and volunteers from Sunset Zoological Park attended and advocated that the bond include funding for an educational facility to be built where the zoo's ticket office is now.

Jeremy Thornbrugh, docent at the zoo, said the building would cost about $3 million, but the zoo already has raised $1.3 million through donations.

Rachel Soash, the zoo's curator of education, told the commission she'd had to turn down two families wanting to have birthday parties at the zoo this week. She said the new building would have four classrooms and space for other events.

"It's not something we need for the future," Soash said. "It's something we need now."

Ogden Grade School named 1 of 48 finalists for math award; winners to be honored in October

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ogden Grade School recently was named a finalist for the Intel and Scholastic Schools of Distinction Awards in the Mathematics Achievement category.

These awards honor schools that demonstrate excellence by implementing innovative programs that support educational outcomes, according to a press release.

Forty-eight schools in the United States have been named finalists and were chosen from private and public schools.

Sixteen winners will be selected from eight categories and honored at an awards ceremony on Oct. 5 in Washington, D.C.

These winners will receive a $10,000 grant. One elementary and one secondary school will be honored with a "Best of the Best" award and will receive an additional $15,000.

Terri Hanenkamp, third-grade teacher at Ogden Grade School, said the school's principal, Jim Armendariz, discovered the award contest.

"We sat down and filled out the application," Hanenkamp said. "There were numerous questions – it was a narrative-type application."

Hanenkamp said the school has implemented a math curriculum that sets it apart from the competition.

"We use the Investigations Curriculum, and we did implement that before the rest of the district," she said. "This curriculum has students construct their own learning instead of us telling them how to do it."

Hanenkamp said the curriculum was implemented quickly and smoothly because with the help of David Allen, assistant professor in elementary education.

"He did some of the model lessons and was a great help," she said. "The new curriculum really was a shift in thinking."

Michael Berndt, fourth-grade teacher and math lead for Ogden Grade School, also helped implement the new curriculum.

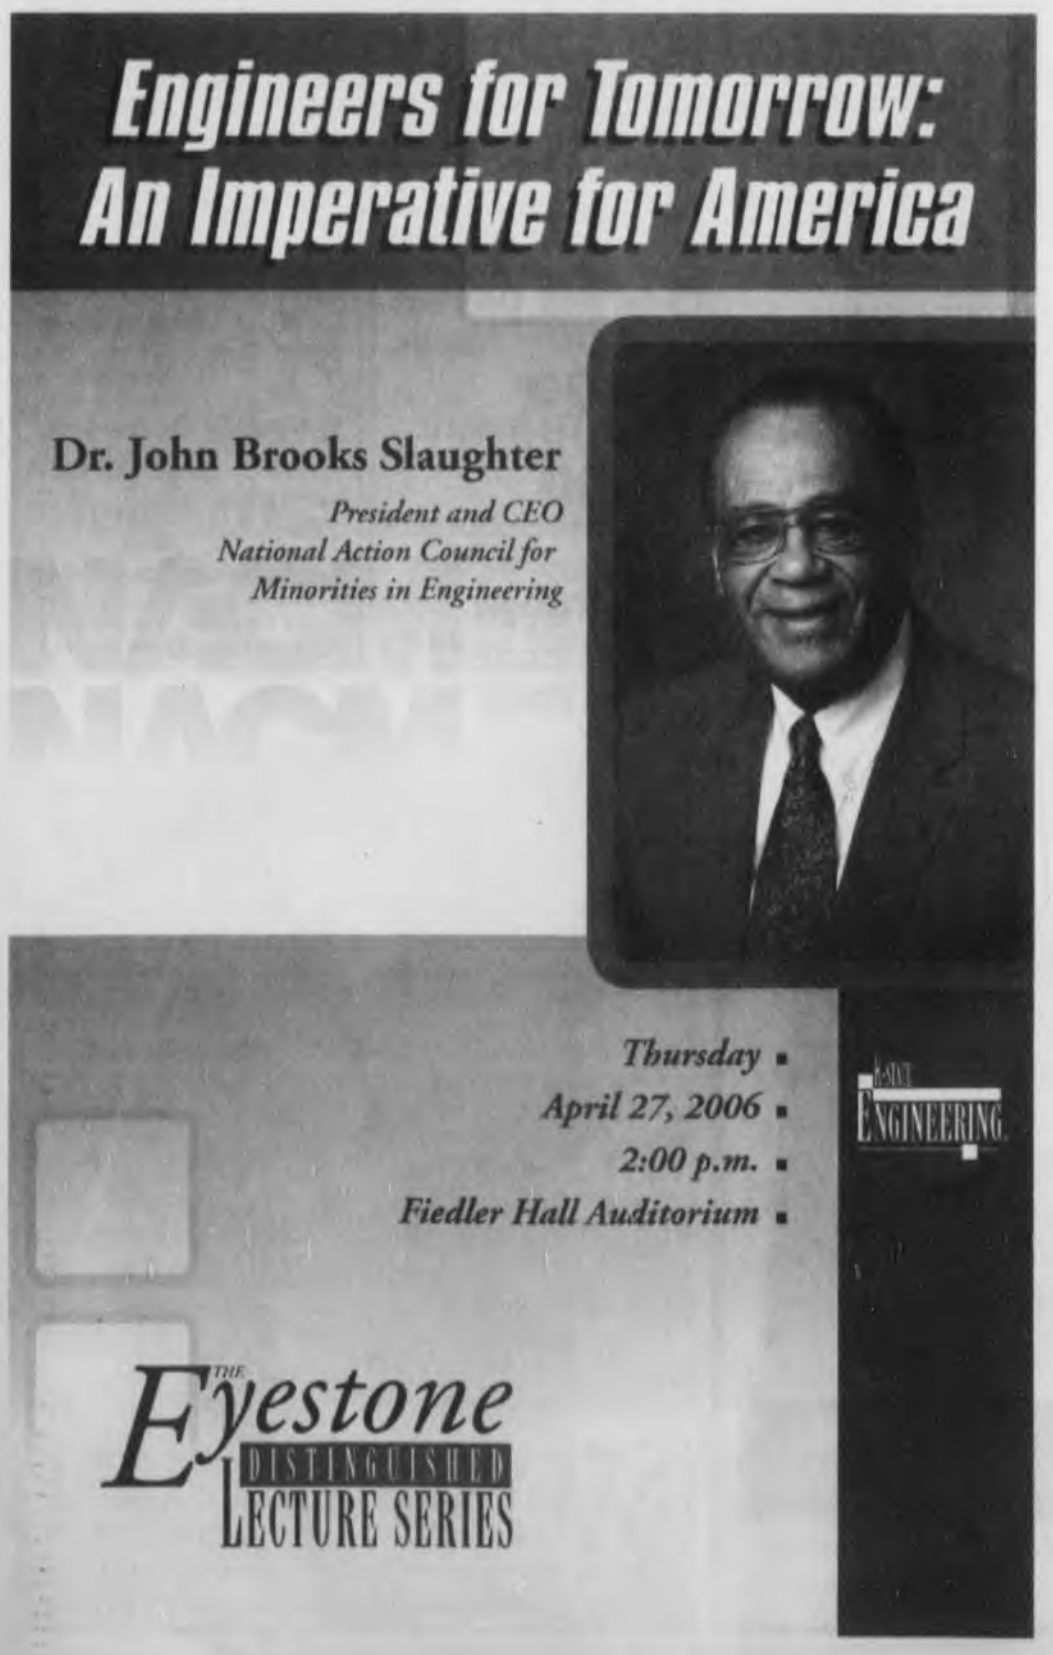
"We have an advantage in that we are a really small school, and we can coordinate with each other and talk about strategies for helping students," he said.

Berndt said one aspect that keeps students interested in the new curriculum is that it is interactive.

"The math becomes more of a hands-on activity instead of teaching," he said. "We try to get them to make all of the connections and ties in a problem. Sometimes I caught myself learning things."

Berndt said students are introduced to the curriculum when they enter Ogden Elementary School. The kindergarten students build skills they can use through the rest of elementary school, he said.

"We have a high turnover rate, and at times, it's difficult to have a kid from kindergarten to fourth grade," he said. "It is good to have a curriculum that can catch them up to speed."



Berndt said students have been positive about the math curriculum.

"It is really fun for them," he said. "Kids actually say they want to do math."

Michele Jones, coordinator of communications for Manhattan-Ogden USD 383, said being a finalist for the award is a great honor for the school.

"This not only has the potential of getting them some extra funding, but it is also a good pat on the back," she said. "This lets staff, faculty and the community of Ogden know that the school is doing a good job."

Student finalists perform in Spring Music Festival

Jessica Furney, 17, sings a vocal solo, "Broken Wings," during the Spring Music Festival on Tuesday evening at Manhattan Town Center. Furney won the competition and received a $500 gift card to the mall.

The festival included 12 performers, ranging from a fourth grade student to high school juniors, exhibiting an array of talents on the piano, on vocals and in dance. The top three winners received gift certificates to stores in the mall.

After singing for the crowd, Furney left the stage with a positive attitude about her performance.

"I think it went pretty good," she said. "I thought I could do more entertaining, but I think it went pretty well."

Furney said she has been performing since fifth grade and has competed in the festival five times.

"I've done this five times and never won," she said, "and I'm just too stubborn to give up."

Being in the final competition was a surprise, Furney said, after competing in a difficult preliminary round. Participants went through four weeks of preliminaries before Tuesday night's final competition.

"There were so many fantastic performers," Furney said.

Fifth-grader Megan Lilley took second place with her piano solo "Fur Elise."

Lilley said she really wanted to win before she performed, but after playing, she said it did not seem to matter as much.

As the final performance of the night, Lilley said she was shaking before she played.

"I was nervous, because I was last, and I had a lot of time to get nervous," Lilley said.

Sara VanAllen, Manhattan Town Center marketing manager, acted as the music festival manager. She said the event is an opportunity for children and adolescents to perform for people other than family members.

VanAllen also served as one of three judges for the festival and said choosing the top three students was difficult. She said the evening was a success with a good range of student talent.

"It went fantastic," she said. "We have such an amazing group of performers."

Journalism school considers requiring students to own a laptop

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Surveys recently have been administered in journalism and mass communications classes at K-State about requiring laptops for students in the major.

At the Missouri School of Journalism, students are encouraged to have a laptop and are suggested to buy Apple computers, according to the school's Web site.

Steve Smethers, associate professor of journalism and mass communications, said the idea of requiring laptops is being discussed.

Smethers said the topic came up in discussion due to the increase in demand for use of the lab facilities and the increase in the costs of the labs.

"It's an issue of the departments having enough money to keep the labs up-to-date," Smethers said. "Unfortunately, as the resources continue to shrink from the state, the costs are passed on to the students."

Smethers said there are three labs used for journalism and mass communications classes, and all three run at capacity.

Also, the level of technology in the labs differs, which makes it difficult when scheduling classes that are specific to the types of technology used, Smethers said.

"We can't necessarily get all the technology needed in place," Smethers said. "But we make sure every lab has production capabilities."

These issues of money, space and difficulties with scheduling led to the discussion of requiring laptops for students, Smethers said.

"If every student had their own, and there was a uniformity of software, it wouldn't matter where we held the classes," Smethers said.

He said over the years the department has fought such temptations and tried to operate the labs without passing costs onto the students.

Conversely, having a desktop computer is strongly suggested in the College of Architecture, Planning and Design, said Maureen Herspring, academic adviser for the college.

"Students could try to get along in the lab," Herspring said, "but they wouldn't have a life."

The software needed for the architecture classes is on rental through the college, Herspring said.

In the College of Engineering, students pay an equipment fee along with tuition for classes, which covers the costs of things like department labs, general purpose labs and the electronic library, Ray Hightower, dean of the College of Engineering, said.

"With the fee, there is no need for students to have their personal computers," Hightower said.

Johnny Brown, senior in advertising, said if having a Apple laptop was a requirement before he entered the journalism and mass communications major, he would not have chosen the major.

"I don't think it's a good idea to require Macs," Brown said. "I think Macs are good for the work we do in mass communications but not outside of that."

Smethers said right now the idea of requiring laptops is a work in progress.

"We're still discussing it and have a lot of questions that need to be explored," Smethers said.

K-State-Salina offers summer pilot program

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This year, students can spend their summer in the air earning their private pilot licenses at K-State-Salina.

K-State-Salina is offering a six-week summer class that allows students to earn a private pilot license while receiving five hours of K-State credit, said Marlon Johnston, head of the Department of Aviation at K-State-Salina.

According to a press release, students as young as 16 years old can participate; however, the Federal Aviation Administration requires that anyone completing the exam for a private pilot license be at least 17 years old.

The class will be offered through the K-State-Salina continuing education department, and there is no requirement for application or admission to the university, according to the report.

Johnston said the course is graded and includes a groundswork class and a lab in which students will receive about 45 hours of flight experience.

He said students learn about the airplane during the grounds class, and the lab is taken concurrently with the class for students to learn basic flight maneuvers and practice take-off and landing.

"The program is a parallel to the driver's ed course students take," Johnston said. "The students go through the classroom part while they're also practicing flying."

Johnston said students attend the course Monday through Thursday from 1- 4:30 p.m., and students fly airplanes in the mornings, as well as on Fridays and the weekends.

He said the first 10-12 hours of flight experience are with an instructor, and the rest of the program is a mixture of flying solo and with an instructor.

The program prepares students for the FAA exam from which they earn their private pilot license, Johnston said.

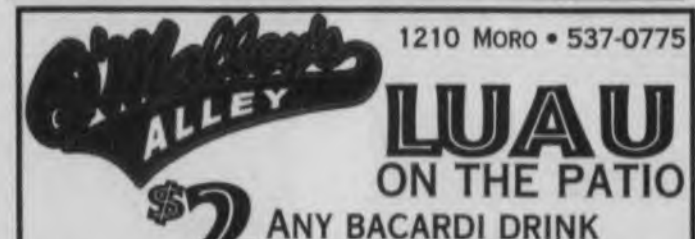
Groves said after the grounds course, students must meet a list of requirements, including a written exam, an oral exam, a physical exam and the flight test for the FAA in order to be issued a private pilot license.

He said the flight test includes a number of scenarios, like a case of bad weather in which the student would have to decide en route where to go.

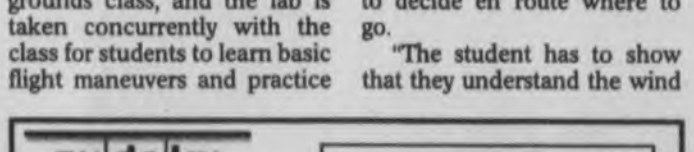
"The student has to show that they understand the wind and how it affects the airplane," Groves said.

Johnston said the private pilot license allows a pilot to fly a single engine aircraft for personal use, as well as take guests with them.

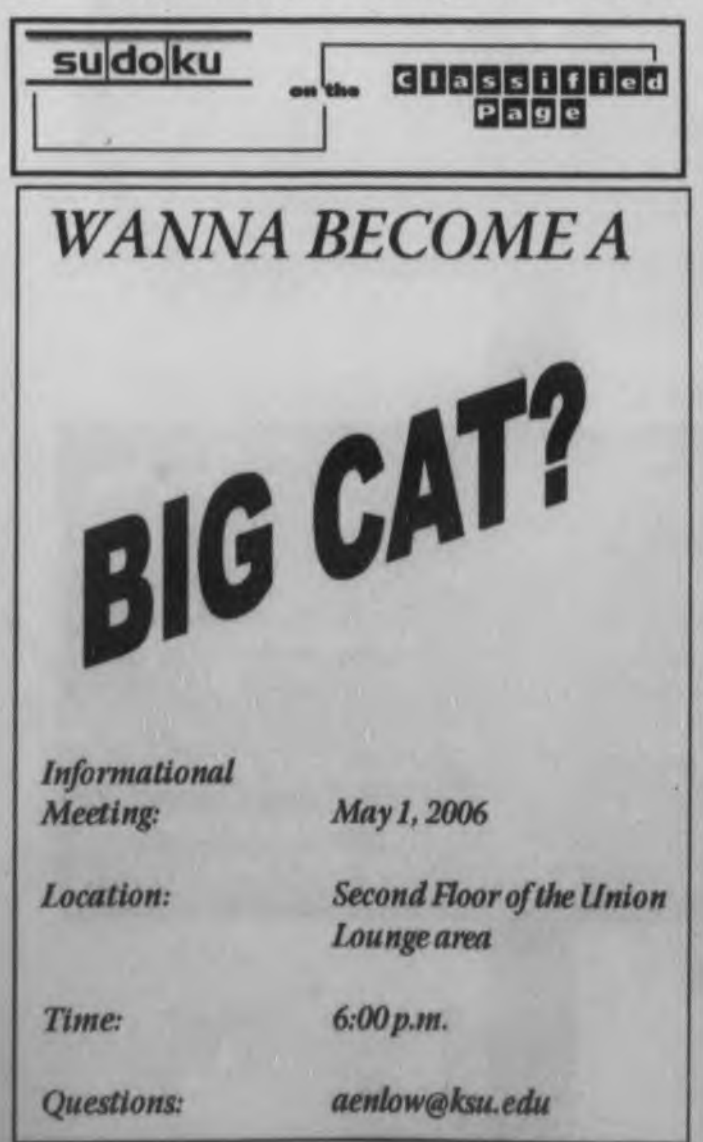


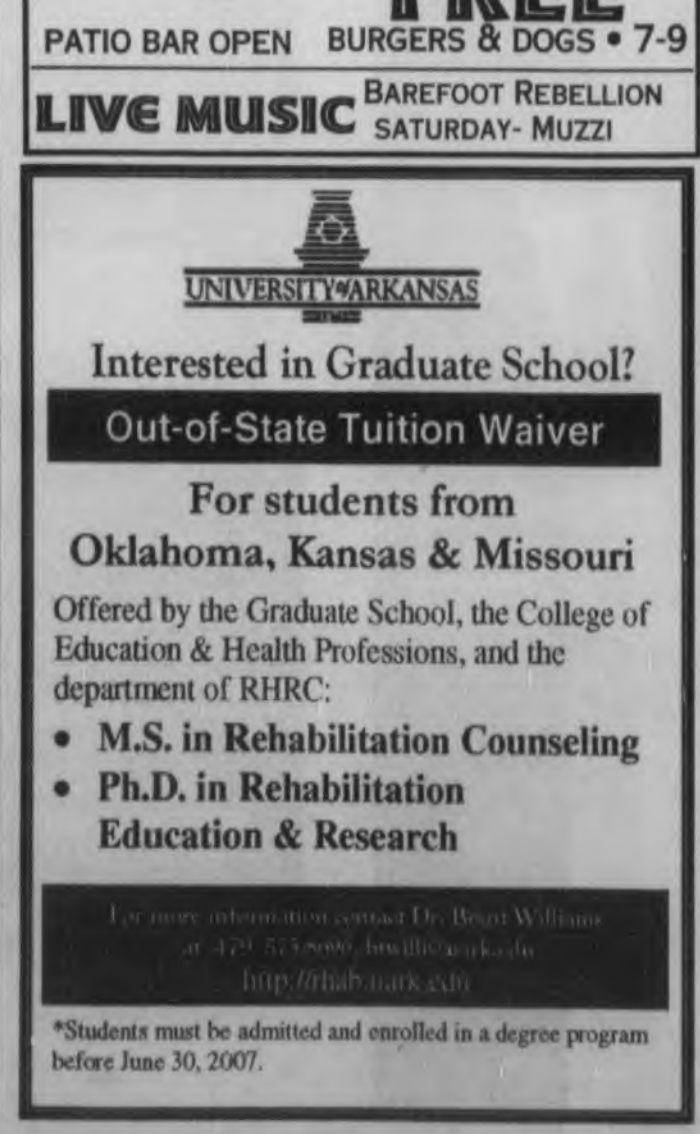
With more experience and training, students can receive different levels of certificates like a commercial pilot license, Johnston said.

Brett Amstutz, flight instructor at K-State-Salina, said each student differs in how he or she learns to fly an airplane.



"You can't compare one student to another," Amstutz said. "They all have different learning styles, and you have to adapt to their learning style to make a connection."





CHALLENGE | Officials look at other schools' courses

The extra $85,000 the allocation committee gave the Challenge Course will help make student use of the course as cheap as possible.

"Our idea for the course is that K-State students are going to be able to use it with a variety of different groups, that they're going to have the benefit of not having to worry about travel and that it would be a reduced cost compared to what they might pay somewhere else," Lehning said. "The bond surplus committee said we would really like to see a situation where K-State students are going to pay nothing or very little to be able to go through the course.

"My hunch at this point is that it's very unlikely that students would be able to go through at no cost. It's certainly likely that they will be able to go through the course at a reduced cost."

Grant Groene, bond surplus fund committee chair, said allocating the extra money was seen as a long-term gain for the entire university.

"The reasoning behind (the extra funding) was to, over the course of time, lower the cost to students at the university to use (the course). That's entirely what that $85,000 was for," Groene said. "I think, overall, as far as the big picture goes, it's a big benefit to the university."

However, one of the two senators who voted against the proposal, Sally Maddock, said she thought the construction of a challenge course was a waste of the funds.

"I am not necessarily for or against the course; I just have unresolved issues with liabilities and future costs," Maddock said. "I felt there were not enough details about how this would work over time to make an informed decision. I felt there were other programs the money could be used for that would be more beneficial to students, especially with tuition increases.

"Plus, $200,000 seemed like a lot of money for what amounts to ropes and barrels made into obstacles."

Jon-Scott Godsey, assistant director of outdoor recreation at the University of Nebraska, helps oversee Nebraska's challenge course, which was built in 2000 for slightly more than $225,000.

Godsey, who has written a thesis on the benefits of these courses, said the fact that the funding is already in place to build a challenge course at K-State is an important hurdle cleared.

"A challenge course is a powerful tool, and it's a very unique tool in that lots of team-building activities can be done in a variety of different spaces," he said. "It took me four years to get funding in place to replace a challenge course that we had. Having that kind of money come in to build a course is an amazing windfall.

"Is it too much? No."

In researching the elements of a challenge course, K-State officials contacted Nebraska, Oklahoma State University, Texas Tech University and Oregon State University, all of which have a challenge course similar to the one K-State hopes to build.

Scott Jordan, coordinator of Outdoor Adventure at Oklahoma State, said Oklahoma State's course, built in 1978 and serving about 3,000 students per year, is a benefit to the university's student population.

"We're able to do many, many things on it that we wouldn't have access to if we didn't get it," Jordan said. "Mostly, it's student employees. It's often the first time in their lives that they're able to facilitate groups of people and teach them leadership and show them how teamwork is working. They're using things that they probably have learned in an ecology class or a sociology class and applying them directly to groups.

Lehning said the hope is that once the course is built, student groups like Wildcat Warm-Up, Leadership Studies, greek houses, SGA and many others, as well as corporate and private groups from outside the university, will use the course as a reason to come to K-State and take advantage of the team-building activities a challenge course offers.

The closest challenge course to Manhattan is the Rock Springs 4-H Club, located about 20 minutes south of Junction City.

"If the course is convenient and affordable, groups would have that as an opportunity and an option that right now is just not viable given their budgets and the time commitments that students have to take off," Lehning said. "I think we have a tremendous opportunity here to showcase K-State and to provide this unique type of leadership experience for our students and then for others who may want to partake."

TEACHERS | Decline in education students slight about six times throughout the year to help them feel comfortable with parents, assessments and classroom management. New teachers find that when they have that support the first year, it really helps."

Mike Perl, assistant dean of the College of Education, said there has been only a slight decline in the number of education students at K-State.

"Our numbers are about the same, but we have noticed a change of the number going into elementary education," Perl said.

There have been more students interested in teaching in elementary schools, he said.

Perl said the K-State block program in both elementary and secondary education curricula helps ease students into a classroom atmosphere.

"We have four field experiences," Perl said. "They go into the field as a sophomore four hours a week for the semester. During junior year, they go into teaching a little bit. They do a lot of work in the schools in preparing for those lessons. Senior year they do more teaching and teach several lessons.

"Generally, the last semester will be their student teaching. They're out there every day, all day. They work under the guidance of a full-time teacher. During this time, they can decide if it's for them."

Perl said the system helps students decide if they want to be a teacher before they pursue the degree for too long.

He said the Kansas teacher shortage is not necessarily caused by too few people going into teaching.

"We have approximately twice as many certified teachers in Kansas than we need, but there are a lot of people that aren't teaching," Perl said. "Some people decide they would rather sell insurance or go back to law school or something like that. The biggest reason for the shortage of teachers is because of retirement."

Erin Hoppock, senior in elementary education, said one reason for the shortage might be low salaries.

"Pay isn't the main reason you go into teaching," Hoppock said. "I've always loved kids and being around kids. I want to coach, so I think that played a big part in it."

"Pay isn't the main reason you go into teaching. I've always loved kids and being around kids. I want to coach, so I think that played a big part in it."

Evans also said salary is not the factor that sways students into education fields.

"The bottom line is that are you passionate," Evans said. "Passion will take you a whole lot further in life. Teachers don't do this because they're going to make money."

FUTILITY | Clippers' success gives Royals fans reason to keep hope alive

Mientkiewicz won a World Series with the Boston Red Sox recently, but he just barely returned the ball with which the final out was acquired, after he found out there was not a market to which he could sell it, coupled with pressure from his employer, Major League Baseball.

The next time you start feeling down about the Royals not making the playoffs for 21-straight years, just remember – if the Clippers can do it, it must be possible. It just takes a few breaks and a bit of luck to remove the tag as the most embarrassing, degrading franchise in sports.

Committee drafts $466 million school finance plan

By John Milburn
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – The Senate Education Committee endorsed a $466 million school finance package Tuesday, sending the bill to the chamber for debate.

The committee assembled the three-year package after two days of meetings, culling ideas from six proposals aimed at satisfying a Kansas Supreme Court order to increase school spending to meet constitutional mandates.

Senators want to debate the bill as soon as possible, perhaps as early as Thursday.

Legislators return Wednesday to the Statehouse after a 3 1/2-week break to conclude their remaining business of the 2006 session. Other items still on the table include stronger penalties for sex offenders, limiting government seizure of private land and a bevy of tax cuts.

"I think it's a pretty good plan. I think there's a pretty good chance it will pass," said Sen. John Vratil, R-Leawood.

The plan puts more money in the base state aid that all districts receive, and sets aside additional funds for special education and programs aimed at students at risk of failure in school.

The at-risk programs dominated the discussion over two days, as senators sought to address concerns raised in 2005 by the court and the findings of a cost study released in January by the Legislative Division of Post Audit.

Both said it costs more to educate students at risk of failing, especially given state and federal mandates for student performance.

Budget projections completed moments after the plan was completed show the state can afford the package and remain financially solvent in the coming years. That's contrary to earlier plans, which conservatives opposed partly because of the potential for forcing tax increases or expanding gambling.

"At this point in time, I think I will support it," said Sen. Pat Apple, R-Louisburg, who opposed earlier bills but is satisfied the new plan is realistic.

Others had their doubts.

"I could be wrong, maybe someone can read tea leaves better than I can, but I don't see 21 votes," said Sen. Ralph Ostmeyer, R-Grinnell, referring to a majority in the Senate.

He said the plan was still too expensive and could hurt the state budget in coming years.

House members passed a three-year, $633 million school finance package in late March, a deal brokered by a coalition of moderate Republicans and Democrats.

Senators rejected that plan before the Legislature started its spring break, along with a three-year, $724 million plan from Senate GOP leaders and a four-year plan from Sen. Jim Barnett, R-Emporia. Barnett's $495 million proposal was part of his campaign for the GOP nomination for governor.

Senators proposed no changes to a law allowing districts to raise additional property taxes to pay for school operations. Districts can raise up to 29 percent of their general fund budget in 2006-07 and 30 percent in the 2007-08.

However, the committee spent considerable time talking about what it takes to get credit from the court for the more than $218 million the state pays districts as they increase local property taxes. The state pays extra based on property values, with wealthier districts receiving nothing.

The problem, some say, is the court hasn't recognized any of that money as part of the overall spending by legislators on schools.

Senators inserted language stating the additional state aid is to be considered in calculating total state education spending.

Vratil said it was unclear whether the court would view the statement favorably, because some wealthier districts aren't compensated for raising local property taxes.

Countered Sen. Janis Lee, D-Kensington, "Go ahead and do it. All they can do is laugh at us."

U.S. Supreme Court reconsiders Kansas death penalty arguments

By Sam Hananel
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Justice Samuel Alito was ready to play the role of tiebreaker as the Supreme Court heard arguments for a second time Tuesday in a case that considers the constitutionality of Kansas' death penalty law.

The court first heard arguments in the case on Dec. 7, 2005, but apparently justices were deadlocked after Justice Sandra Day O'Connor retired with a decision still pending.

O'Connor was a swing vote in a number of death penalty cases, sometimes joining the four more liberal members in throwing out death sentences.

Alito, who joined the court in January, asked several questions of both sides during oral arguments, but did not indicate how he might decide.

The 1994 law says jurors must sentence a defendant to death if they find that factors for and against the death penalty are of equal weight. The state Supreme Court struck it down, invalidating the death sentences of six convicted killers.

Kansas Attorney General Phill Kline said the law is valid because it does not stop jurors from deciding how much weight to give aggravating and mitigating circumstances in reaching a sentence.

"There is no chance in this case that the jurors weren't able to take the mitigating factors and give them whatever effect they wanted," Kline said.

Attorney Rebecca Woodman with the Kansas Capital Appellate Defender's Office said the statute improperly leads jurors to choose a death sentence if they think the decision is too close to call, in violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment.

"If jurors can't decide between aggravating and mitigating circumstances, the sentence is death," Woodman said.

Alito told Kline the law seems to act like a "default rule" in favor of death when jurors simply can't make up their minds.

Kline said that as a practical matter, the law does not interfere with a juror's discretion to choose a life sentence.

Alito later asked Woodman whether defendants are better off under the Kansas statute because it offers jurors more flexibility to consider mitigating factors than sentencing laws in other states.

She disagreed, saying the Kansas law encourages jurors to give up in the hard cases.

Justice David Souter offered the harshest criticism of the Kansas law: "We're on the fence, but execute anyway seems a total inconsistency," Souter told Kline.

But Justice Antonin Scalia said it could make sense if put another way: "There is no mitigating evidence to outweigh those aggravating factors – that seems to me a perfectly moral response."

Chief Justice John Roberts said it seemed unrealistic to think that a juror would precisely quantify each factor for and against death and find each side to be perfectly equal.

"I don't think that's the way jurors would react," Roberts said. "I just think it's an unrealistic supposition."

There are seven people sentenced to death under the law being considered by the court. An eighth person had his death sentence overturned in 2001 and awaits resentencing.

Fifteen states have filed a friend of the court brief supporting the Kansas statute. They predict a ruling against Kansas would force other states to redraft their own death penalty laws.

A decision is expected in the next few months.

Homeless night

12 students sleep in boxes to experience life of poverty

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A dozen students from various residence halls spent Wednesday night in cardboard boxes.

A large tarp was spread out on the lawn across from Haymaker Hall, and, with only cardboard and duct tape, participants of "Sleep in a Box" constructed their temporary homes.

Paul Hanusch, senior in management and multicultural assistant in Moore Hall, said he got the idea for "Sleep in a Box" from a similar event he participated in during high school.

"I thought it would be a creative way to get people involved," Hanusch said. "But here we're not doing it to raise money; we're doing it as a learning experience."

Though participants were trying to experience a life of poverty, Hanusch said they still had a few benefits.

"We brought food (Wednesday) as an extra incentive," he said. "Plus, we're going to help take care of them."

Several students brought comforters or sleeping bags, pillows and extra clothing. Students were allowed to keep their cell phones with them during the night in case of an emergency. The phones also could be used as alarm clocks, as each participant had to get ready for class today.

Layla El-Chami, junior in family studies and human services and multicultural assistant in Ford Hall, said food was not the only item offered to participants.

"We're giving out rewards for the most creative shelters," she said. "The winners get things they would want for the night, like blankets and flashlights."

Erin Watson, freshman in biology, built her cardboard creation before the start of the campout. She said she built the "Purple Power Tower," as it read, by herself.

"I heard there were prizes for the best-decorated box," she said. "My friend suggested I make mine look like a castle, so that's what I did."

RCPD looks into larceny

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The investigation into missing funds in the Manhattan Parks and Recreation division has resulted in an additional larceny investigation, said Lt. Michael Quintanar of the Riley County Police Department.

The investigation includes charges of theft and conspiracy to commit a theft, Quintanar said.

"In our investigation of the Parks and Recreation department, we came up with some additional information," RCPD Director Mike Watson said.

The additional information involves $3,000 in missing funds from the Youth Empowerment for Success fund, the Manhattan Baseball Association and the McCormick Tribune Foundation of Chicago, Watson said.

The McCormick Tribune Foundation's building, 318 N. 5th St. and is currently occupied by the Manhattan Mercury.

The YES fund raises money locally to fund after-school programs, Ned Seaton, general manager of the Mercury said.

The YES fund originally was known by a different name when it began in 1993, Seaton said.

The fund originally was intended to raise money to help people after the flood of 1993, but the following year it was decided to continue the fund to help Manhattan children, Seaton said.

The Mercury's involvement with the YES fund is limited, Seaton said.

"Organizing the campaign and support administration and promotion," was the extent the Mercury's involvement, he said.

Money raised locally is matched by the McCormick foundation, and local agencies then apply for funding, Seaton said.

The missing funds from the Mercury, the YES fund and the Manhattan Baseball Association are related, Quintanar said.

"Because they're all part of the same mechanism, they're all victims," Quintanar said.

The RCPD hopes to finish the investigation of the Parks and Recreation department in the next two weeks, if no additional information arises, Watson said.

No arrests have been made in the investigation, Watson said.

"If these things are true, it's very disappointing, in that (the money) was meant for kids," Seaton said of the missing funds.

Testimonies, information about rape presented at 412 rally

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Darcy Hamilton, senior in mass communications, talks about rape during the 412 event in the Bosco Student Plaza Wednesday afternoon. On average, 412 women are raped on a college campus the size of K-State every year.

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An average of 412 women are raped on campuses the size of K-State every year, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

From 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. Wednesday in the Union courtyard, the 412 rally presented victim testimonies, words of support and information tables to promote rape awareness on campus. There were 412 numbered stickers passed out, signifying the rape victims at K-State.

Kelli Burns and Alex Ball, directors of community and internal relations for the Panhellenic and Interfraternity Councils, respectively, said they both know people who have been victims of rape and wanted to do something about the issue.

Burns and Ball said they organized the event in conjunction with the Women's Center and Wildcats Against Rape.

"We wanted to get something done before the end of the semester to raise awareness, because rape is just not talked about enough, and we wanted to open up awareness," Burns, senior in family studies, said.

During the rally, a recent column in the Collegian concerning rape was discussed.

"The Collegian column said that girls get raped because of what they wear. That column made me very angry because I was raped in a hoodie and a sweatshirt," Amanda Smith, junior in elementary education, said.

The event also aimed to show how men can get involved in the fight against rape, Ball said.

"This is not a male-bashing event," Ball said. "This is not just a women's issue, but as men, we have a responsibility to be supportive in an event of rape."

Women spoke about their experiences with rape at K-State.

Council to hear questions, comments about proposed parking fee changes at forum

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Council on Parking Operations will have a forum today to hear questions and comments on its proposed increases in parking permit prices and fines.

The fee increases will help finance the parking garage, said Gary Leitnaker, assistant vice president for the Division of Human Resources and Parking.

Leitnaker said construction on the parking garage, which will be located south of the K-State Student Union, might begin as soon as May 2007.

During the 15-18 months of construction, Leitnaker said the Council on Parking Operations will offer a shuttle system if there is a demand for it.

Student Senate passed a resolution supporting a parking garage with a vote of 49-8-0 on Sept. 8, 2005.

The council has a public forum every April to hear comments on any proposed rate or regulation changes for the following school year, Leitnaker said.

"Any comments will be gathered and presented to upper administration," he said.

Members of the Council on Parking Operations will listen to presentations and make a final decision on the proposed changes, said Bill Muir, member of the Council on Parking Operations and chairman of Finance Committee.

At its March 16 meeting, the council approved the proposed change of fines for those who have a parking permit but fail to display it properly.

Pi Phi team wins Derby Days song, dance competition

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN
Andrea Oltjen, junior in hotel and restaurant management, center, performs a dance at Derby Days.

By Megan Molitor
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Houston Street Ballroom vibrated with songs and cheers during Wednesday night's "Derby Days."

Seven sororities participated in the event organized by the Sigma Chi fraternity. In groups of five women and two Sigma Chi members, teams performed song-and-dance routines.

The first performers, members of Alpha Chi Omega, performed a mix of "Miami," "Funkytown" and a song from the movie "The Little Mermaid." They were followed by Pi Beta Phi members, who danced in cowgirl costumes to "The Devil Went Down to Georgia."

Kappa Delta members performed to "Like A Prayer," and Chi Omega members danced to the theme from "Men in Black."

Sigma Kappa members also dressed as cowgirls for "She Thinks My Tractor's Sexy" and switched mid-number to Sisqo's "Thong Song."

Alpha Xi Delta members danced to "Everybody Dance Now."

Delta Delta Delta members danced to "Taking Care of Business" and "Working 9 to 5."

"I think we did great," said Chris Snell, Sigma Chi member who performed with Pi Phi. "I was pretty nervous, but I did it last year, so I had an idea of what it would be like. The more you look like a fool up there, the better. You'll have more fun that way."

After the first performances, team captains drew songs for the improvisational round. They teams had 10 minutes to practice and then performed to the first 90 seconds of the song.

Songs performed included "I Love Rock and Roll," "Love Shack," "Jesse's Girl," "Country Grammar" and "Wannabe."

Lauren Anderson, Alpha Chi member and senior in architecture, said she thought her team performed well.

"We had a lot of fun, and I think we were pretty original," she said. "We've been practicing for a week and a half, but I was still really nervous. Performing the second time with only 10 minutes of practice was really confusing."

Pi Phi won the competition, and second place went to Tri-Delt. Chi O took third.

"We worked really hard for this, so it feels really great," said Emily McClelland, Pi Phi member and junior in Spanish and mass communications. "We were really nervous and it's so hot up there on that stage, but it just felt good. The second time, we didn't know the song, so we just made a lot of stuff up. I was pretty confident we would win, but you never know."

Researchers study Paraguay, virus

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two K-State professors and one graduate student are using satellites and remote sensing to discover how land changes in Paraguay are causing outbreaks of Hantavirus Pulmonary Syndrome.

According to the National Center for Infectious Diseases, Hantavirus Pulmonary Syndrome is a disease transmitted by infected rodents through urine, droppings or saliva. Humans contract the disease when they breathe in the virus.

Common symptoms of the disease are fatigue, fever and muscle aches. If the virus goes undetected, the infected person experiences coughing and shortness of breath, and their lungs fill with fluid, according to the center.

Shawn Hutchinson, assistant professor of geography; Doug Goodin, professor or geography; and David Koch, graduate student in geography, began using remote sensing almost two years ago.

Hutchinson said remote sensing provides the ability to gather information from a surface without being in direct physical contact. He said a person's eyes are a simple example of a remote sensing device.

"We can look outside, and we can pick up bits of information without necessarily having to touch a surface," he said.

Hutchinson said other examples of remote sensing devices are Earth-orbiting satellites, which monitor Earth surface conditions and Earth's atmosphere conditions.

"We can take those digital images and process them and derive from them biological and physical measurements about the Earth's surfaces," he said.

Hutchinson said he and Goodin have been interested in researching Paraguay since 2002. They made trips to different parts of the country, and through those efforts, got in touch with other researchers at Texas Tech University and the Southern Research Institute.

"We started talking about the Hantavirus project because there is a need from an epidemiological perspective to look at where and why Hantavirus outbreaks begin," he said. "The epidemiologists involved did not have the geographic skills or the biological skills to address the main problems."

Hutchinson said biologists at Texas Tech and epidemiologists at the Southern Research Institute worked with K-State in a collaborative research effort. The research is funded through the National Institute of Health.

Hutchinson said researchers use the information gathered through remote sensing to see how rapid changes in land are increasing how rodents are infected with the virus.

"These land cover changes are essentially causing some sort of stress on the rodent population in the area which exacerbates Hantavirus outbreaks," he said. "You get increased competition and fighting amongst rodents so the disease is transmitted more rapidly throughout the rodent population."

Because these land changes are human induced; there is generally a higher than average human population in the area, Hutchinson said.

"As the disease becomes more prevalent in the rodent population the opportunity for it to be transmitted to humans increases," he said.

Goodin said the understanding of rodents in Paraguay is a key aspect in understanding the Hantavirus disease.

"Since this is a disease that is hosted by rodents a lot of understanding how the disease work boils down to understand how the host rodents live in their environment and transfer

Senate to vote on funds for child center

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate will vote tonight at its final meeting of the semester on a bill to allocate funds to the KSU Child Development Center.

Senate is recommending an allocation of $13,000 to the center for Fiscal Year 2006 to obtain a program statement, budget and architectural renderings, according to the proposed legislation.

The program statement, budget and architectural renderings will aid in fundraising for the center, which is in need of reconstruction, according to the legislation.

A feasibility study of the center was completed in February. It found that the physical structure of the center is unacceptable, said Rilie Tilley, president of the Board of Directors for the center.

However, the study consultant said the center's programs and teachers are top-quality, Tilley said.

"We just happen to be housed in a poor facility," she said.

Tilley said there are several architecture firms that the center has in mind for its preliminary concept drawing.

The program statement, budget and architectural renderings also are required to obtain brick and mortar grants for the new facility, Tilley said.

University administration and the center each pledged $13,000 toward the statement, budget and renderings, according to the proposed legislation.

During the first open period of the Senate meeting, Tilley said there will be a presentation about the center.

"It will be general information to hopefully get the new Student Senate up to speed on our goals at the center," she said.

Student Senate Chair Ashley Boldt said the presentation will educate senators on the need for funding at the center.

"Not every senator has had the opportunity to tour the Development Center and have background on the situation they are facing," Boldt said. "We wanted senators to be able to have an educated vote on the bill."

Two-thirds of student senators have to vote in favor of the bill for it to pass, Boldt said.

"We really want to push this project so we can help out with the problems they're having right now," she said.

Student Body President Lucas Maddy said the proposed allocation will aid the center.

"If we are able to provide an exemplary consultant report, we will be able to receive more private funding," he said. "It will lessen the burden for us."

Gas gripes

Alaska drilling foes should accept pump prices

OWEN KENNEDY

Last fall gas prices reached record highs, and most of the blame was aimed at the destruction of off-shore oil rigs caused by Hurricane Katrina.

A hurricane season later, gas prices are on the rise again. But this time, the oil companies and refineries aren't the only ones benefitting from prices topping $3 a gallon.

For years, President Bush and his administration have told the Americans that allowing oil companies to drill in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge would ease dependence on foreign oil, thereby lowering gas prices. As these prices go up, Bush's argument to drill in Alaska gains strength. All the president has to say is, "See, I told you so," and Americans would be standing in line to support drilling in ANWR.

What surprises me is the fact that those who opposed drilling in Alaska are the same people who are complaining about current gas prices. As long as these people continue to complain, they are unknowingly supporting the destruction of one of our national parks.

How could we not see this coming?

We were warned that this would happen by the president, his administration and other supporters of defacing a national park. Yet we act as though these prices caught us by surprise.

I opposed drilling in Alaska, not because I enjoy paying $35 to fill my tank, but because I believe national parks, especially those protecting endangered species, should not be touched.

I opposed drilling, fully aware of the consequences. I knew my wallet would have to be a bit thinner, yet I opposed President Bush's push to drill in Alaska anyway.

A popular ideal of many liberals, mostly young Americans, has been to take pride in living above money. True, we might be able to save money, but we so strongly believe in our cause that we will not let the green move us from our path toward what we believe is right.

The loudest voices opposed to drilling in Alaska should not be the loudest voices opposed to high gas prices.

It is easy to think high gas prices are detrimental to the Bush administration, but in reality, public outrage about gas prices is the best Easter present the oil companies and the president could have requested. For every complaint about gas prices, support for drilling in Alaska gains that much more strength and merit.

It might be difficult for many of us to pay so much for fossil fuels, off but imagine how much worse the wildlife protected in ANWR would be if we disrupt their delicately balanced environment.

Cheap gas will never erase the knowledge that we are knowingly destroying a national park and the wildlife therein. Do not sell your soul for gas.

I will gladly pay $3 a gallon for gas knowing our national parks are safe. I encourage all of you to have the same mindset. All you will have to do is be silent when you fill your tank.

X-rated businesses have right to advertise

ALEX PEAK

The placement of billboards advertising a strip club or adult store won't ruin anyone's childhood. Many people seem to believe advertisements should be pushed to city limits in order to keep communities clean.

The new law Gov. Kathleen Sebelius signed in Topeka will implement restrictions on outdoor signs and billboards for sex-related shops and strip clubs.

No one ever seems to consider the rights of these porn shop owners when fighting and pushing for cleaner communities.

While communities might not want ads for strip clubs to be all over town, owners and advertisers still deserve First Amendment rights, too, don't they?

To each their own interest.

Just because some people make their livings off dropping garments in front of an audience or by selling sexually stimulating devices, each person, as long as he does not tread on the rights of anyone else, should still be allowed constitutional rights.

Billboards (outdoor signs) are now prohibited from being anywhere within a mile of state highway and are to be no larger than 40 square feet. They also are restricted to tout only a company's name, hours of operation, location and contact information. By law, a second sign must be displayed letting minors know they are prohibited from the companies' services and property.

It's not like there will be a new pandemic in which children's eyes will burn out of their tiny heads if they see a gentlemen's club ad along the road.

Will they immediately become blood-thirsty sex offenders from knowing a few strip clubs exist in town?

Probably not.

Why hide the youth of America from the truth? No one is promoting that children participate in sex acts or to become regulars at the Lion's Den, but there's no reason to deny that stores like that exist at all.

By no means are parents expected to advertise to their posterity all of the sex shops and stripper dives in town, but they shouldn't lie to kids and deny neighborhood business either.

If children do go on to become sex offenders, most likely it's not the result of exposure to a strip club's sign. There are probably bigger problems at home and in the kids' lives than the billboard if they become sex offenders.

Don't hide children from the reality of society. The United States is teeming with pornography. Attempting to conceal society from children is ludicrous.

So what if your kid sees a sign for a porn shop while you're driving down the interstate?

It will make for good driving conversation.

Parents, would you rather explain to your youngsters learn what a porn shop is (with your token tagline attached in your speech) or have them find out by sneaking in with their friends during high school?

It saves a lot of energy and grief if you get it over with sooner. Inevitably children will learn what porn is – whether from personal experience, friends, the media or school.

Children of America, this message is for you. Yes, adult specialty stores exist. They sell outfits, lubricants, videos, mechanical sexual devices and many, other sexual accessories and stimulants. However, children, note that these stores are off-limits to you until you are 18 years of age or older.

No one is encouraging you to take part in these activities, and no one is asking you to buy anything from these stores. The people who utilize these stores are not necessarily bad (as your parents or community might suggest). Many perfectly normal sex-charged members of society choose to go to strip clubs and adult specialty stores.

If you have any questions, feel free to interrogate your parents.

Column reinforces victims' guilt response

Editor,

To be completely honest, as a victim of two rapes, I'm disturbed by Mr. Kirksey's article. Responses to rape vary from person to person. There are, however, several psychological and emotional responses that seem to be common to some or most rape victims.

Two such psychological responses are fear and guilt. A woman might become fearful of unfamiliar situations and distrustful of new acquaintances, and often, even friends. She fears her rapist will return, but this article perpetuates the fears that others will find out what has occurred and blame her. Telling a woman a man chooses to rape her because of her appearance is false, but more importantly, harmful.

This article enables another response – guilt. Victims often feel they somehow might have provoked the rape or feel that they couldn't have done something to stop it.

This article implies that dressing like a nun will prevent rape.

Clothes do not communicate by themselves, and if they did, then why is that my rapist broke into my house and woke me from my sleep? Was it because my sweat pants I wore earlier that day "communicated" I want sex? I think not.

Kirksey is implying that rape is an impulsive, uncontrollable act of sexual gratification and that when a sexually frustrated man sees a woman wearing provocative clothing, he just can't control himself. This is only perpetuating a myth and the psychological and emotional effects sexual assault has on a woman.

Rape still threatens; protests must continue

Editor,

When I read Kirksey's editorial, I viewed it as extremely misguided and uneducated. Despite the fact that it appeared on the opinion page, I did not view it as the opinion of the Collegian as a whole, just one writer. Today, after reading Lola Shrimplin's editorial (Repetition of wrongness of rape dulls senses), I think my view was incorrect. Twice this week, the Collegian has published articles speaking out against rape victims and advocates against violence. I can only come to one assumption: the Kansas State Collegian endorses the view that the blame for rape lies on the shoulders of the victims, and no one wants to hear (or cares) about these acts of violence.

Shrimplin states that rape is horrible and wrong, but the victims should quit complaining about it already. She states that the public protesting and fighting against rape only serves to turn people off to the issue and cause the public to not care about rape and its victims. In short, she states enough is enough; move on.

Obviously, enough is not enough. If it truly were enough, rape would not be a threat. If everyone understood the issue, it would not be an issue. Sadly, there are many out there who do not understand or care that rape is wrong. Until the day that this type of violence comes to an end, we must continue to speak out, to educate, to protest, to rage. Yes, rape is a difficult subject to hear about, but one that must be discussed. To not fight against rape and other forms of sexual assault only serves to give validation to those who continue to perpetrate these crimes.

Examine attitudes that cloud interpretations

Editor,

Clothing choices never mean sexual availability. If a woman chooses to walk down the streets of Aggieville naked on a Friday night, she is not stating an invasion of her body is acceptable for any person drunk or sober.

In the summer, men frequently roam the streets shirtless. Does this indicate any level of sexual availability? Does this mean that any man or woman who sees this revealed flesh and desires it should have a right to invade it? No, it most certainly doesn't. Rape is not about sexual desire.

Although I completely disagree with the proclamation that clothing choices have anything to do with rape, I will concede that there is a problem with relying purely on vocal indications for a man to know if he is permitted to have sex with a woman. The vocalization of "yes" or "no" is often not a foolproof indicator to tell someone whether a sexual situation is being forced or not. We live in a society where women are constantly forced to say "yes" when they do not want to.

The real problem is that we structure our society in such a way as to constantly undermine a woman's sexual autonomy. We live in a world where a woman's body is sexualized in a way that a man's isn't. We live in a world where women are taught their sexual attractiveness is the most desirable and worthwhile thing they have to offer.

If anyone truly wants to put an end to rape, then they will go beyond proclaiming "yes means yes, and no means no." They will actively try to examine the society that we live in and how it fosters attitudes that make it difficult for "yes" and "no" to be expressed or interpreted accurately. Stop writing and publishing columns about who is to blame and accept that we are all participating in a system that fosters rape and must all work toward change.

Groups need to protest until change occurs

Editor,

We, Wildcats Against Rape, were saddened that Lola Shrimplin is urging folks to be quiet about an epidemic of violence.

The world is full of wonderful things and people, but injustice exists. The way change occurs and injustice ends is for concerned individuals and groups to make noise until shame, logic, love or enlightenment turns people's hearts, minds and laws toward fairness and justice.

Consider racial injustice, religious intolerance, female genital mutilation, sexual orientation bigotry, handicapped rights, child labor laws, legal wife beating, spousal ownership, world hunger, voting rights, slavery – all issues that require years of work, sacrifice, ridicule and blood, sweat and tears, before change begins to occur.

Margaret Mead said, "Never doubt that a small group of thoughtful committed citizens can change the world. Indeed it's the only thing that ever has."

We're unsure what Shrimplin means by "move on." Perhaps she is tired of looking at hungry children in Africa, of hearing about AIDS or bird flu or war. But people in groups dedicated to peace, justice or fairness fight on. Consider the huge number of children raped and abused every day. Yes, we all know the terrible toll on children right now, today, due to the lust, power and greed connected to child pornography. But just because we know there is a problem does not mean we stop raising the issue.

There is injustice in the courts and media regarding rape. The fight has just begun.

Clothing cannot consent; men must listen to answer

Editor,

I was shocked and appalled to see that a university as wonderful as K-State would allow their student newspaper to print Daniel Kirksey's column, "Women's clothes indicate intentions to men."

In his column, he tries to justify the unforgivable crime of sexually assaulting another human being, specifically women who are wearing a minimal amount of clothing.

He started his article by attacking the mantra of the nonviolence rally, Take Back The Night, which was "Whatever I wear, wherever I go, yes means yes, no means no." To me, this statement is crystal clear – if someone tells you "no," they mean "no." But according to Kirksey, "in our world, declarations mean nothing by themselves.

"The declaration that something is, or is not, has no bearing on the reality of the matter."

He seems to believe that regardless of whether a woman is consenting, if she is dressed too proactively, it's OK to rape her.

I'd like to present a hypothetical situation: if Daniel Kirksey's mother, future daughter, sister or girlfriend were wearing a short skirt, would he be OK with a man raping her, because regardless of the fact that she said "no," the man just couldn't control himself?

Or if a man thought Daniel was dressing too provocatively, I wonder if Daniel would be understanding when that man sexually assaulted him.

Personally, I don't think he'd be at peace with either situation, and if he isn't OK with it happening to himself or his loved ones, he shouldn't be OK with it happening to his peers.

I sincerely hope my fellow students, including the staff of the Collegian, recognize that rape will never be acceptable, especially on the basis of what clothes a person is wearing.

A woman's clothing cannot give legal consent, nor will it be permanently emotionally scarred by sexual assault like the victim. So let's listen to the woman inside the clothing, and if she says "no," she means "no." Sexual assault is a crime and will never be justifiable, no matter what Daniel Kirksey would like to believe.

Wearing revealing garments carries risks for women

Editor,

If only 99 percent of the students at K-State would have actually read Daniel Kirksey's article instead of just jumping on the bandwagon of morons who have totally taken his article out of context, they would know that he does not think that it is a girl's fault if she is raped, regardless of what she is wearing.

He was merely stating that clothes have signs attached to them, no matter what girls think.

Thus girls wearing revealing clothing would evoke images of sex to most guys, whereas a girl dressed conservatively would not.

He is not saying that girls should not dress this way, just that dressing that way has risks associated with it.

Of course he is against any sort of violence against women, but apparently this is not the conclusion the feminists on campus (who have started a smearing campaign against Daniel) have drawn about him.

How could we not see this coming?

We were warned that this would happen by the president, his administration and other supporters of defacing a national park. Yet we act as though these prices caught us by surprise.

I opposed drilling in Alaska, not because I enjoy paying $35 to fill my tank, but because I believe national parks, especially those protecting endangered species, should not be touched.

I opposed drilling, fully aware of the consequences. I knew my wallet would have to be a bit thinner, yet I opposed President Bush's push to drill in Alaska anyway.

A popular ideal of many liberals, mostly young Americans, has been to take pride in living above money. True, we might be able to save money, but we so strongly believe in our cause that we will not let the green move us from our path toward what we believe is right.

The loudest voices opposed to drilling in Alaska should not be the loudest voices opposed to high gas prices.

It is easy to think high gas prices are detrimental to the Bush administration, but in reality, public outrage about gas prices is the best Easter present the oil companies and the president could have requested. For every complaint about gas prices, support for drilling in Alaska gains that much more strength and merit.

It might be difficult for many of us to pay so much for fossil fuels, off but imagine how much worse the wildlife protected in ANWR would be if we disrupt their delicately balanced environment.

Cheap gas will never erase the knowledge that we are knowingly destroying a national park and the wildlife therein. Do not sell your soul for gas.

I will gladly pay $3 a gallon for gas knowing our national parks are safe. I encourage all of you to have the same mindset. All you will have to do is be silent when you fill your tank.

X-rated businesses have right to advertise

ALEX PEAK

The placement of billboards advertising a strip club or adult store won't ruin anyone's childhood. Many people seem to believe advertisements should be pushed to city limits in order to keep communities clean.

The new law Gov. Kathleen Sebelius signed in Topeka will implement restrictions on outdoor signs and billboards for sex-related shops and strip clubs.

No one ever seems to consider the rights of these porn shop owners when fighting and pushing for cleaner communities.

While communities might not want ads for strip clubs to be all over town, owners and advertisers still deserve First Amendment rights, too, don't they?

To each their own interest.

Just because some people make their livings off dropping garments in front of an audience or by selling sexually stimulating devices, each person, as long as he does not tread on the rights of anyone else, should still be allowed constitutional rights.

Billboards (outdoor signs) are now prohibited from being anywhere within a mile of state highway and are to be no larger than 40 square feet. They also are restricted to tout only a company's name, hours of operation, location and contact information. By law, a second sign must be displayed letting minors know they are prohibited from the companies' services and property.

It's not like there will be a new pandemic in which children's eyes will burn out of their tiny heads if they see a gentlemen's club ad along the road.

Will they immediately become blood-thirsty sex offenders from knowing a few strip clubs exist in town?

Probably not.

Why hide the youth of America from the truth? No one is promoting that children participate in sex acts or to become regulars at the Lion's Den, but there's no reason to deny that stores like that exist at all.

By no means are parents expected to advertise to their posterity all of the sex shops and stripper dives in town, but they shouldn't lie to kids and deny neighborhood business either.

If children do go on to become sex offenders, most likely it's not the result of exposure to a strip club's sign. There are probably bigger problems at home and in the kids' lives than the billboard if they become sex offenders.

Don't hide children from the reality of society. The United States is teeming with pornography. Attempting to conceal society from children is ludicrous.

So what if your kid sees a sign for a porn shop while you're driving down the interstate?

It will make for good driving conversation.

Parents, would you rather explain to your youngsters learn what a porn shop is (with your token tagline attached in your speech) or have them find out by sneaking in with their friends during high school?

It saves a lot of energy and grief if you get it over with sooner. Inevitably children will learn what porn is – whether from personal experience, friends, the media or school.

Children of America, this message is for you. Yes, adult specialty stores exist. They sell outfits, lubricants, videos, mechanical sexual devices and many, other sexual accessories and stimulants. However, children, note that these stores are off-limits to you until you are 18 years of age or older.

No one is encouraging you to take part in these activities, and no one is asking you to buy anything from these stores. The people who utilize these stores are not necessarily bad (as your parents or community might suggest). Many perfectly normal sex-charged members of society choose to go to strip clubs and adult specialty stores.

If you have any questions, feel free to interrogate your parents.

Column reinforces victims' guilt response

Editor,

To be completely honest, as a victim of two rapes, I'm disturbed by Mr. Kirksey's article. Responses to rape vary from person to person. There are, however, several psychological and emotional responses that seem to be common to some or most rape victims.

Two such psychological responses are fear and guilt. A woman might become fearful of unfamiliar situations and distrustful of new acquaintances, and often, even friends. She fears her rapist will return, but this article perpetuates the fears that others will find out what has occurred and blame her. Telling a woman a man chooses to rape her because of her appearance is false, but more importantly, harmful.

This article enables another response – guilt. Victims often feel they somehow might have provoked the rape or feel that they couldn't have done something to stop it.

This article implies that dressing like a nun will prevent rape.

Clothes do not communicate by themselves, and if they did, then why is that my rapist broke into my house and woke me from my sleep? Was it because my sweat pants I wore earlier that day "communicated" I want sex? I think not.

Kirksey is implying that rape is an impulsive, uncontrollable act of sexual gratification and that when a sexually frustrated man sees a woman wearing provocative clothing, he just can't control himself. This is only perpetuating a myth and the psychological and emotional effects sexual assault has on a woman.

Rape still threatens; protests must continue

Editor,

When I read Kirksey's editorial, I viewed it as extremely misguided and uneducated. Despite the fact that it appeared on the opinion page, I did not view it as the opinion of the Collegian as a whole, just one writer. Today, after reading Lola Shrimplin's editorial (Repetition of wrongness of rape dulls senses), I think my view was incorrect. Twice this week, the Collegian has published articles speaking out against rape victims and advocates against violence. I can only come to one assumption: the Kansas State Collegian endorses the view that the blame for rape lies on the shoulders of the victims, and no one wants to hear (or cares) about these acts of violence.

Shrimplin states that rape is horrible and wrong, but the victims should quit complaining about it already. She states that the public protesting and fighting against rape only serves to turn people off to the issue and cause the public to not care about rape and its victims. In short, she states enough is enough; move on.

Obviously, enough is not enough. If it truly were enough, rape would not be a threat. If everyone understood the issue, it would not be an issue. Sadly, there are many out there who do not understand or care that rape is wrong. Until the day that this type of violence comes to an end, we must continue to speak out, to educate, to protest, to rage. Yes, rape is a difficult subject to hear about, but one that must be discussed. To not fight against rape and other forms of sexual assault only serves to give validation to those who continue to perpetrate these crimes.

Examine attitudes that cloud interpretations

Editor,

Clothing choices never mean sexual availability. If a woman chooses to walk down the streets of Aggieville naked on a Friday night, she is not stating an invasion of her body is acceptable for any person drunk or sober.

In the summer, men frequently roam the streets shirtless. Does this indicate any level of sexual availability? Does this mean that any man or woman who sees this revealed flesh and desires it should have a right to invade it? No, it most certainly doesn't. Rape is not about sexual desire.

Although I completely disagree with the proclamation that clothing choices have anything to do with rape, I will concede that there is a problem with relying purely on vocal indications for a man to know if he is permitted to have sex with a woman. The vocalization of "yes" or "no" is often not a foolproof indicator to tell someone whether a sexual situation is being forced or not. We live in a society where women are constantly forced to say "yes" when they do not want to.

The real problem is that we structure our society in such a way as to constantly undermine a woman's sexual autonomy. We live in a world where a woman's body is sexualized in a way that a man's isn't. We live in a world where women are taught their sexual attractiveness is the most desirable and worthwhile thing they have to offer.

If anyone truly wants to put an end to rape, then they will go beyond proclaiming "yes means yes, and no means no." They will actively try to examine the society that we live in and how it fosters attitudes that make it difficult for "yes" and "no" to be expressed or interpreted accurately. Stop writing and publishing columns about who is to blame and accept that we are all participating in a system that fosters rape and must all work toward change.

Groups need to protest until change occurs

Editor,

We, Wildcats Against Rape, were saddened that Lola Shrimplin is urging folks to be quiet about an epidemic of violence.

The world is full of wonderful things and people, but injustice exists. The way change occurs and injustice ends is for concerned individuals and groups to make noise until shame, logic, love or enlightenment turns people's hearts, minds and laws toward fairness and justice.

Consider racial injustice, religious intolerance, female genital mutilation, sexual orientation bigotry, handicapped rights, child labor laws, legal wife beating, spousal ownership, world hunger, voting rights, slavery – all issues that require years of work, sacrifice, ridicule and blood, sweat and tears, before change begins to occur.

Margaret Mead said, "Never doubt that a small group of thoughtful committed citizens can change the world. Indeed it's the only thing that ever has."

We're unsure what Shrimplin means by "move on." Perhaps she is tired of looking at hungry children in Africa, of hearing about AIDS or bird flu or war. But people in groups dedicated to peace, justice or fairness fight on. Consider the huge number of children raped and abused every day. Yes, we all know the terrible toll on children right now, today, due to the lust, power and greed connected to child pornography. But just because we know there is a problem does not mean we stop raising the issue.

There is injustice in the courts and media regarding rape. The fight has just begun.

Clothing cannot consent; men must listen to answer

Editor,

I was shocked and appalled to see that a university as wonderful as K-State would allow their student newspaper to print Daniel Kirksey's column, "Women's clothes indicate intentions to men."

In his column, he tries to justify the unforgivable crime of sexually assaulting another human being, specifically women who are wearing a minimal amount of clothing.

He started his article by attacking the mantra of the nonviolence rally, Take Back The Night, which was "Whatever I wear, wherever I go, yes means yes, no means no." To me, this statement is crystal clear – if someone tells you "no," they mean "no." But according to Kirksey, "in our world, declarations mean nothing by themselves.

"The declaration that something is, or is not, has no bearing on the reality of the matter."

He seems to believe that regardless of whether a woman is consenting, if she is dressed too proactively, it's OK to rape her.

I'd like to present a hypothetical situation: if Daniel Kirksey's mother, future daughter, sister or girlfriend were wearing a short skirt, would he be OK with a man raping her, because regardless of the fact that she said "no," the man just couldn't control himself?

Or if a man thought Daniel was dressing too provocatively, I wonder if Daniel would be understanding when that man sexually assaulted him.

Personally, I don't think he'd be at peace with either situation, and if he isn't OK with it happening to himself or his loved ones, he shouldn't be OK with it happening to his peers.

I sincerely hope my fellow students, including the staff of the Collegian, recognize that rape will never be acceptable, especially on the basis of what clothes a person is wearing.

A woman's clothing cannot give legal consent, nor will it be permanently emotionally scarred by sexual assault like the victim. So let's listen to the woman inside the clothing, and if she says "no," she means "no." Sexual assault is a crime and will never be justifiable, no matter what Daniel Kirksey would like to believe.

Wearing revealing garments carries risks for women

Editor,

If only 99 percent of the students at K-State would have actually read Daniel Kirksey's article instead of just jumping on the bandwagon of morons who have totally taken his article out of context, they would know that he does not think that it is a girl's fault if she is raped, regardless of what she is wearing.

He was merely stating that clothes have signs attached to them, no matter what girls think.

Thus girls wearing revealing clothing would evoke images of sex to most guys, whereas a girl dressed conservatively would not.

He is not saying that girls should not dress this way, just that dressing that way has risks associated with it.

Of course he is against any sort of violence against women, but apparently this is not the conclusion the feminists on campus (who have started a smearing campaign against Daniel) have drawn about him.

Texans should pick Williams

CEDRIQUE FLEMMING

With the first pick of the 2006 NFL Draft, the Houston Texans select... Reggie Bush, running back from Southern Cal.

Get ready, because we are only two days away from hearing this inevitable announcement.

The Texans will take Bush with the first overall pick of the draft, and they will make a huge mistake in doing so.

My reason has nothing to do with the recent report that his family allegedly accepted extra benefits during Bush's junior season. I am basing my argument on the sole fact that there is one player who is a better long-term fit for that franchise.

Let me introduce you to North Carolina State's defensive end Mario Williams. The man is 6-foot-7, 290 pounds and growing. He's amazingly strong (35 reps of 225 on the bench press), runs a 4.6-second 40-yard dash and has a 40+ inch vertical jump.

Think about this: the Texans recently hired Gary Kubiak as their new head coach. Kubiak is the former offensive coordinator for the Denver Broncos, and, along with Bronco coach Mike Shanahan, has made a living out of turning no-name running backs into 1,000-yard rushers (see Reuben Droughns and Olandis Gary).

I say this because the Texans already have a multiple 1,000-yard rusher in Domanick Davis, and Kubiak will only make him better and more productive, which means they don't necessarily need a running back.

One thing they don't have is a pass-rushing defensive end.

That is saying something, considering these men are arguably two of the best defensive ends in the league.

ESPN analyst Michael Smith said in a column that nobody holds a flame to this guy.

Tennessee Titans coach Jeff Fisher told The Nashville Tennessean that he hopes Williams falls to its No. 3 pick because it would be a steal.

"I've seen solid players, impact players," Fisher told the Tennessean. "But nobody that has a potential to impact a defense like Williams."

Of the past 20 Super Bowl winners, only four had a leading rusher who was drafted by the winning team in the first round, and three of those times Emmitt Smith of the Dallas Cowboys was the man.

The only other time was last season when Pittsburgh Steelers' Willie Parker led the team in rushing.

Bush will give any team instant offense, and that will put a few points on the board and excite the crowd a little.

However, defense wins championships – plain and simple.

The Super Bowl champions of the past – the Steelers, New England Patriots, Baltimore Ravens, New York Giants, Tampa Bay Buccaneers, Dallas Cowboys, Miami Dolphins, Chicago Bears – all had incredible defenses.

So here go the Texans, making a mistake in taking a running back when they need help on defense more than anything.

If they want to score points and put a few butts in the seats, they will take Bush. But if they want someone who can be the cornerstone for a future winning franchise, they will take Williams.

The only thing I have to say is, don't come crying to me when Williams is leading the league in sacks and playing in the playoffs, while Bush is just another running back who couldn't live up to the hype.

K-State tries for comeback, but falls 7-6 to Missouri State

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Missouri State used two three-run innings, 14 hits and a play at home plate to take down K-State on Wednesday night at the Community America Ballpark in Kansas City, Kan.

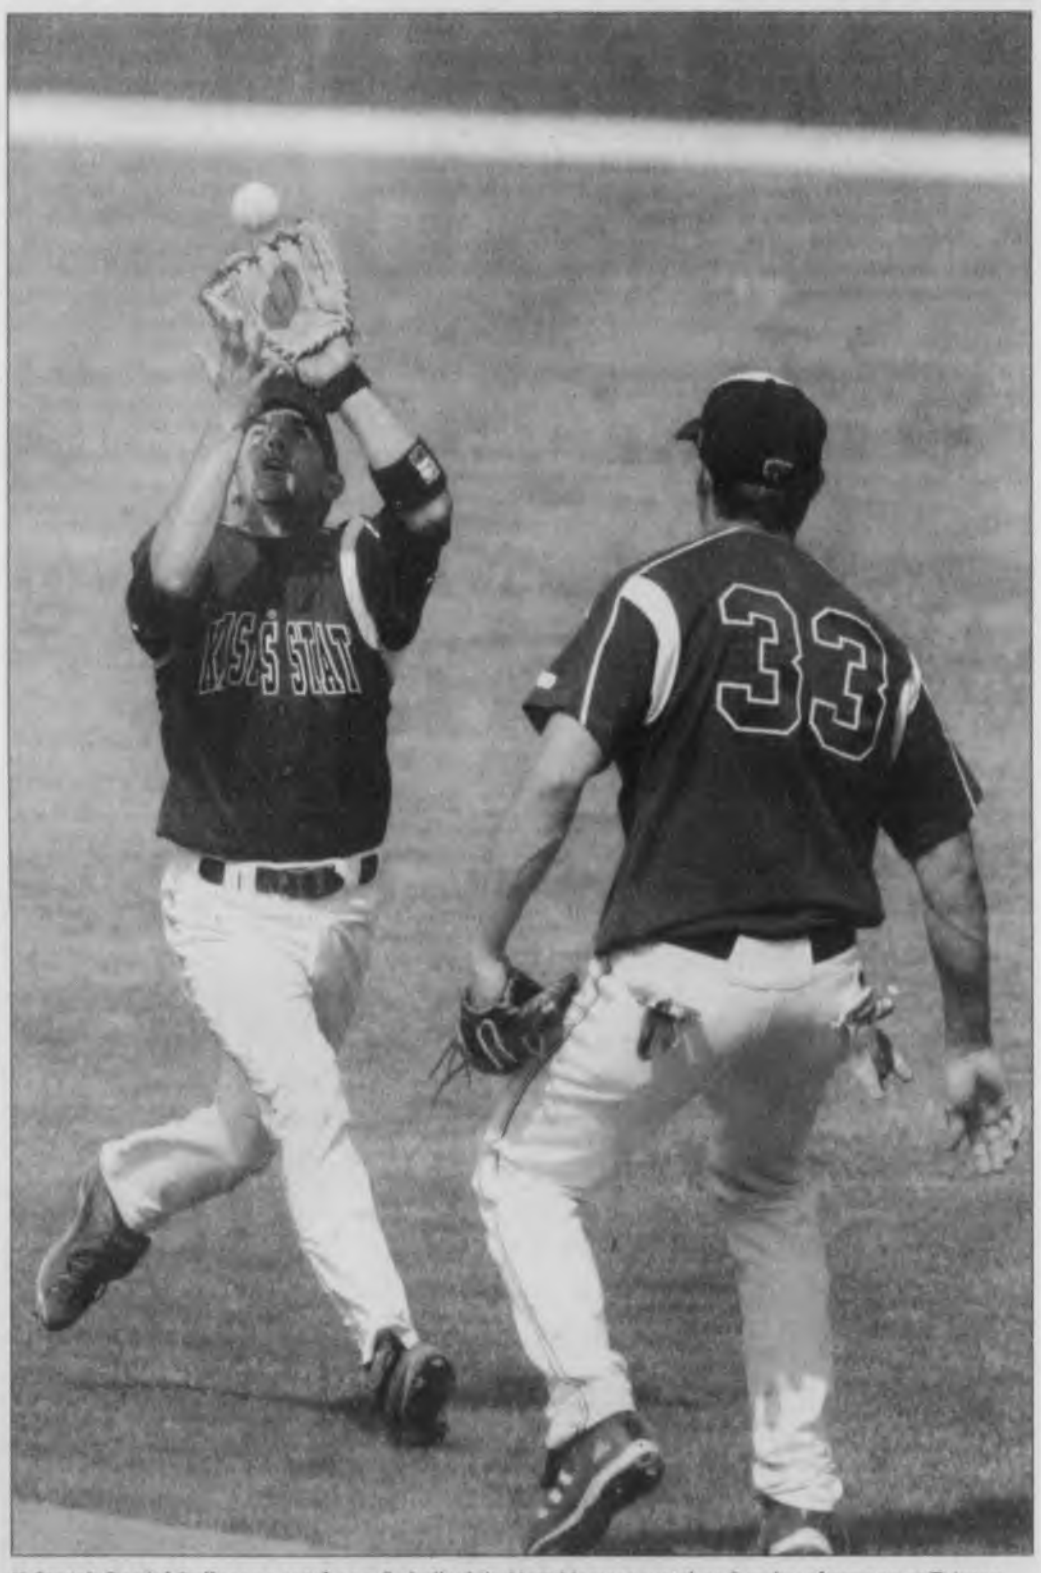
The Wildcats managed only nine hits and dropped to 24-13-1 on the season after losing 7-6 in the Best of the Midwest Classic. The Bears improved to 21-16.

Coach Brad Hill said the Wildcats had chances to win the game, but simply could not take advantage.

"I was pleased with the effort and competitiveness of our club," Hill said. "We squandered some opportunities early, but our kids played hard and gave themselves a chance in the end.

"We were not good offensively throughout the game, but we played solid defense and ran the bases aggressively."

The Wildcats had won seven of the last eight meetings with the Bears before dropping Wednesday's game.



K-State starting pitcher senior Chase Mitchell gave up four earned runs on 10 hits in 6 innings of work. He struck out six batters, but took his first loss of the season, falling 3-1.

Senior B.J. Kissel and freshman Justin Murray both pitched the seventh inning and gave up three Missouri State runs and four hits in the seventh. Senior Bryan Peterson entered the game in the eighth and retired all six batters he faced, striking out two.

Missouri State's starting pitcher Paul Marsala pitched 5.2 innings and gave up three earned runs off three hits while striking out five batters to earn the victory.

Jacob Bunten relieved Marsala in the sixth inning and gave up a homerun to freshman Byron Wiley. Bunten left the game with the Bears leading 7-5, and Chris Krawczyk came in to finish the eighth inning and close out the ninth.

Krawczyk gave up one run in the ninth to sophomore Cris Tapia, but recorded the save after senior Joe Roundy was thrown out at home plate to end the game. Roundy had advanced to third off of a single down the left-field line by freshman Drew Biery.

K-State's Daniel Dellasega catches a fly ball while Matt Marasco watches Sunday afternoon at Tointon Family Stadium. The Wildcats played Missouri State on Wednesday and lost 7-6.

The Wildcats entered the third inning down 3-0 and ended up scoring two runs.

The first run came when sophomore Brett Scott scored from third base on a wild pitch. Senior Brandon Farr scored when Tapia grounded out to second base to bring K-State within one run. The Bears stopped the bleeding at two runs, and both teams exchanged runs in the fourth inning.

Missouri State scored three runs in the seventh, and the Wildcats entered the eighth inning down 7-3.

Wiley hit a one-out, two-run homerun to pull K-State within two. Freshman Nate Tenbrink walked with two outs and advanced to third base off a single by sophomore Derek Bunker, who advanced to second on a wild pitch.

K-State had the go-ahead run at the plate, but Farr flew out to left field on a full-count pitch to leave the Wildcats down 7-5.

Wiley finished the game 3-for-3 with three runs batted in and two runs scored.

The only other Wildcat with more than one hit was senior Barrett Rice, who finished the game 2-for-4, with one run scored.

K-State plays next at 6:30 p.m. Friday at Tointon Family Stadium in game one of a three-game series with Oklahoma State.

Cats to face Oklahoma in Big 12 tourney

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's tennis team will open Big 12 Conference Tournament play today against a familiar opponent.

The 10th-seeded Wildcats (10-9, 6-5 Big 12) will take on the 7th-seeded Oklahoma Sooners (9-15, 3-8) today at 9 a.m. at the Baylor Tennis Center in Waco, Texas.

K-State seemingly has the advantage, having defeated Oklahoma on April 2, 6-1.

Oklahoma, however, recently showed it should not be taken lightly, beating Nebraska 4-3 on April 15 and proving there is no reason the Wildcats should look past the Sooners, coach Steve Bietau said.

"We'll certainly respect Oklahoma as a good team and a dangerous team," Bietau said. "Their win against Nebraska was one of their best of the year."

As for K-State, senior Jessica Simosa and sophomore Fernanda Da Valle have established themselves as the Wildcats' leaders heading post-season play.

Simosa closed out the season with wins against No. 17 Texas on April 16 and No. 41 Nebraska on Sunday, clinching the fourth point to win the team match against the Huskers.

"Jessica has been on top of her game lately," Bietau said. "She has had a good finish, especially last Sunday against Nebraska."

Simosa currently is tied for second place in all-time singles wins at K-State with 77.

Da Valle has won her last three matches, defeating opponents from No. 38 Texas A&M, Texas and Nebraska.

"She's really had an outstanding stretch here lately," Bietau said. "She has not only won a lot of matches, but last weekend against Nebraska, she beat the type of player that had been giving her problems."

The Wildcats are eager to see how they stack up against the rest of the conference, Bietau said.

"We're looking forward to playing and looking forward to seeing what we can do in this tournament," Bietau said.

The team also is excited to compete at the Baylor Tennis Center since it ranks as one of the best facilities in the country, Bietau said.

"Their facilities may be not only the best in the conference but the best in the nation as well," Bietau said. "They're not the biggest, but they are very tastefully laid out, and it's just good for college tennis."

The winner of today's match will move on to play Texas A&M in the quarterfinals at 8:30 a.m. Friday.

NFL | Williams suspended for 1 full season

Williams

Miami Dolphins halfback Ricky Williams lost his appeal with the NFL for violating the substance abuse policy and will be ineligible for the 2006 season.

The appeal was of his fourth violation of the NFL's substance abuse policy, a ruling that places his football career in jeopardy.

This will mark the second time in three years that Williams will sit out a full season. Williams missed the 2004 campaign when he abruptly retired days before the start of training camp that summer, following his third violation of the substance abuse policy.

NBA | Reports say Nash earns NBA MVP award

Nash

The Phoenix Suns' Steve Nash will win his second straight NBA Most Valuable Player award, according to reports on several area newspapers.

The announcement might not come for two weeks, according to the Arizona Republic. But the paper, and others, report the voting shows Nash edging LeBron James, Dirk Nowitzki, Chauncey Billups and Kobe Bryant for the MVP.

This season, Nash had career-highs in points (18.8 points per game), rebounds (4.2 per game), field goal percentage (51.2 percent) and free throw percentage (92.1 percent — best in the league). He also was the league leader in assists (10.5) and shot nearly 50 percent from three-point range.

Dave Winfield is a Hall of Famer again, this time for his pitching and slugging excellence back when he was the big man on campus.

The former Minnesota star, enshrined in Cooperstown after even greater success in the major leagues, was among 10 former players and coaches elected Wednesday as the College Baseball Hall of Fame's inaugural class.

Winfield was joined by fellow former big leaguers Will Clark (Mississippi State), Bob Horner (Arizona State), Brooks Kieschnick (Texas) and Robin Ventura (Oklahoma State) as the other players selected.

The late Rod Dedeaux headlined the list of coaches included in the hall's first class.

Also elected were LSU's Skip Bertman, Miami's Ron Fraser, Texas' Cliff Gustafson and Arizona State's Bobby Winkles.

NFL | Favre to play '06 season for Packers

Quarterback Brett Favre informed the Packers on Tuesday that he definitely will play the 2006 season in Green Bay.

The NFL's only three-time MVP shared his decision with general manager Ted Thompson and head coach Mike McCarthy by telephone Tuesday morning, the sources told ESPN's Chris Mortensen on Tuesday night. Wednesday, Thompson confirmed the news.

Favre said repeatedly after the 2005 season ended that he wasn't sure if he would come back to play a 16th season, saying he wasn't sure if he wanted to be part of what he saw as a possible long-term rebuilding effort.

Swimsuit hunting

Finding the perfect suit depends on style, fit, color flattering to the individual

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Finding the perfect swimsuit can be as hard as finding the perfect pair of jeans.

As summer quickly approaches, there are plenty of new styles, fits and colors for every body shape under the sun.

Most retail stores received their swimsuit shipment at the beginning of February.

"We got swimwear in pretty early this year. Usually most of our swimwear is gone by July, so shoppers should buy early," Shannon Alexander, assistant manager at Aeropostale, said.

There are many factors that go into choosing the right swimsuit. The first factor should be fit and comfort, said Danielle Wherrell, assistant manager of Deb Shops in Topeka's West Ridge Mall.

"First, buy a suit that is flattering to your body, and, second, one that is in style. No one looks good in a cute suit that doesn't fit," said Patricia Yeager, owner of Patricia's Undercover.

"The bikini is definitely still hot, lots of bright colors and army fatigue," Wherrell said.

The hot labels for swimwear this year are Kenneth Cole for the more sporty look, Sunset Separates for a customized fit and Guess for sexy and skimpy suits, Yeager said.

"Sunset Separates is a brand that goes from A cup to a triple D cup. This brand allows the customer to custom order a different-sized top and bottom," Yeager said.

Finally, the color of a swimsuit can make or break the fit and style. Neutral colors always will be in, no matter what the new pink is.

"Shades of brown is our top seller," Alexander said.

The hot colors are browns with pink, blues and oranges, Yeager said.

"Solid-colored suits show off your body and emphasize the style of the suit," Yeager said.

Yeager advises women to try new options when shopping for a swimsuit this season.

"You may try a suit that you normally wouldn't try and love it," she said. "The way a suit looks on the hanger may look totally different on the body."

Yeager said to try on at least 10 different suits and pick one that shows off the body and the personality through color, style and fit.

Shopping Tips

- Racerbacks and high necklines support and minimize.
- Underwires provide maximum lift and support, which can be good for both small and large breasts.
- To hide extra buttock area, wear sporty bottoms or flirty skirts.
- Strategic lacing draws eyes up and away from your bottom half.
- Sporty boy shorts provide more coverage than bikini briefs.
- Stay away from string bikinis when trying to cover the butt area.
- A well-cut one-piece will whittle your middle, making for a smoother, leaner line.
- A bold print camouflages bumps and bulges.
- Vertical stripes are the most slimming pattern of all.

Genders need universal communication methods

CARL BROWN

Another Collegian writer recently wrote about online dating, so I thought I might comment further on dating itself.

First let me say that "Men Are From Mars and Women Are From Venus" is a book that hits home with the biggest factor that makes or breaks any relationship – communication.

We forget we have to communicate in a way that can be understood by all.

We have different methods of communicating with our teachers, parents and siblings, but we seem to have forgotten how to communicate with the opposite gender when it comes to relationships.

I admit, I am just as at fault as everyone else. Women talk in a "code" that most men can't seem to break. Men, on the other hand, have no communication code at all.

We say what is on our mind (most of the time), and it never really comes out correctly.

An example of this code is when women ask if the outfit they are wearing makes them look fat. What they are saying is, "You had better say no and that it makes me look beautiful." Men try to think what the correct answer to the question is, but out comes "Yep, it sure does," and so continues the communication battle.

Another example that comes to mind is when men ask a special someone what she would like for her birthday. What they mean is, "I don't have the foggiest idea what you want, so please tell me." Her reply of "Nothing really. Whatever you get will be just fine because it is coming from you," actually means, "You had better get that dress I looked at six months ago, or you can sleep in the garage with the dog."

We need to find a way to better communicate with those close to us about the things we want or need.

Guys, don't be shy to tell her you don't know what to buy her, or just say, "Hey, dear, let's get a movie, turn the lights down low and cuddle up on the couch for a romantic evening at home." (Then make sure you rent a romance or some other movie that she will like.)

Ladies, you can do the same thing by going to rent an action or horror film, even though you might not like them. Tell him if he needs any ideas for what to get you for your birthday or anniversary, you have a few things in mind.

On both fronts we need to start telling that special someone when things bug us, make us feel uncomfortable or make us feel happy and romantic.

The receiving person needs to make sure to heed the other's request and not hold it against him or her in the future, as this will remove the much-needed trust factor and end the communication in the relationship – and possibly the relationship itself. Just remember: without communication, there is no relationship.

Turning video game into feature film a bust

"Silent Hill"

★★★☆☆

Movie review by Clinton Smith

Cashing in on the popularity of making video games into movies, "Silent Hill" is based on the popular video game series by Konami Entertainment.

It follows Rose da Silva, a mother taking her sick child to a deserted town called Silent Hill. Compelled by her daughter's recent night terrors and her husband's persistence in having their daughter institutionalized, Rose flees to Silent Hill.

Upon arrival in the deserted town Rose loses her daughter and is confronted with paranormal monstrosities while trying to find her daughter. The story leads the audience through bizarre sequences and bad dialogue that, in the end, leave the audience wanting a little more.

What is interesting is how the director visually showcased the town. Each monster and setting is presented in a way that is memorable and disturbing. Even the violence is crafted to portray a specific message in the film.

The key problem with the film is the confusion the average viewer will endure.

The entire film makes reference to the video game series that most viewers will not understand.

Unless the viewers are familiar with Silent Hill lingo and lore, they might leave the theater scratching their heads.

I feel the movie will leave most viewers confused.

Throw in some bad acting and dialogue, and it is a film that does not exactly succeed past a fan boy's dream.

As a member of the diversity team and a Moore Hall resident assistant, Shea Olsen, senior in apparel and textiles, participated in the event.

Olsen said she believed the participants could learn valuable lessons from this experience.

"I can see people getting a new reality on appreciating what they have," she said. "My biggest lesson will be not taking anything for granted, like getting ready for class or sleeping through the night."

Olsen said the evening was her second experience camping outdoors.

"I'm scared of the bugs and the cold and just of being outside," she said. "I'm not a camping kind of girl, so this is a new experience."

Despite lacking the comforts of home, Olsen said the situation could be a lot worse.

"There's 12 of us here, but in reality, a lot of people are alone," she said. "At least I've got my friends."

university that is taking a stand and is not just sweeping this issue under the rug," Darcy Hamilton, senior in mass communications, said.

Hamilton said another university she attended would not bring up issues of rape dealing with alcohol because of previous violations.

"They didn't want to call more attention to the school," Hamilton said.

The goal of the 412 rally was to get students and faculty to fight against rape, Torry Dickinson, associate professor of women's studies, said.

"We are not just dealing with 412 rapes a year; we are dealing with 412 rapists on the loose," Dickinson said.

Shaniell Johnson, sophomore in family studies and human services, said the issue of rape affects everyone, including K-State students.

"It's an issue that's hidden and not brought out in the open, but it really affects people here at K-State's lives, whether people want to admit it or not," Johnson said.

PARKING | Council approves increase in parking permit costs

One-year student parking permit

Cost	Requested average increase (total of 3 years)	Final
$75	$70	$145

Source: The Council on Parking Operations

The council said drivers would be required to properly display their permit within 24 hours.

Drivers would also have to pay a one-day fee of $2 instead of paying the $50 fee for no valid permit.

The council also approved the proposed increases for one-year student parking permits and violations for no valid parking permits, blocking drive and traffic flow.

The proposed rate increases will take effect July 1, if they are accepted by upper university administration.

The Finance Committee has worked on the proposed increases since November, Muir said.

Leitnaker said all students and faculty members are encouraged to attend the forum.

"(They should) ask any questions they may have with the new parking regulations or rates and the parking garage," Leitnaker said.

Student Body President Lucas Maddy also said he encourages students and faculty to attend.

"(They should attend) just so they have a clear understanding of how this will come to play," Maddy said.

the disease to one another," he said.

Goodin said they have learned the rodents like to live in areas that have been disturbed by humans, especially agricultural areas or disturbed forested areas.

"Our hypothesis is that this creates a habitat for the particular rodent that is the host of the virus," he said. "I am trying to use satellite data to understand the habitat preferences of this rodent and hopefully predict where they might be so we can have a better understanding of how this disease process works."

Goodin said this information will help predict outbreaks.

"We hope to be able to say that at a particular time and in a particular place there is a greater probability of people encountering these rodents," he said.

Koch said he was working on the project for his thesis for his doctorate but said he also had personal reasons for doing research in Paraguay.

"I lived (in Paraguay) for a couple of years in the early '90s, and I was especially interested in working in Paraguay," he said. "The Hantavirus is a side issue of that but is something I am interested in."

Koch said while he was living in Paraguay he did not hear much about the virus because it was when the virus was being discovered. Koch compared knowledge of Hantavirus in Paraguay to the knowledge people have of it in the United States.

"I think this is something they know about but that they are not certain if it is something that will affect them or not," he said.

Goodin and Hutchinson said they were unsure of how long the project would last.

"We just want to be able to provide them with advanced warning that you may want to avoid certain areas, and that if you do come down with what you think is just a cold, you should seek medical attention, because it may be Hantavirus," Hutchinson said.

K-State athletics budget totals $34.2 million for FY06

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ask administrators of the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics how they think the two new coaches will affect the department's future, and it's a matter of seconds until they start grinning.

[illegible] Football coach Ron Prince has caused plenty of excitement, drawing a crowd to the 2006 Spring Game three times the size of last year's audience.

"For 17 years we've been blessed with a great coach in Bill Snyder," Athletic Director Tim Weiser said, "and Bill's approach was not 180 degrees from what Ron's approach is, but it was different, and I think the approach that Ron is taking resonates more with a younger audience."

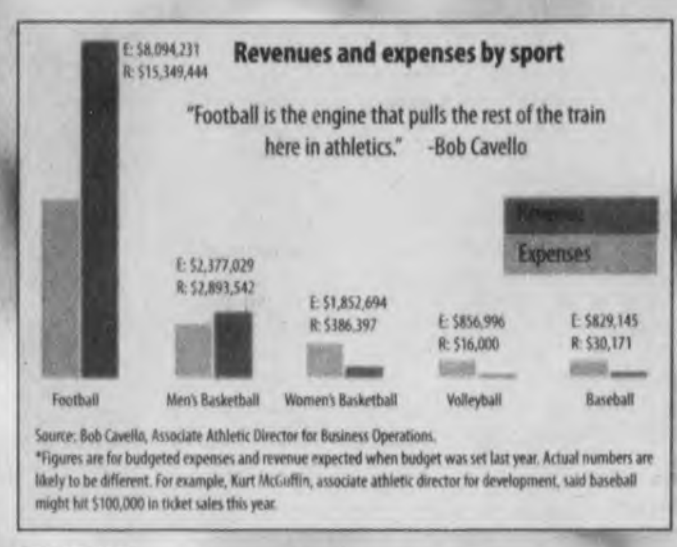
Robin Fosha, director of ticket operations, said [illegible]400 fans have put down $100 deposits on season tickets based only on the announcement of Coach Bob Higgins coming to K-State.

"We've never actually taken a deposit prior to actually announcing our schedule and prices since I've been here," Fosha said.

But it's harder for anyone to say just how much of a difference the new blood will make for the athletic department's success in coming seasons.

"If I knew, I'd feel a lot better about a lot of things, but overall it's a good feeling," said Bob Cavello, associate athletic director for business operations. "Until numbers start rolling in, I'm not going to be able to quantify that good feeling."

That good feeling, if correct, could mean another expansion for the athletic department, like the one that tripled its budget in the past decade.



The annual budget's value depends on who you ask. Filings by the department list the budget at just $40 million, but it's operating budget for fiscal year 2006, which ends June 30, is really $6 million less, Cavello said.

The difference, he said, comes from government filings requiring them to list donations made that year but sent to the KSU Foundation for use in later years.

He said the department's budget in 1996 was $11.6 million.

Cavello said the department was incorporated in the 1930s as the Intercollegiate Athletic Council of Kansas State University, Inc. He said it's classified as a 501(c)3 not-for-profit organization, which means donors may write off donations from their taxes.

The classification comes from a part of the tax code that also exempts, among other things, organizations that work for the prevention of animal cruelty.

REVENUE

The department will get $1.5 million from the state government in FY 2006. The distribution of that money is listed within K-State's annual budget.

Most of that money, almost $1.2 million, pays for salaries of employees who work in academic services for athletes or the management and maintenance of the facilities the department uses, which are owned by the state of Kansas. The remaining $342,000 goes toward the department's regular operating expenses.

The remainder of the budget, about $32 million, is generated by the department itself. Ticket sales, Cavello said, should bring in $11.5 million this year and are the largest piece of the department's pie.

The second largest part of the department's revenue comes from the Big 12 Conference and NCAA, which is planned to contribute $7.1 million in FY 2006. The department paid for its membership to the conference because the conference gets the rights to all footage from K-State's sporting events, which it sells to networks, who in turn sell advertisements to run with the games.

The advantage of conference membership, Cavello said, comes from the revenue sharing between all the members. He said each of the 12 schools gets $1.6 million annually for its football team playing, plus money for televised games.

Each time a K-State football game is televised on ABC, the department gets about an additional $240,000, Cavello said. FOX or TBS bring in less; about $168,000.

Men's basketball commands less money than football, he said, with the base annual fee at $380,000. There's a possibility of up to $110,000 per game, but only from the top stations.

There is a great misconception regarding payouts for bowl games or championships, Cavello said, because the prizes also are split among the conference. He said the Fiesta Bowl paid out between $12 million and $14 million when K-State went there in 1997, but only got about $2 million of it for expenses plus its share of the leftover funds.

Forum addresses parking lot issues

By Dayne Logan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four members from K-State's parking council fielded questions Thursday on a variety of topics regarding the university's planned parking garage, ranging from how much the garage would cost to what alternatives the committee had considered when deciding how to solve the university's parking problem.

The proposed garage will create 1,000 additional stalls in front of the Student Union, but will cost an estimated $18.5 million.

Much of the funding for the garage will come from increases in parking fees and fines, which will begin next fall and last for three years, the council explained. Among the more substantial increases is the $70 increase to student parking permits and the $50, $75 and $90 increases to faculty and staff permits, depending on employee income level. These high increases have some concerned.

Ryland Ortiz, a member of the Students for Environmental Action group at K-State, presented the committee with a proposal to scrap the parking garage idea in favor of implementing a more broad-scale shuttle bus system instead.

"A shuttle system would cost roughly three percent of the proposed amount for the parking garage," Ortiz said.

Additionally, the buses could run on alternative fuels and potentially create a research opportunity for K-State students and faculty, Ortiz said.

Another concern about the garage was whether it would obstruct the Union and make the campus seem too urban.

"There will be significant distance between the garage and the Union," said Jason Heaser, senior in political science and chairman of the parking council.

"It is not designed to look like a parking garage," said Bill Muir, member of the parking council.

Muir also said the garage was approved by the Union council, and that a garage would actually benefit the Union in that it would create more foot traffic through the Union and potentially more business for Union stores and dining areas.

The project is scheduled to begin in May of 2007 and could take up to 18 months to be completed.

Sigma Chi sanctioned for violations

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On Nov. 22, 2005, the Interfraternity Judical Board found Sigma Chi fraternity responsible for violating multiple sections of the substance abuse and anti-hazing policies.

According to a letter submitted anonymously to the Collegian detailing the summary of the hearing panel's decision, the infractions include the purchase of alcoholic beverages by a member on behalf of the chapter, kegs at social events not controlled by a licensed caterer, unregistered social events, door monitors failing to check identification and secure wristbands on all persons who are 21 years or older, and failing to keep alcohol in a centralized location to be distributed by a designated individual.

All of these policies, except the keg violation, were violated between summer 2004 and fall 2005 at the Sigma Chi house, said Andy Kowal, president of Interfratenity Council.

In addition to the alcohol violations, one member had concerns about hazing and brought it to the attention of IFC, Kowal said.

The anti-hazing violations committed during fall 2004 included psychological abuse, improper requirements, obligations or responsibilities and human rights and respect violations. There also were numerous threats of hazing new members and reprisal taken against those noncompliant, Kowal said in a findings letter.

"The root of hazing came from improper requirements and some psychological abuse and threats," Kowal said. "Our definition of human rights is pretty encompassing. It includes anything that humiliates or injures someone on a personal or physical level, any kind of harassment – racial, sexual orientation."

"The Sigma Chi fraternity has a very strict anti-hazing policy, and members are held accountable for their actions," said Mark Anderson, corporation president of the National Sigma Chi Chapter.

Senate approves allocation for childcare center

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A bill to allocate $13,000 to the KSU Child Care Development Center for Fiscal Year 2006 passed Student Senate at its meeting Thursday night with a vote of 49-0-0.

The $13,000 allocation will aid toward a program statement, budget and architectural renderings for the center, which is in need of reconstruction, according to Senate legislation.

University administration and the center itself each have pledged $13,000 toward the statement, budget and renderings, according to the legislation.

There are several architecture firms that the center has in mind for its preliminary concept drawing, said Rilie Tilley, president of the Board of Directors of KSU Child Development Center.

The program statement, budget and architectural renderings also are required to obtain brick and mortar grants for the new facility, Tilley said.

During the meeting's first open period, a presentation on the situation at the KSU Child Care Development Center was given by Tilley and Regina Jackson, infant/toddler program coordinator at the center.

Jackson said the center currently has a wait-list of 61 children.

"Many families call in daily needing slots for their children, and we are unable to fill those slots because we are at capacity and the rooms are full," Jackson said. "The lack of children to be able to come to center ultimately affects the students because 75 percent of clients are students."

Jackson also said KSU Child Care Development Center is one of only two centers in Manhattan that provide infant care.

Funeral protests restricted
TOPEKA. — The Rev. Fred Phelps and his followers couldn't protest closer than 500 feet to any funeral of a U.S. soldier killed in combat and couldn't use noise to disrupt the service under a tentative compromise bill worked out by House and Senate negotiators. The measure doesn't single out Phelps and his followers, but legislators say the bill was prompted by their protests at the funerals of U.S. troops killed in combat.

Coding in Da Vinci ruling
LONDON — Parts of London's legal community ground to a virtual halt Thursday with lawyers turning into aspiring code-breakers attempting to decipher a hidden message inserted into "The Da Vinci Code" trial judgment. Judge Peter Smith inserted a secret code of his own into the April 7 judgment that cleared "The Da Vinci Code" author Dan Brown in his copyright infringement case.

Congress blasts response
WASHINGTON, D.C. — A Senate inquiry into the government's Hurricane Katrina failures ripped the Bush administration anew Thursday and urged the scrapping of the nation's disaster response agency. But with a new hurricane season just weeks away, senators conceded that few if any of their proposals could become reality in time.

Time for church?

A special Gallup Poll analysis of more than 68,000 interviews conducted over the past two years shows that reported church attendance is highest in the Southern states, in Utah, and in certain Midwestern states, while church attendance is lowest in the New England states, Nevada, and other Western states.

UPC, UGB to hold year-end festivals

By Hannah Crippen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Spring Fest and Jazz Fest are two events that the Union Program Council will sponsor before the end of this year.

The Union Governing Board and Union Program Council met 4 p.m. Thursday to discuss the events that will conclude the year.

Spring Fest will take place at 5 p.m. this evening at Bosco Student Plaza.

The event will feature four bands and two comedians. The first band will open the event.

The night will end with a showing of "Glory Road" outside unless it rains.

There will be funnel cakes and several giveaways, said Beth Bailey, assistant director of the K-State Student Union.

There are also end-of-the-year Union "Thank You" events that will take place from May 2-6.

Specials will be available throughout the Union during the week, including an ice-cream giveaway from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. Wednesday, May 3.

"Last year, we gave away 42 gallons," said Craig Johnson, assistant director of the Union.

"It was really well-received," he said.

A band will perform in the recreation center May 5, and a schedule of the events will be available Monday.

The Jazz Festival will be from 5 to 11 p.m. July 8 at City Park.

This event is free and will feature a mix of local and national bands.

"We have the lineup secured," said Nacole Boan, senior in political science and president of the Union Program Council.

"It's a great mix of bands. There will be Latin and contemporary jazz and more," Boan said. "We are just winding up the year."

Additional issues addressed were restroom renovations in the Union, the possible addition of a Starbucks and the new student IDs.

Only half of the new K-State student IDs have been picked up, Johnson said.

"We highly recommend that students do so because the old ones will be deactivated on May 22," Johnson said.

Speaker addresses integration

By Adam Monroe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN
Charles Ogletree Jr. delivers his speech, "Achieving Racial Progress with All Deliberate Speed," to attendees of the American Ethnic Studies Lecture Series on Thursday morning in Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union.

Education and continued integration are critical for society to advance and exist in peace, Charles J. Ogletree Jr.'s said in a speech Thursday night.

Ogletree began his speech, "Achieving Racial Progress with All Deliberate Speed," by addressing the age difference between himself and the audience.

"For most of the people in the audience, microwaves have always popped popcorn, TV's have always come in color, and Michael Jackson has always been white," Ogletree said.

He then delved into the issues of race and ethnic studies by giving a brief history.

"I am where I am today because I am standing on the shoulders of the great people before me," Ogletree said, "They opened the doors."

Ogletree said that W. E. B. Dubois was one of the first to promote integration as a goal, and the key to breaking down the walls of segregation is education.

"What black people need is better education – after that race disappears," Ogletree said.

The struggle on civil rights issues has had several major events that brought up legal, social and cultural issues, Ogletree said.

In the past schools were segregated under the philosophy of "separate but equal."

Ogletree said, in the 1930s, 82,000 black teachers taught more than 2 million students, and often all grades were taught in one-room schools.

"Integration is the foundation of good citizenship," he said. "If we are doing separate but equal we are not achieving our goal of one nation under God," Ogletree said.

Ogletree said the process of integration, however, actually hurt the black population in the early stages more than helped.

"The transition caused 30,000 black teachers to lose their jobs," he said.

Ogletree then focused his speech on the current issues of racial struggles and how the problems have developed.

"The same areas that were segregated legally in the past are now still segregated by choice," he said.

Ogletree said that those young minds located in struggling areas need to be able to have all the strength possible achieve their dreams.

"I am working through an organization with the Boston Red Sox, and we are giving $5,000 scholarships to fifth graders for college," he said. "Imagine the bragging rights they will have. To them it is then not a question of if they can go to college but when.

"The idea is to bring the bottom up, and that's not a black idea or a white idea but an American idea."

Ogletree received his undergraduate degree at Stanford, and then went to Harvard Law School, where passed his first bar exam.

He is now the executive director at the Charles Hamilton Houston Institute for Race and Justice.

"We had the vision of him coming for years," said Juanita McGowan, director of American Ethnic Studies and assistant dean for diversity.

"It was an excellent opportunity to reassess history from a different perspective," McGowan said.

TO THE POINT

Focus on new childcare center admirable

A $13,000 allocation to the KSU Child Development Center was approved by Student Senate Thursday night with a vote of 49-0-0.

The allocation will go toward obtaining a program statement, budget and architectural renderings to be used for fundraising to build a new childcare facility.

University administration and the KSU Child Development Center have already pledged $13,000 each toward the $39,000 proposal for the statement, budget and renderings.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

The structure of the KSU Child Development Center was declared unacceptable after a feasibility study was completed in February.

The construction of a new childcare facility is crucial to K-State since 75 percent of the facility's clients are K-State students.

The Special Committee to Study Long-term Tuition Strategies also supported a new KSU Child Development Center in a proposal released last month.

The proposal recommended to fund no more than 75 percent of debt financing for the estimated $6-8 million capital construction of the new center through tuition revenue, according to its proposal.

It is clear that university officials are taking all of the steps necessary to move forward with the construction of a new childcare center.

K-State administration and students should continue to take further steps in support of the construction of a new KSU Child Development Center.

Love for country

For all its problems, U.S. still best place to live

Illustrations by Christina Forsberg | COLLEGIAN

I like my country, and it has nothing to do with who is running it.

MEGAN MOLITOR

My political views aside, the United States is, I believe, everything it's cracked up to be.

In light of many recent events and decisions made by this country's leaders, many people have changed their view of the land of the free.

I admit, even the most starred-and-striped of us have been forced to question perhaps not our loyalty to this country but our pride in admitting it.

It isn't just our fellow citizens who have fallen down this path.

In this period in United States history, it's an obvious fact that many foreigners have less than stellar opinions of our country.

My argument with this is I believe these thoughts are unfounded. Their disgust, as well as many U.S. citizens', is with a handful of individuals making choices.

Hate them all you want, but you cannot deny there is a place better on this earth to live than the United States – something I can argue for for a plethora of reasons.

Geographically, there is not a more beautiful or diverse country in existence.

Touring America could be a sightseer's dream.

We have it all.

All of these attractions are so easily accessible, it's ridiculous.

America is known as a melting pot of many different cultures, and I believe that in today's world of conflict and misunderstanding, this is something to be valued greatly.

We have our problems – no country is perfect – but the fact that we have fought actively for years to end stereotypes and fuse ideals is amazing to me.

Not every attempt is successful, but our efforts are never completed half-heartedly.

My favorite aspect of this great country is its rich history and rapid success.

Despite how relatively young it is, it quickly climbed to the top and became the most powerful country in the world – a feat many countries have been attempting for thousands of years.

The things we learned in high school history still ring true for me.

We built this country on God, family, pride and hard work – values I hold true for myself.

The fact that we have survived all the turmoil and strife of both the past and present is proof that there is no greater place to live than the United States.

Americans go to bed at night with no fears of their world outside not being there when they wake, something not everyone in the world can say.

We don't back down from things in which we believe, no matter how many people tell us we are wrong.

I can only hope this is a value I can instill in my own children and all generations after.

We have problems, big ones even.

I truly believe, however, that these problems are a result of individuals trying to protect that for which we have worked so hard and keep this country the paradise of freedom and beauty it has been for so many, for so long.

Meaning, not truth, should guide principles

History – the collection of events for all people – is a strange field of study to me.

CODY HOLUB

It's like a historian only can find half of the pieces to a puzzle, and then is required to assemble the entire picture.

I don't see how any two historians could ever come up with the same picture.

Memory – the collection of events for a single person – seems like a related concept.

I know there have been countless times I have done something cool in the past, and then my brother actually takes credit for it. We both have different "memories" of being the cool one.

The practical applications of memory and history are the same: use past events as a model for future behavior.

They should be used as guidelines and not be relied upon as infallible laws.

After all, it's not like we have a time machine at our disposal to establish the veracity of our individual and collective past.

We usually remember and record things that are important to our lives in some way.

It is weird how two people can remember and interpret things differently for the same event.

Instead of trying to figure out what actually happened, however, maybe we should instead focus on what these memories and histories are trying to tell us.

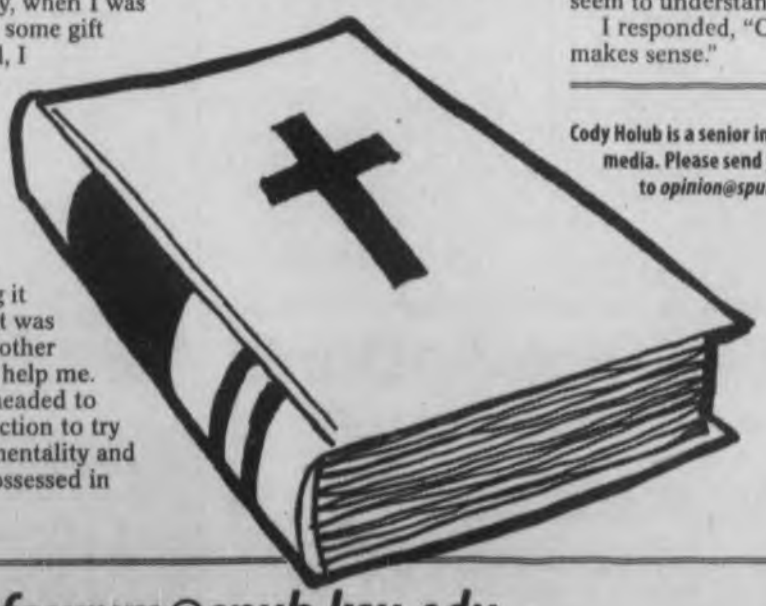
Recently, when I was going to redeem some gift cards at the mall, I visited Waldenbooks; something I like to do is wander through bookstores.

I walked by the self-help section, thinking it was ironic that it was full of books by other people trying to help me.

After that, I headed to the children's section to try and regain the mentality and imagination I possessed in childhood.

Then I noticed something really weird. The Holy Bible was placed among the children's books.

And, just then, an employee came and asked me if I needed any assistance.



I told him I was okay, but I alerted him to the fact that a customer probably misplaced the Bible.

He informed me that he actually had placed it there, and I asked him why. He said, "I put it there because for some reason, adults focus on what is real, instead of on what is right. "'The Boy Who Cried Wolf' teaches us that lying damages credibility. But no one argues that maybe it was a girl who cried wolf."

"'The Tortoise and the Hare' shows us the negatives of cockiness and the value of patience. Yet no one squabbles about whether it really happened or not."

"I just thought I would place it in the children's section because this is a concept they seem to understand."

I responded, "Oh, that makes sense."

Walk aids cystic fibrosis

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Beth Marine's twin sons were 6 months old, they were diagnosed with cystic fibrosis.

Now 8 years old, Tucker and Tyler are living with cystic fibrosis while attending elementary school in Kansas City, Kan.

"They just go on with their lives on a daily basis," said Marine, Kansas City, Kan. resident. "Having it or not having does not change their lives any."

After the twins were diagnosed, Marine's mother, Telva Swenson, organized the first Manhattan Great Strides walk, a fundraising walk for the Cystic Fibrosis Foundation.

The eighth annual walk will take place on Saturday at Manhattan City Park.

"There are so many children, close to 30,000 with cystic fibrosis, and it seems like it is increasing," said Swenson, retired Manhattan resident and chair of the Manhattan Great Strides Walk. "The money that is raised goes towards research to help these children."

Swenson said there is no cost for the walk, but participants are encouraged to make donations. Swenson said she is optimistic about how the research will improve the lives of cystic fibrosis patients.

"The average age for children to live without serious complications used to be three to five years old," she said. "Now that age is 36 before they have these problems. This is just quite an improvement."

Amy Nyberg, special event coordinator for the Cystic Fibrosis Foundation, said the organization raised $8,943 last year at the Manhattan Great Strides Walk. She said the goal for this year is $10,000.

She said participants form teams and start raising money a year before the walk.

"The types of fundraising depends on what the team wants to do," she said. "We have had people sell plush animals at school or do a letter-writing campaign."

Nyberg said the Great Strides Walk is the culmination of the fundraising efforts of the participants.

"The walk is really a celebration of everyone's hard work," she said.

Participants of all ages are encouraged to participate, she said.

"This is a great way to get involved and help people in your community, because there are people in Manhattan living with this," she said.

Marine said her fundraising plan consists of sending out letters to everyone she knows, asking for donations. She then collects donations from everyone at her office, and her employer matches what is collected.

"There is no cure for cystic fibrosis," she said. "So the fundraising is very worthwhile."

MAC to show 'Charlie Brown'

By Jessi Hernandez
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Performers at the Manhattan Arts Center will get to show off their inner child in the musical "You're a Good Man, Charlie Brown," which premieres at 8 tonight at the center.

"It's a show where you can sit back and relax, and enjoy being a kid again," said Nick Robinson, who plays Charlie Brown. "(The cast has) been able to just have fun for a few hours every night."

Robinson, junior in theater, said he is excited to have an audience be there to enjoy a fun environment and a great show.

He said he hopes K-State students will attend the show since all but one of the characters are played by students.

"Come be a kid again," he said. "Having everyone here outside of the K-State realm would be a great support."

The show will run tonight through Sunday, and next week from May 4 to 7, said Shauna Tominey, program and marketing director for the center.

While ticket prices are slightly discounted for students, Tominey said there are discounts one can take advantage of.

"The walk-in price for students is $5 on Thursdays or Sundays," she said. "And, if you reserve your tickets in a group of eight or more, you'll receive $1 each ticket for a Friday or Saturday show, or $2 off for Thursday or Sunday."

Tominey said she is excited about tonight's performance, not only as an employee at the center, but as a performer.

"I'm actually doing the music for the show – I'm playing the piano," she said. "I think it's going to be great. It's a family oriented play, but I think audience members of all ages will enjoy it. We've got a lot of very talented cast members."

The basic plot of the play is a day in the life of Charlie Brown, made up of moments featured in the Peanuts comic strip, according to an arts center press release.

Elizabeth Sykes, senior in music education, plays Charlie Brown's younger sister, Sally. She said one of her favorite aspects of the play was how her director, Tyler Woods, added a few extra humorous moments.

"There's a little addition that we made to the script – I guess in the older comic strips, Sally calls Linus her 'sweet Babboo,' so Tyler added in a bit with that," she said.

Students plant 3 trees for Arbor Day

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Three trees found a new home at Frank Bergman Elementary School Thursday.

Bergman Junior Girl Scout Troop 480 planted two Pacific Sunset Hybrid Maple Trees and one other tree on the northwest section of the playground for the City Arbor Day and Earth Week celebration.

The last Arbor Day celebration at Frank Bergman was nine years ago, Martin said. Although the official Arbor Day is today, Martin said the ceremony was Thursday since today is Frank Bergman's carnival.

City Forester J. David Mattox was the guest speaker at the ceremony and gave a presentation of the history of Arbor Day to the students.

"Arbor Day is where we celebrate what we are going to do for the future," Mattox said.

Martin said there was a campaign last fall to plant trees in the Manhattan for its 150th anniversary. Members of Girl Scout Troop 480 contacted city officials and said they were interested in planting some trees at Frank Bergman. Martin said Mattox decided to combine the 150th anniversary and Frank Bergman plantings into one celebration.

Anna Taylor, fourth grader and Girl Scout, said planting trees helps the environment and makes the air clean.

"The more trees, the better," said Taylor, who has been a Girl Scout for two years.

Girl Scout Amber Stotts said it was her first time planting trees with the troop. Stotts, who is in fifth grade, said she also has a tree to plant at her home.

"It is important to plant trees because it gives out oxygen, which we need to breathe and we give back with carbon dioxide to the trees," she said.

Mattox also presented a Tree City USA banner to the school, which will hang with the American flag outside.

After the ceremony, kindergartners through sixth graders were responsible for cleaning up a portion of the schoolyard in observation of Earth Week.

Martin said the celebration at Frank Bergman was a success.

"The children learned about civic responsibility and worked about the power of teamwork," she said.

Columnist breaks down Chiefs' draft

MARK POTTER

It's that time of year again, when National Football League coaches and front office executives gather to discuss the future of their respective teams.

It's time for the 2006 NFL draft.

For the Kansas City Chiefs, this weekend's draft will have a different feel to it than previous years, now that coach Herm Edwards is running the show and Bill Kuharich has taken over as vice president of player personnel.

Excluding those with the last name "Johnson," Kansas City's top selections have had about as much success as former quarterback Ryan Leaf, the No. 2 overall pick in 1998.

Case in point: Since 2000, the Chiefs' top selections have included wide receiver Sylvester Morris (2000), defensive tackle Eric Downing (2001), defensive tackle Ryan Sims (2002) and defensive tackle Junior Siavii (2004).

This year, Kansas City has three total selections on Saturday, the draft's first day.

■ Round 1, No. 20 overall

The last time Kansas City sat at No. 20 was 1992, when Edwards was a scout for the Chiefs. Edwards reportedly helped convince the Chiefs to select cornerback Dale Carter, who would eventually play in four Pro Bowls.

Will the Chiefs and Edwards – a former defensive back himself – opt for a cornerback this time around?

It wouldn't surprise me.

With the departure of corners Eric Warfield and Dexter McCleon, the Chiefs need someone to step in and start alongside Patrick Surtain.

And there should be plenty of solid corners to choose from when pick No. 20 rolls around.

John Clayton said in a column on ESPN.com that up to eight cornerbacks could be drafted in the first round.

"There are so many corners, teams have the luxury of debating whether to get a tall or short one," Clayton said.

Some corners who might be available for the Chiefs include Clemson's Tye Hill, Virginia Tech's Jimmy Williams, South Carolina's Jonathan Joseph, Florida State's Antonio Cromartie and Fresno State's Richard Marshall.

If the Chiefs decide to go a different direction, expect them to select a defensive end.

■ Round 2, No. 54 overall

Assuming Kansas City picks a corner in the first round, the Chiefs will likely take a defensive end or wide receiver in round two.

If Boston College's Kiwanuka is still available, the Chiefs will take him with little hesitation. Another talented defensive end who might fall to No. 54 is Darryl Tapp from Virginia Tech.

However, some experts think the Chiefs will use this pick to add depth to their receiving corps. If so, Kansas City could decide between Oregon's Demetrius Williams, Arizona State's Derek Hagan and Notre Dame's Maurice Stovall.

■ Round 3, No. 85 overall

The Chiefs might draft an offensive lineman to eventually take the place of aging Willie Roaf or Will Shields.

Texas' Jonathan Scott and Boston College's Jeremy Trueblood are solid offensive tackles projected for the third round.

Available wide receivers could include Oregon's Demetrius Williams, Auburn's Devin Aromashodu, or The Kansas City Star columnist Jason Whitlock's personal favorite, Greg Jennings of Western Michigan.

Or, if Kansas City selects a wide receiver in round two, the Chiefs might opt for defensive end Ray Edwards of Purdue.

Rowers travel to KC for Big 12 Invite

By Ben Fallin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State rowing team is attempting to continue its hot streak as the team prepares to compete in the Big 12 Conference Rowing Invitational on Sunday in Kansas City, Kan., at Wyandotte County Lake.

This will be the first time the Big 12 Rowing Invitational, consisting of K-State, Kansas and Texas, is not taking place in Manhattan, Lawrence, or Austin, Texas.

The Wildcats already have faced both squads earlier on in the season. Junior Kaci Williams said she thinks defeating KU in the Kansas Cup on April 8 will give K-State an advantage at the Invitational.

"Obviously we'll want to keep our title," Williams said. "Beating KU earlier this year will make it more competitive. KU is going to come out gunning for us after we won the (Kansas) Cup two years straight now."

Sophomore Veronica Noonan believes K-State can beat anybody on Sunday, with the way the team has prepared this week, she said.

"I feel like our preparation has been really well," Noonan said. "We've done really well in our last couple of races. We feel as a team that we can beat our rivals. Even though Texas is tough to beat, I feel that we have the capabilities."

The Wildcats did not compete in a head-to-head race against Texas at the Longhorn Invitational on March 17-19. The three schools have faced one another in the Southern IRA's, San Diego Classic and the Longhorn Invitational.

Head coach Patrick Sweeney said he is pleased with the way his team is progressing at this point in the season.

"We have, once again, made small changes in the lineups, as this is the final chance to see combinations and give our athletes a chance to show themselves under race conditions before we head to NCAA Regionals," Sweeney said in a press release.

K-State will begin competition at 11 a.m. on Sunday and will compete in six events.

Coach took over losing program 9 years ago, turned it into a winner

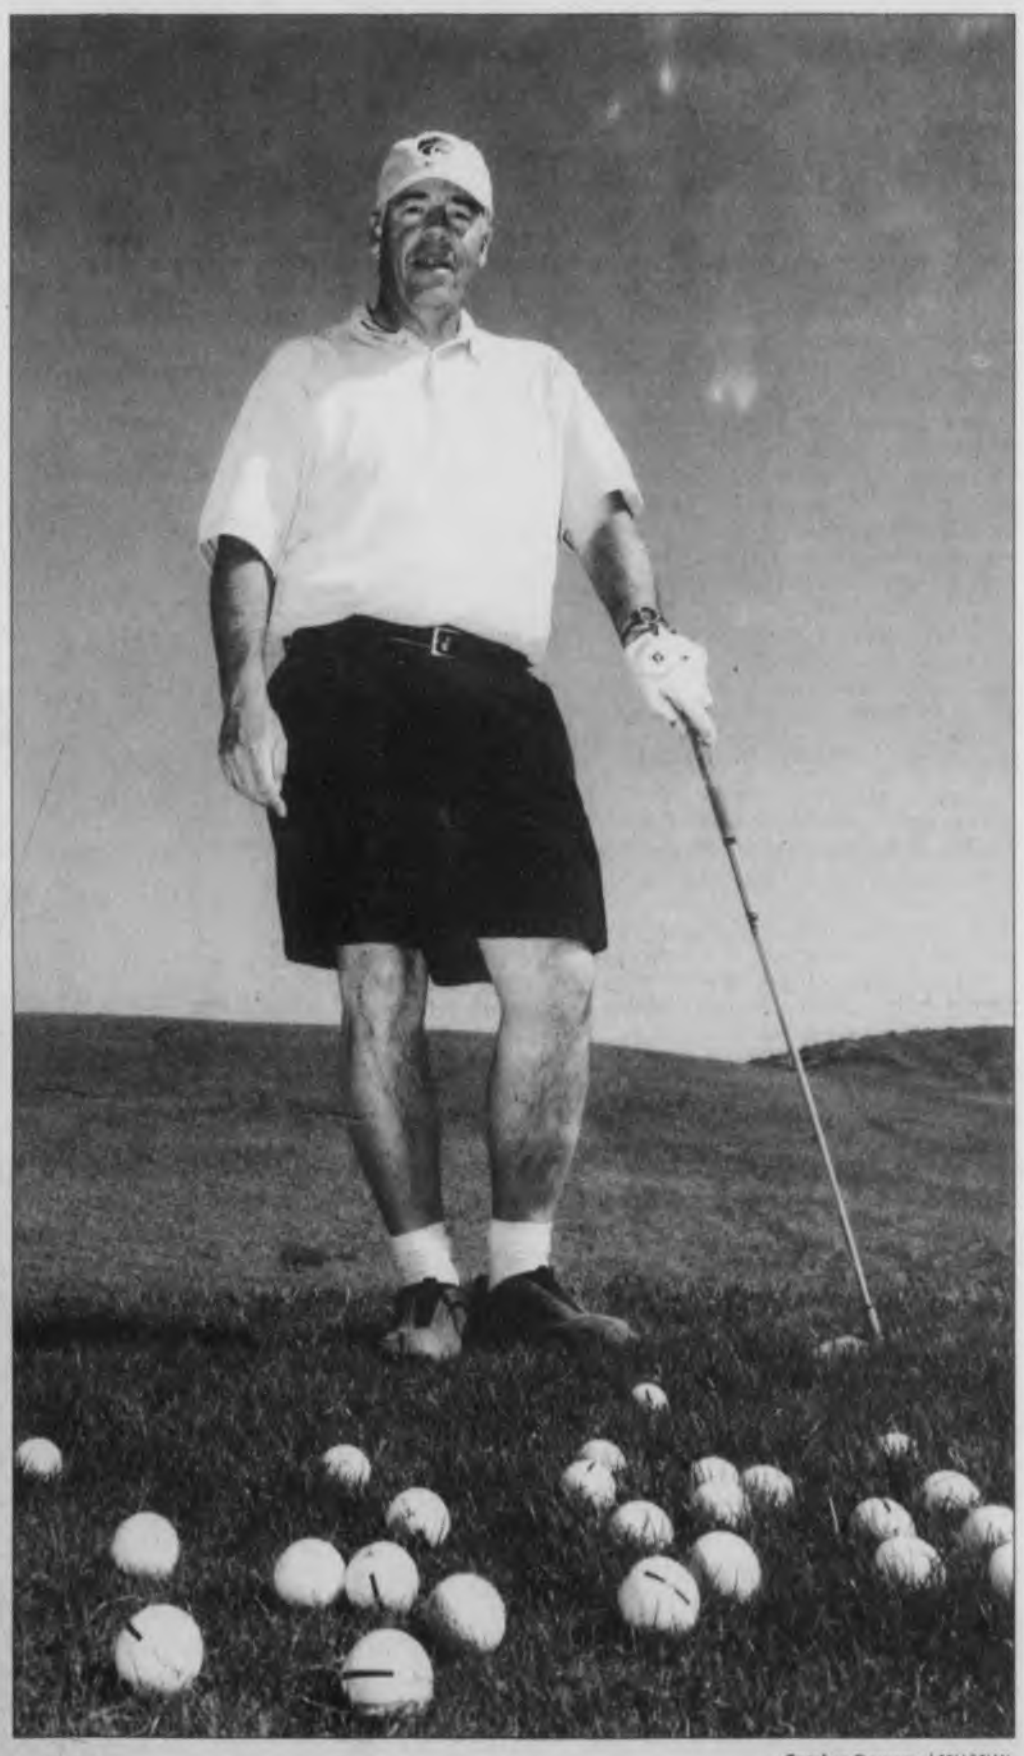
Challenge.

That's part of what K-State men's golf coach Tim Norris said he was looking for when he took over the Wildcat golf team in 1997.

He certainly got it, as he inherited a Wildcat golf program that hadn't finished in the top half of its conference since 1969 – including 14 straight last place appearances – and had only advanced to the NCAA Regionals once.

"I looked at the challenge in that (coaching K-State)," Norris said. "The Big 12 Conference was, is and will be one of the most competitive in college golf."



By all accounts, Norris has been up to the task. Since taking over the head coaching position, he has guided the Wildcats to three-straight NCAA Regional appearances (2003-05), where the team finished in the top 20 each year.

In 2003, K-State came within a whisker of making the NCAA Championships, when the Wildcats missed qualifying for nationals by one shot.

Another important factor in luring Norris to Manhattan, in addition to making the Wildcats a stronger program, was the construction of Colbert Hills Golf Course. When Norris interviewed for the K-State job, Colbert Hills was just a bunch of routing stakes on the Kansas prairie.

Norris said people often perceive the golf course as a recruiting tool, but he thinks the course is more instrumental in refining players once they get here.

"You can recruit the top juniors in the country, but if they don't improve and have a chance to work on their games, you're going to get passed over after a very short period of time," Norris said.

Catrina Rawson | COLLEGIAN

K-State golf coach Tim Norris has been the head coach since 1997. Norris has guided the Wildcats to three-straight NCAA Regional appearances (2003-05).

Senior Ben Kern did not pass up the opportunity. He is a perfect example of a player who came here in search of sharpening skills, but it is Norris, he said, who has played the biggest part in refining his game.

"Over my four years here, coach Norris has kept me stable and under control with my golf game," said Kern, who won the ASU Thunderbird Invitational on April 9. "He slowly helped me progress to where I am now, from where I started at when I came here, which is 100 times better."

Certainly Norris possesses the qualifications to be a Division I golf coach. As a player, he won four tournaments during his time on the PGA Tour. In 1982, he shot a 25-under-par 259 at the Greater Hartford Open, which still ranks as the tournament record and is tied for the fifth-best overall score for 72 holes in PGA Tour history.

"It was just my second year on the Tour, and I'd struggled with injuries in the early part of that year," Norris said. "The tournament in Hartford was obviously a great achievement and memory."

During his college days at Fresno State, Norris earned All-America honors twice. By his admission, the classroom was a different story.

"I didn't apply myself as well as I should have academically," Norris said.

Norris has learned from his experience and has tried to ensure his players focus on their academics.

"I've tried to pass that philosophy on to these other guys, you need to get that education," Norris said. "I can assure you, it's not easier to make the Tour

Cats anxious for wins as Cowboys come to town

By Matt Gorney
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State begins a three-game home series against Oklahoma State at 6:30 tonight.

The Wildcats (24-13-1, 4-10-1 Big 12 Conference) are 1-4 in their last five games, with the most recent loss coming against Missouri State on Wednesday.

Coach Brad Hill said he thinks Oklahoma State (28-13, 7-8 Big 12) is a good offensive team that is playing quality baseball right now.

"It'll be a true test this weekend," Hill said. "There aren't any outs in that lineup. They can do a lot of different things."

The Cowboys enter Tointon Family Stadium on a six-game win streak that includes two victories against Missouri and a four-game sweep of Arkansas-Pine Bluff played in two doubleheaders on Tuesday and Wednesday.

"We're ready for them," junior Eli Rumler said. "Coming off the loss (Wednesday), we're ready to get out there and win again."

One of the Cowboys' key players is junior third baseman Tyler Mach, who currently leads the Big 12 in five statistical categories, including hit, RBI and home runs.

"We just better not pitch to him, I guess," Hill said. "That's the thing, you try to pitch around one guy, and they have a pretty dangerous guy hitting behind him too.

The Wildcats are ninth in the Big 12 and Oklahoma State is No. 6. Both teams need wins this weekend to help their postseason chances.

"We need to come out and get this win tomorrow, and hopefully we can just feed off that one and take care of business this weekend," freshman Byron Wiley said.

With the recent string of losses, Wiley – who led K-State against Missouri State with three hits – said the team has not been playing to its potential in the past few weeks and needs to get better.

"Right now, it's just important for all of us to come out and step it up if we want to go somewhere," Wiley said. "If we don't, then it's going to be pretty tough for us."

Wiley said the Wildcats were already looking forward to the series against the Cowboys while driving home after their loss on Wednesday.

"On the way home on the bus, everybody was talking about Oklahoma State is in for a rude awakening because we've got a chip on our shoulder that we've been playing with since the KU weekend," he said.

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. — Top Tampa Bay prospect Delmon Young was suspended indefinitely by the International League on Thursday, a day after throwing a bat that hit a replacement umpire in the arm.

The 20-year-old Young, considered one of the best players in the minors, was ejected in the first inning following a called third strike in the Durham Bulls' Triple-A game at Pawtucket, R.I. When Young took his time leaving the batter's box, the umpire tossed him. Young then flipped his bat underhand and it sailed end over end, striking the umpire.

Meat-free for me

Choosing a vegetarian lifestyle might prevent, slow heart disease

Art by Loni Woolery | COLLEGIAN

Though she is committed to living the life of a vegetarian, Ashley Chaffin admits she has her weak moments.

"In the McDonald's drive-thru my mouth waters over a picture of a Big Mac," said Chaffin, senior in nutrition and exercise science. Chaffin has been a vegetarian for more than three years and said she plans to continue her meat-free diet for the rest of her life.

"I am not disgusted by meat; I just choose not to eat it," Chaffin said.

Chaffin is not the only member of her family who has eliminated meat from her diet – her older brother Blake has, too. In fact, he was the one who first shared his "happy cow" theory with her, she said.

He theorized that healthy people are happy and unhealthy people are not as happy. Therefore, cows that are crammed into trailers and feedlots are unhappy and thus unhealthy to eat.

That day, after talking to her brother, a turkey sandwich from the residence hall dining center was the last piece of meat to reach her stomach. Chaffin said her decision to become a vegetarian has made her feel healthier but has not been a drastic change for her because she never ate a lot of meat in the first place.

"A well-balanced vegetarian diet is a healthy diet that can prevent or slow the development of many chronic diseases such as heart disease," said Karen Hudson, coordinator of the Family Nutrition Program through K-State Research and Extension.

"It's become easier to be a vegetarian," Chaffin said. "I think there are more products available now and restaurants have more options."

Chaffin said the only restaurant she has trouble finding something to eat at is Famous Dave's, 910 Commons Place. There she orders a salad, fries and a cornbread muffin.

She said her favorite vegetarian dish to make at home is taco salad with ground Boca Burger, which is a patty made from soy protein.

To ensure she is getting adequate protein in her diet, Chaffin said she eats plenty of peanut butter, whole grains, nuts, cheeses and brown rice.

"Typically it is not difficult to meet the recommendations for protein as long as a vegetarian is getting adequate calories," Hudson said. "The key is to eat a diet with lots of variety."

Chaffin and her brother are not alone on their decision to eliminate meat from their diet. According to the American Dietetic Association, 2.5 percent of adults in the United States follow vegetarian diets.

Although vegetarianism is on the rise, the majority of Americans continue to consume meat on a regular basis.

"I don't eat meat for every meal," said Heidi Hammerlund, senior in communication sciences and disorders. "But I could never completely stop eating it."

She said she likes red meat but doesn't eat it constantly.

"I have not gone as far as trying soy burger, but I do not make a habit of eating red meat; I enjoy chicken, turkey or pork."

Award-winning Spanish poet recites readings

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The audience read along in English and Spanish as Ana Rossetti read her poetry last night in the KSU Grand Ballroom in the K-State Student Union.

Additional chairs were added to accommodate the continuous stream of people entering to listen to the award-winning poet.

Rossetti is a winner of the International King Juan Carlos I Poetry Award, said Benjamin Torrico, assistant professor of Spanish.

"The award is very important," Torrico said. "The Royal House OKs the award, and then it is presented by the King himself."

Rossetti read in Spanish a collection of her poems that were available in Spanish and English text for the audience.

One of the poems she read was "Festividad de Dulcísimo Nombre," which means Holiday of the Sweetest Name.

Other poems read included "Where is My Man?" and "Calvin Klein, Underwear."

Michelle Galindo, senior in pre-professional secondary education, said she attended Rossetti's presentation for her Hispanic Readings class.

"She is really popular in Spain," Galindo said.

Galindo said she was told by her teacher that Rossetti is one of the first poets to refer to men as desired objects in her poetry, which is usually how men portray women in their poetry.

Amanda Ebert, junior in modern language, said she attended the readings because her teacher encouraged her to do so.

"Some people believe that in the future she'll be one of the poets students will be studying," Ebert said.

Bradley Shaw, associate professor of Spanish, said Rossetti has numerous publications, including anthologies, novels and poetry.

Shaw said Rossetti has visited the community once before.

"Now she returns as one of the most notable and controversial poets," Shaw said.

Shaw said her controversies lie in the difficulties female writers have in Spain, as well as the feminism presented in her work.

He said the event was sponsored by the Department of Modern Languages, Sigma Delta Pi National Collegiate Hispanic Honor Society and the Studies in 20th and 21st Century Literature journal.

Shaw said he is an associate editor of the journal that is published by the modern languages department at K-State and the Department of Modern and Classical Languages at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln.

Jenny Palermo, sophomore in pre-professional elementary education, said she went to the presentation to fulfill a requirement for her Intro to Literature class.

However, Palermo said she was told the readings would be in English.

"I had to follow along in English," Palermo said, "but it was interesting to listen to her stories afterwards with the help of the translator."

A question-and-answer time followed the readings where Rossetti was asked about her stance on feminism and the creation of her works.

Villalba translated Rossetti's response to feminism, and said Rossetti does not consider herself a feminist.

"I don't want to be labeled as a sexist or a machista," Villalba translated, "but in elimination I end up as a feminists."

Rossetti said she was inspired to write her different works by the poetry written during the Golden Age, Villalba translated.

"Not only because I liked it," Rossetti said, "but because of the way the language shined."

Villalba also translated Rossetti's description of her childhood; Rossetti she wrote her first play at age eight.

"I had all the girls at school practice it and then perform it," Villalba translated. "Then I went from door-to-door inviting people to come to my play."

Villalba is a member of Sigma Delta Pi and said she enjoyed Rossetti's presentation.

"I think it was a great contribution to the Spanish department," Villalba said. "And it provided insights that are enriching for contemporary poetry."

Dolls' 8th album hints at band's turn for the worst

"Let Love In"
★★☆☆☆
Album review by Adrianne DeWeese

Now in their 20th year as a band and in their 40s, the Dolls are back with their eighth album, "Let Love In." The album was produced by Glen Ballard, best known as the producer of Alanis Morissette's "Jagged Little Pill."

After a four-year hiatus from the studio, the Dolls' front man Johnny Rzeznik returned to his native Buffalo, N.Y., to search for the inspiration for the album, which is the follow-up to 2002's "Gutterflower."

Rzeznik, Bassist/Vocalist Robby Takac and Drummer Mike Malinin worked for 12 hours a day writing and recording the 11 tracks for "Let Love In," according to the Dolls' Web site.

The Dolls have certainly toned down their sound during the two decades they have been together. On the Dolls' Web site, Rzeznik cites punk bands like the Ramones, English Beat and the Clash as early influences.

But since 1998, the band's albums have sounded like nothing less than mainstream adult alternative rock. "Let Love In" should serve as a warning to the Dolls that they should not forget their musical roots.

The title track is the best effort on the album with its solid lyrics and instrumentals. Rzeznik sings of a love interest who fears letting love in to her life: "You're the only one

Courtesy art

I ever believed in/The answer that could never be found/The moment you decided to let love in."

"Stay With You" is the first track of the album and was released earlier this month as a single. The song mimics the cry of a middle-school adolescent who wants his girlfriend to run through the fields with him to "another world": "I'll stay with you/The walls will fall before we do/Take my hand now/We'll run forever."

"Better Days" takes on a more somber tone with Rzeznik's pleas for the world to get along and love its children. The song was released as a single last fall, and according to the Dolls' Web site, it was used as CNN's anthem in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

The album also features a remake of the 70s and 80s English band Supertramp's "Give a Little Bit." But the song is twisted from the original and leaves the listener with the aftertaste of rock-pop-gone-bad.

One recurring theme on the album is the reference to weather. In "Stay With You," Rzeznik sings "Now come in from this storm/I taste you sweet and warm." Two tracks later in "Feel the Silence," he sings of confused love in the lyric "I don't know where I'm going/Only know where I been/But you move through my soul like a hurricane wind."

The fifth track of the album, "Without You Here," offers the strangest weather forecast of them all: "Your love's a gathered storm I chased across the sky/A moment in your arms became the reason why."

While the simile to being in love and being caught in a storm works, I find it hard to believe that it was the best reference Rzeznik could come up with.

Overall, "Let Love In" is a strong effort, but avid Dolls' fans will be left wondering if they are not far from burning out, and even more sadly, selling out.

REVENUE | $13.7 million disbursed for salaries

Cavello said the department received about $1 million from the NCAA Men's Basketball Tournament this spring through the Big 12, even though K-State was not in the tournament.

The department also expects to get about $5 million this year from fundraising. The rest of the budget comes from retail and commercial services, like marketing, and from funds generated by leases on the suites and club sections in the stadium.

EXPENDITURES

The athletic department will spend more than $13.7 million, 41 percent of its operating budget, on salaries for all its employees, coaches and administrators, Cavello said, with about $800,000 of it going to salaries for student employees. It takes almost $3.4 million just to pay the base salaries of the 39 current members of the coaching staffs.

The second largest source of expenses are the things that support the teams, accounting for almost $10 million this year. This includes the business office, Wildcat Sports Information and other offices that can't be tied to a particular team.

This section includes payments on the more than $15 million in bonds taken out for the 1998 addition of suites and upper deck to the stadium's east side, Cavello said. He said $1.5 million from the revenue from that side's suites and club section will be put toward the bonds this year.

Cavello said the athletic department is trying to establish a reserve fund of $3 million by putting away $300,000 to $400,000 each year, with some of it coming from the suites and club section on the west side of the stadium. He said they've put away $1.2 million so far.

Third, there's team operations, which should cost about $5.1 million. Cavello said this includes big things like team travel and athletic equipment as well as smaller necessities like office supplies.

Finally, the athletic department will spend almost $5.2 million on athletic scholarships this year. Athletes are much more likely to be from outside Kansas than the average K-State student, Cavello said, and they have to pay out-of-state tuition.

He said this means the athletic department gets hit hard by tuition increases; an increase of 10 to 12 percent can cost the athletic department $500,000.

This expense may be temporary though. Kurt McGuffin, associate athletic director for development, said he hopes to end the need for spending donations on scholarships each year by replacing them with endowments.

Endowments are when a donor puts down a large sum of money to be put in an account where it earns interest. The principal money stays put, and the interest pays the scholarship each year.

McGuffin said a full endowment of a scholarship costs $500,000. He said he hopes to have all athletic scholarships endowed, maybe in 10 years.

It'll just take $83 million.

This is the first installment in a series on the inner workings of the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

SIGMA CHI | Fraternity considers becoming dry

As a result, Sigma Chi will be subject to the following sanctions: a fine of $1,200 to be paid to K-State's IFC by the end of spring 2006, disallowance of chapter-hosted social events and suspension/probation until the end of the 2006-07 school year.

Further, the chapter will not be allowed to have social events during spring 2006, and during fall 2006 the chapter is permitted social events involving alcohol only at third-party vendor locations. The fraternity also will have a membership review and strategic planning with officers to discuss changes in social responsibility and new membership education programs, according to the anonymous finding letter.

The chapter's sanctions are set up on a tier system. As time passes, the chapter can do more things, Kowal said.

Although an appeal option exists, Sigma Chi has not utilized it.

"The appeal for these particular sanctions given by the judicial board were not appealed," said Pat Bosco, dean of student life. "As of now, the Sigma Chi fraternity is working to respond to each of these sanctions."

Although Sigma Chi was found responsible for alcohol and hazing violations, it is taking steps to decrease the chance of similar allegations in the future, Scott Jones, director of Greek Affairs, said.

"We are constantly making changes to make our greek community a safe and healthy place," Jones said.

One-third of K-State's fraternities are dry, Jones said.

"Dry chapters are becoming more and more a trend across the U.S.," he said.

Sigma Chi now is considering becoming a dry chapter and has submitted a proposal.

John Thurlow, president of Sigma Chi and junior in accounting, said the fraternity is working to improve.

"We are making small changes to be a better frat," he said.

SENATE | Childcare center established 20 years ago

"We have no room for staff meetings and board meetings, and no space at all for parent meetings and training programs," Jackson said.

Other safety issues at the center include asbestos tile floors that children crawl and play on daily, Jackson said.

The center was established 20 years ago by K-State students who realized the need for affordable childcare on campus, and it currently provides care for about 240 children, Tilley said.

Several of the proposed sites for the new center include near the Derby Complex and the wooded land north and west of the Hoeflin Stone House Child Care Center, which is near the future home of the KSU Challenge Course, she said.

Tilley said the Department of Housing and Dining Services and university administration have stated that the childcare center can remain in its current building throughout the course of the Jardine Redevelopment Project. The soonest the new childcare center could be built is 2009, she said.

While the bill was introduced at Thursday's meeting, special orders were made to move the bill into final action.

Student Senate Vice Chair Emily Besler said the bill was moved through quickly to give the center adequate time to plan for next year.

"We didn't bring it forward last week because we wanted to give everyone an opportunity to research on their own and have an idea of what the bill was going to look like ahead of time," Besler said.

The $13,000 allocation from Student Senate will be transferred from the K-State Student Projects Foundation Account, according to the legislation.

NORRIS | Fundraising used to generate money for golf program

now than it was when I was doing it. I call it (the Tour) the toughest way in the world to make an easy living."

Norris' efforts have paid off. In the last two years, the Wildcats have had five golfers qualify for either first or second-team Academic All-Big 12 honors.

"That's one thing we didn't have when I was going to school, and I doubt anybody had it back then," Norris said. "Here they expect a lot out of these guys, but in return, they give them a lot of resources."

Although the program can't draw large crowds to generate revenue, Norris said they use other methods to raise money. The largest fundraiser is the Colbert-Fogler golf tournament, which takes place in Wichita.

"Jim Colbert's obviously been very gracious to the program," Norris said. "He lends his name and his time, and for a matter of years, he would bring in players from the senior tour.

Norris said the golf program can help K-State in the long run, despite its inability to create immediate cash.

"If we turn out good golfers and good people, they're going to give back to the university in a lot of different ways, as evidenced by Jim Colbert," he said.

Friday Collegians stolen from racks

Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An estimated 8,000 Collegian newspapers were stolen from newsstands across campus early Friday morning.

At nearly all of the Collegian's biggest drop-off points, including the K-State Student Union, Seaton Hall, Throckmorton Hall, Umberger Hall and Bluemont Hall, newspapers disappeared from the racks not long after they were delivered to campus at about 6:45 a.m.

Officer Parrish Quick with the K-State Police said two suspects were seen taking Collegians from the newsstand in the Peters Recreation Complex.

Quick said employees at the rec complex described the suspects as two white males who said they were Collegian employees and claimed there was a misprint in the newspaper that required removing the papers from the stand. Quick said the two men were seen driving a white sport utility vehicle.

Collegian editor-in-chief Leann Sulzen said there was no reason for the papers to be pulled from the stands, and the two men are not members of the Collegian staff.

Unread copies were found in recycling bins and trash cans near the newsstands, and some Collegian staff members returned the copies they could salvage back to the stands.

Of 16 possible cases, 5 do not have mumps

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County-Manhattan Board of Health discussed the mumps and bird flu at its meeting April 28.

"To date, we've not had any confirmed cases (of the mumps)," Charles Murphy, board staff member, said.

The Riley County-Manhattan Health Department has seen 16 probable cases of the mumps, but five have been confirmed to not be the disease, said Kathy Dickey-Wilson, clinic supervisor for the health department.

People should be inoculated for the mumps if they were born before 1957 and determined a contact, Dickey-Wilson said.

A contact is someone who has been three feet from an infected person for a full hour or someone who lives with someone who has the mumps, she said.

The mumps vaccine became available in 1967, Dickey-Wilson said.

People born before 1957 are considered to be at a higher risk for catching diseases, Dr. Karen Fagin said.

"As we age, our immune systems deteriorate," Fagin said.

The mumps vaccine is a live vaccine, and, in a person with an immune deficiency, it could be life-threatening, Fagin said.

In the board's discussion of avian flu, otherwise known as the bird flu,

Pre-finals bash

Spring Fest brings national talent, break from studying

By Adam Monroe
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's annual Spring Fest took place in the K-State Student Union on Friday and featured talent from all over the country.

"The Spring Fest is the UPC's (Union Program Council) end-of-the-year bash before finals," Nacole Boan, senior in political science, said.

The event opened with a performance by Pineapple Truck, a local band that plays jamband rock music, continued with the funk band Karma and closed with an Afro-Cuban rock band, The Lloyd Doppler Effect, from Washington, D.C.

"The music was very exciting, and toward the end of Karma's show, some people were swing dancing," said Robin Peck, sophomore in business administration pre-professional.

Russ Williams, conga player for The Lloyd Doppler Effect, said the band's music has become more structured over the years.

"I grew up with go-go music before I got into Afro-Cuban music," Williams said. "We are primarily a recording group now, so our music is much more structured, but we still jam."

Phil Kominski, lead vocals and guitar player for The Lloyd Dobler Effect, works through a set during its performance at Spring Fest in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

The events included a flying dollar booth where people could step inside and have a chance to grab flying money.

"I was able to grab $4, but it was really windy and confusing," Peck said.

UPC also set up a booth offering fake tattoos.

"I got a tattoo of Buddha on my back," said Jeanette Rikli, freshman in pre-journalism and mass communications. "I am actually Christian, but it looks good."

Golden Key collects books for libraries in Africa

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Golden Key National Honor Society will partner with Books for Africa to help provide books for libraries in Africa.

Books will be collected today through May 12.

Students can drop off unwanted books in collection boxes outside the Office of Student Activities and Services and in all fraternity and sorority houses, said Greg Corbin, Golden Key vice president of public relations and senior in philosophy.

"A significant amount of books that get thrown away every year could be used to help others," he said.

Corbin said there also will be a table set up in the K-State Student Union where books can be dropped off.

He said it takes 2,000 books to fill a school library, and Golden Key members hope to collect enough books to fill one school library. Corbin said they already have 500 books that were donated by the College of Veterinary Medicine.

"With as many people as we have on campus, we should be able to do quite better than our goal," he said.

Donita Whitney-Bammerlin, management instructor and co-adviser of Golden Key, said the group focuses on increasing scholastic literacy and service.

"This activity will promote literacy and education while being a service to someone to else," she said.

Whitney-Bammerlin said books that are collected will be shipped to Better World Books where they will be sorted and shipped to the place of greatest need.

She said textbooks are used for education, and regular reading books are used for teaching English as a second language.

Any books the organization does not think will be beneficial are sold online, and the proceeds go to shipping costs.

"This is an activity that is good for everyone," she said. "It helps people get rid of books they don't need and helps people get books that they need."

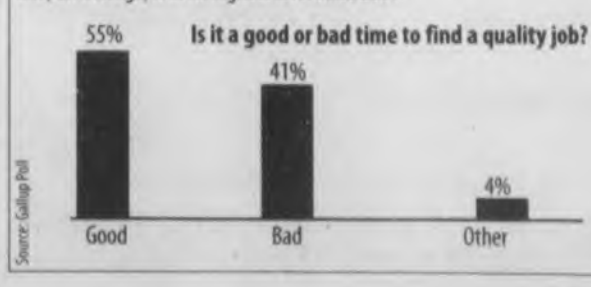
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS NEWS HIGHLIGHTS

Iran warns United Nations

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — The Iranian deputy oil minister said Sunday he did not believe the United Nations would impose sanctions on Iran, because that would boost oil prices even higher. "Any action like that will increase oil prices very high. And I believe that the U.N. or its bodies will not put any sanctions on oil or the oil industry," M.H. Nejad Hosseinian told reporters after talks in Islamabad with Pakistani officials.

Rebels reject peace deal



ABUJA, Nigeria — Sudanese rebels rejected a proposal to end the bloodshed in the Darfur region on Sunday, throwing into question the outcome of yet another series of negotiations to put a stop to fighting that has left tens of thousands of people dead. The rebels called for changes to the deal hours before an African Union deadline — and after the Sudanese government indicated it would accept the proposal.

Iraqi president hopeful

BAGHDAD, Iraq — President Jalal Talabani met with representatives of seven armed groups and is optimistic they might agree to lay down their weapons, his office said Sunday. It was the first time a senior Iraqi official has acknowledged talks with insurgents. However, Talabani did not identify the groups or specify when and where the meeting took place.

Job hunt

Four in 10 Americans say now is a good time to find a quality job, according to a recent Gallup Poll. This sentiment has been steady since mid-December and, on average, is at its highest level since 2001.

WEEK IN REVIEW

7 things you didn't know 7 days ago

Sebelius fined for soliciting money

TOPEKA – Gov. Kathleen Sebelius was fined $1,500 by the state ethics commission for illegally soliciting campaign contributions from lobbyists.

The case involved an April 12 e-mail that Sebelius' re-election campaign sent to 92,000 supporters. Of those 92,000, 39 appeared to be registered lobbyists, and 16 of them actually received the e-mail, according to testimony.

FUNERAL PROTESTS RESTRICTED

TOPEKA – The Rev. Fred Phelps and his followers cannot protest closer than 500 feet to any funeral of a U.S. soldier killed in combat and cannot use noise to disrupt the service under a tentative compromise bill worked out by House and Senate negotiators.

MARRIAGE BILL COMPROMISE REJECTED

TOPEKA – Senators rejected a compromise bill prohibiting anyone under age 16 from marrying in Kansas and sent it back to negotiators.

When the bill left the Senate, it allowed those under 16 to marry only if they get permission from a judge who decides it is in the person's best interest. The House barred anyone under 16 without exceptions.

LAWYER CRACKS JUDGE'S 'DA VINCI CODE'

LONDON – The code has been cracked.

London lawyer Dan Tench and The Times newspaper on Friday both claimed to have solved the riddle of a code embedded in a judge's ruling in "The Da Vinci Code" copyright lawsuit.

The message was created by Peter Smith, the High Court judge who presided over the copyright infringement suit brought by authors of the nonfiction book "The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail" against the publisher of Dan Brown's mega-selling thriller.

UKRAINIANS REMEMBER CHERNOBYL

KIEV, Ukraine – Ukrainian mourners carried single red carnations and flickering candles during a solemn ceremony early Wednesday to remember the 1986 Chernobyl explosion.

The April 26, 1986, pre-dawn explosion became the world's worst-ever nuclear accident, ripping off the nuclear power plant's roof and spewing radioactive fallout for 10 days over 77,220 square miles of the then-Soviet Union and Europe.

HARVARD STUDENT'S NOVEL PULLED

NEW YORK – Rarely has an author succeeded, then failed, so quickly as Kaavya Viswanathan. Just weeks ago, the Harvard University sophomore's debut novel, "How Opal Mehta Got Kissed, Got Wild and Got a Life," was released with a first printing of 100,000. After Viswanathan acknowledged lifting material for the book, publisher Little, Brown and Company pulled it, announcing Thursday it had notified retail and wholesale outlets to stop selling the book and to return unsold copies.

FORT RILEY CHARGES SOLDIERS

FORT RILEY – Charges have been referred against two Fort Riley infantry soldiers for the training death of a fellow soldier. The charges were forwarded Monday against Staff Sgt. Jeremy L. Muntz and Spc. James K. Tillery for the Jan. 25 shooting death of Pfc. Donald E. Compton, 20.

County organizations prepare for range of possible disasters

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Riley County organizations keep services ready for the moment disaster strikes.

While they prepare for bad weather and natural disasters, agencies also are ready to take care of other emergencies.

The American Red Cross is a lead volunteer organization for disasters in Riley County, said Jason Lantz, director of operations for the American Red Cross of the Flint Hills.

Lantz said the Red Cross prepares for the mass care of people – providing food, shelter, clothing and mental support.

The organization has about 200 volunteers trained in disaster preparedness. Lantz said volunteers provide several services, from client case work to disaster assessment.

Outside of natural disasters, Lantz said the Red Cross also has increased awareness and preparation for terror incidents. Volunteers have been educated about danger zones and decontamination.

"Certainly from a Red Cross perspective, after 9/11, the Red Cross put more preparedness for terrorist kinds of things," he said.

Lantz said the organization has worked to prepare communities for possible flu pandemics. Because of the nature of the flu, Lantz said it is a national problem that must be dealt with at a regional level.

"We're certainly trying to put more energy for flu pandemics," he said. "It's an issue that's going to have widespread effects.

"We're making it a priority."

Susanne Kufahl, assistant administrator at the Riley County, Manhattan Health Department, said the health department keeps staff trained and prepared for a variety of disasters, from flooding to acts of bio-terrorism.

Kufahl said the most recent concern of the health department has been the avian flu.

"It's all over the world, news about the avian flu and how it could become contagious person to person," she said. "It could be dramatic for the whole world."

Preparing for that type of outbreak requires monitoring new cases reported, the type of birds involved and information about vaccination.

"It's very difficult," Kufahl said. "You don't know what's going to happen. You don't know if it's going to happen."

"It's very difficult. You don't know what's going to happen. You don't know if it's going to happen."

Susan Kufahl
ASSISTANT ADMINISTRATOR, RILEY COUNTY, MANHATTAN HEALTH DEPARTMENT

She said striking a balance of encouraging preparation without alarming the public is vital.

Laurie Harrison, assistant director of Riley County Emergency Management, said Emergency Management works with several county organizations to ensure the community is safe on all levels.

Harrison said the organization has been working with the health department to prepare for any kind of flu pandemic. She said the health department keeps an updated plan on how to handle a possible outbreak, including where people could receive shots and how to deal with restricted amounts of vaccine.

A dam failure is another disaster for which Emergency Management is ready. Harrison said Emergency Management has worked with a corps of engineers on an outdoor warning siren, which is tested monthly with other outdoor warnings.

Harrison said precaution against terrorism is something to include in emergency operations.

The county received a grant from the Department of Homeland Security to obtain equipment for terrorism response for police officers.

While organizations work around the clock to keep the community and its residents safe, Harrison said the more people who are prepared, the better things will be.

"When it does happen, we're going to need people to fill positions," she said. "What we need now is the human resource, trained volunteers, people who are willing to train ahead of time.

"If we can get people to train ahead of time, it makes them prepared, and their families, and that little circle grows then."

World Dance Day unifies cultures

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students and alumni performed dances from around the globe on Saturday in the K-State Union Forum Hall.

Joyce Yagerline, associate professor of speech communication, theater and dance and organizer of the Kansas State University World Dance Day, opened the program with a story about World War I soldiers.

During WWI, German and Allied soldiers were given an armistice on Christmas Day. The fighting stopped, and the soldiers were allowed to meet each other to share food and Christmas celebrations, Yagerline said.

The day after Christmas, the soldiers were unable to go back and fight, she said.

"What would happen if the entire world danced together?" she asked.

The K-State Philippine Student Association performed a bamboo dance called "Tinikling." The dance involved poles and required performers to jump in and out of the poles as they came together.

Annika Linde, graduate student in human nutrition, and Tonatiuh Melgarejo, assistant professor of human nutrition, performed a tango called "Uno."

Neither knew how to tango until two weeks ago, Melgarejo said.

The pair enrolled in an intensive training program in Wichita, he said. They rehearsed for one week before performing at World Dance Day.

The Japanese Yosakoi Dance Club performed two dances, "The Seasons" and "Blasts of Wind."

Dancers also performed dances from Ireland and the Middle East.

Lisa Zecha, a K-State alumna and professional dancer, showcased two dances from the Middle East. One involved balancing a saber on her head as she moved.

Johnson said she decided to take belly dancing because she was uncomfortable with her body.

"I'm still very insecure," she said. "But dancing forces me out of that shell."

Soldiers compete for badge

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

U.S. Army infantry can spot an expert on sight – they just look for a three inch musket.

The rifle, set on a blue background, is part of the U.S. Army's Expert Infantryman Badge, known by the uniformed as the "EIB" – the award reserved for infantry and special forces that demonstrate proficiency in a series of tasks.

To qualify for Expert Infantryman Badge, testing soldiers must meet a variety of requirements: hitting 36 out of 40 targets with their assigned weapons at ranges up to 300 meters, completing a U.S. Army physical fitness test with 70 points in each event, negotiating a land navigation course, both day and night, and completing a 12-mile march in less than three hours while carrying almost 50 pounds of gear.

If the prerequisites are met, soldiers then spend five days in training and three days in testing for the EIB.

The tests encompass a variety of skills, from reading a map to operating a M-2 "madeuce" .50 caliber machine gun.

During the testing, a soldier can reattempt a failed event, but only once, and each soldier gets only three lifelines for the entire process.

If soldiers ace every test but the last one, they must try again the following year.

Although anyone can test for the award, it was created for the infantry and, as such, only infantrymen and special forces, can wear it.

Lieutenant Colonel Frank Zachar, commander of 1-16 Infantry Battalion, said badge-hopefuls have 60 tests to perform before they earn the badge.

"Each one of these tasks has to be perfected for them to earn this coveted award," Zachar said.

The award has more than 60 years of history and was created to honor the infantry, which bore the brunt of the fighting during World War II.

Due to the history and the exclusive nature of the award, Zachar said it provides a common bond between the army's infantrymen.

Sergeant Major Robert French said the award is looked upon favorably during upper-level enlisted promotions, which are coordinated by the U.S. Congress.

Testing ran through the week, with the awards ceremony on Friday. During the ceremony, Fort Riley's base commander, Major General Dennis Hardy, awarded those who are "true-blue," those who completed all 35 tasks in their first attempt.

The EIB is one of the only awards that can be worn on the army's camouflage uniform, an indicator of the weight the badge carries in infantry circles.

"Every infantrymen ... looks at another soldier wearing the expert infantryman's badge and understands that is a soldier that excels at their skills," Zachar said. "And they look up to them with great respect."

Newspaper theft censors news, robs students

Thousands of Collegian newspapers were stolen from newsstands Friday morning, leaving loyal readers without news.

Although the paper is free at the newsstand, this theft has a cost.

Students spend many hours each week working to sell advertisements, write and edit stories, design pages and photograph events so the university can receive its daily dosage of campus, city and national news.

Student Publications, the Collegian's parent company, estimated a total loss of about $6,427.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Despite this calculation, the K-State Police stand by its opinion that because the Collegian is free to students, there is no actual loss.

The thieves who committed this crime are not only stealing from the Collegian, but also robbing K-State students, as some of each student's fees go to partially fund publication of the Collegian.

Theft of newspapers is an act of censorship. Giving students the news they need and deserve to know is the Collegian's top priority, and Friday's act prevented the achievement of that goal.

The First Amendment guarantees the freedom of the press, and that freedom was compromised Friday.

The Collegian is pursuing further action to discover who committed this deplorable act of censorship. Those with further information on the crime should contact the campus police immediately.

Explaining sides

Conservatives lean towards life in fuzzy battle over when it begins

Many see abortion as a women's issue, but, for the conservative right, it is a life issue.

DANIEL KIRKSEY

Proponents of the pro-life perspective understand that in certain situations, particularly for women who have faced abortion, it becomes an issue men never will wholly understand.

However, because our focus is that of concern for life and life only, the more complete perspective to be gained by experience for any single woman becomes a moot point.

My aim is not to convince people to change their minds; I am convinced most people believe what they want regardless of reason, so I don't want to fight that battle.

My aim is to make everyone understand why pro-life people believe what they do, because I think there are many misconceptions.

The fact is, there exists no grand conspiracy to oppress women and control their bodies. We simply are interested in the chance for human life.

No one knows when life begins.

No one – regardless of what studies they quote. Because there is no credible consensus when it comes to the definition of life, we cannot know when it begins.

So, the conservative right has decided that erring on the side of life makes the most sense.

You all have seen the data. From the point of fertilization on day one, all human chromosomes necessary for life are present.

As early as day 22, the heart begins to beat with the child's own blood, often different from the mother's.

By the sixth week, brain waves can be detected, and the mouth and lips are present.

I could list fact after fact, but my point is to show how tricky the subject can get.

We don't know if having chromosomes present, having a heart that pumps blood different from that of the mother or the presence of detectable brain waves constitutes life, but why take the chance?

We do not believe it is unreasonable to think the destruction of something that might be alive might be murder.

We do think no one has the right to murder, regardless of the relationship to the victim.

We understand that situations concerning abortion are not always black and white and that many questionable circumstances exist.

However, we only offer a principle: err on the side of life.

We believe this should be the cornerstone guiding all policy-making on this subject.

With all of that said and this being the final week of the Collegian for the semester, I want to apologize for my lack of clarity as a writer at times, which has hurt feelings and caused problems.

It has been a pleasure writing to you all. Godspeed.

Athletes shouldn't receive special treatment

MEGAN GREEN

A few things have been going on in our society recently that have received quite a bit of attention. The focus lately is the accusation of rape by a stripper at a Duke lacrosse team's party.

According to Newsweek, the accuser arrived at a lacrosse team party on March 13 with another stripper. During their dance, one player reportedly held up a broomstick and told them to use it.

The strippers decided it was time to leave, but as they were on their way out, one player persuaded them to return.

This is when the accuser said three men pushed her into a bathroom and raped her for 30 minutes.

Since I can remember, and I am sure farther back than that, athletes have always been given a bit of a break on almost everything on university campuses simply because of what they symbolize in college life.

I am not saying all players fail to take responsibility for their actions, but sometimes things are a little more lenient for them.

Remember when Ell Roberson was accused of raping a woman?

Following that accusation, many more women accused Roberson of doing the same.

He was never convicted on any of the accusations. It took a lot of guts for a woman to say the star of the football team raped her.

Let's face it – sometimes people don't believe the common woman over a celebrity. If a victim does speak up about her private life, everything about her and the case becomes the center of media attention.

Yes, there are those few people who lied when they accused an athlete of wrongdoings, but there also have been many who told the truth. These players finally are having to own up to their actions, and they shouldn't get any leniency.

Athletes across the nation should take heed from the two indicted in this case. Just because an athlete is looked up to and considered a big man on campus does not mean he can get away with everything.

In fact, once a person has enough courage to make a case against an athlete, the athlete can guarantee a lot of future problems.

The two indicted in this case will have a lot of cleaning up to do after the trial. According to Newsweek, new evidence found, like ATM receipts and pictures, will work against the accuser. It shows that some of the men fingered were not actually there at the party at the time of the alleged rape.

I respect our athletes at K-State, and I do not think they have created problems on our campus. But sometimes egos can get the best of people and make them feel no one can touch them.

The Duke accusation has shown everyone that is not the case: athletes are not untouchable.

I want to know which Sigma Chi that was that dumped all the newspapers outside the Union in the recycling bin this morning.

OK, so I don't know if it was a Sigma Chi, but they were all in the recycling bin outside the Union this morning.

Great Bend sucks. Hoisington rules.

So did Sigma Chi like steal all the Collegians? Or what happened to them all?

Mumps is something you get only on the Oregon Trail.

One of my most favorite things to do when it's raining is to watch unathletic people try to jump over water puddles and not make it and get themselves all wet. Funny, he he he.

Hey, Sigma Chi, if you're ashamed of your hazing, maybe you should stop doing it.

Thank you, Sigma Chi, for stealing all of K-State's newspapers. We know it was you.

For everyone who couldn't read the paper yesterday, I'll fill you in. Sigma Chi hazes; they got in trouble; that's pretty much it.

I will not eat that cat poop.

On behalf of the community here at K-State, I would like to apologize to all the students and faculty for Sigma Chi. We don't like them either.

The anonymous person who wrote the anonymous letter anonymously stole the Collegian.

If you're going to call in about oil in Alaska to the Fourum, be educated. First off, there's a lease; it runs out in a while. Then, we don't even get the money from the oil for another 10 years, and it's going to run out in just six years past that. It's really not worth it.

I like vegetarians. Because of them, there's more meat for the rest of us.

Engineer recruits for international aid team

By Sarah Burford
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Jonathan Seward, left, talks with Gilbert Malinga, graduate student in biological and agricultural engineering, about Engineers Without Borders, a group that will deliver development services to poor villages around the world.

Every day last week, rain or shine, Jonathan Seward sat in Bosco Student Plaza with his television and laptop ready.

He said he was after recruits.

Seward, a graduate research assistant for the Department of Biological and Agricultural Engineering, is trying to start a K-State chapter of Engineers Without Borders (EWB), which he said is open to students in all majors, not just engineers.

This global organization's mission, as stated on its Web site, is to partner with developing communities to improve their quality of life.

This is done through long-term engineering projects that sustain the community's economy and environment, the Web site said.

"Sustainability is the way of the future," Seward said. "It's where we're going to have to go."

With a world population at 6 billion and climbing to 8 billion in the next 25 years, Seward said the world must create new methods for using resources.

He said 6,000 people per day are dying of preventable causes like malnutrition and famine.

EWB aims to find low-technology approaches to solving energy problems and bringing quality water to communities by constructing water pumps or other devices, Seward said.

This gives the inhabitants more time to spend on other things like school.

"These are ways Engineers Without Borders actually makes real differences in the lives of people," he said.

Gilbert Malinga, a graduate student from Uganda studying biological and agricultural engineering, said in some undeveloped areas, women must walk miles to find clean water and then have to wait in line for it.

Malinga said up to 500 people could use the same well. He said EWB works with one community at a time, and that community helps neighboring people.

Malinga said EWB needs members in fields like health care and economics in order to help developing communities.

"The goal is to bring people from as many different skills as possible," Malinga said.

EWB is composed of student and professional chapters that work together on projects. Members receive university education, training and professional mentoring.

Malinga said networking with university professors and the community can help students' careers, language and multicultural perspective.

Projects normally take place during the summer to allow university faculty and students to work together, he said.

Malinga said students interested in EWB should go to the Web site, www.ewb-usa.org, to see other students' projects.

Seward said he hopes international students at K-State will identify needs in their home countries so the K-State chapter possibly could propose a project in those countries.

"I think students are looking for ways to apply what they've learned in a real and tangible way," Seward said.

Danny Rogers, faculty sponsor for EWB and professor in biological and agricultural engineering, said students should experience different cultures and broaden their outlook.

"All of us who are fortunate enough to go to school and have a career should look beyond our own needs," Rogers said. "How can we use our own resources and information elsewhere to help other people?"

City plans for Veterans Day parade, lunch

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's only the end of April, but plans for the 2006 Veterans Day activities already are being made.

Many of these activities are organized by the Flint Hills Veterans Coalition, which consists of veterans from World War II, the Korean War, the Vietnam War and the desert wars, said Mike Kearns, chairman of the Veterans Day planning committee.

"It's quite a group," he said.

Kearns said planning is still in the preliminary stages, but the committee has begun some work.

The planning committee consists of 38 coalition members who are divided into 17 subcommittees, Kearns said.

The group meets the second Wednesday of each month at the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, 501 Poyntz Ave.

These meetings are open to the public, and the next meeting will take place May 10.

"We welcome anybody who wants to come help us plan this," Kearns said. "From the university standpoint, we'd sure appreciate the involvement of veterans at the university or anybody that wants to get involved."

A parade will be on the morning of November 10 on Poyntz Ave.

The parade traditionally happens on Veterans Day, November 11, but was moved a day earlier because Veterans Day falls on a Saturday this year.

The committee likes to have local students march in the parade, which is easier to arrange on a weekday, Kearns said.

The parade usually draws a large crowd, and though there has never been an official count, about 1,500 or 2,000 people typically attend, he said.

"Usually Poyntz Avenue is lined," Kearns said. "It's a big deal."

Local students also will participate in poster and essay contests. The theme for both contests are to recognize veterans.

The children's work will be judged, and the winning schools will receive a cash award, said Dave Denning, vice chairman of the committee.

The winning students will present their work at an invitation-only luncheon that will take place at the Wareham Opera House, 410 Poyntz Ave., after the parade.

The morning before the parade, a biscuit and gravy breakfast will take place at VFW Post No. 1786, 212 South 4th St.

On the Sunday either following or preceding the parade, the annual Tribute to America musical event will take place.

This event will feature patriotic music, played by an army or air force band, said Bill Reece, secretary of the committee.

"It looks like it's going to be another great one," Reece said of the event. "Things are really starting to fall into place."

Veterans day facts

- Regardless of the day of the week, Veterans Day always is observed on Nov. 11.
- There are currently about 25 million veterans living in the United States.
- More than 48 million Americans have served in the military during war and peace since 1776.
- Every year, about 80,000 veterans are buried in one of the cemeteries of the National Cemetery system.
- In 2004, the federal government spent $59.6 billion for veterans benefits programs.
- About $22.4 billion in federal compensation supports the 2.6 million veterans who have service-related disabilities.

What a time it has been

MICHAEL ASHFORD

So this is it, huh?

To be completely cliché, the time really has flown by.

For better or worse, once this week is over, so, too, is my time at the Collegian.

I've barely been at this whole journalism thing for two years, but after this past school year, I feel like I've covered a lifetime of events.

Just think for a moment about all the unbelievably big sports stories that came out of K-State this year.

Coach Bill Snyder retired on Nov. 15, 2005, ending the greatest 17 years by a K-State coach in school history. He made K-State what it is today.

Snyder's replacement, Ron Prince, was hired on Dec. 5, 2005, as a complete unknown to Wildcat fans, ushering in a new era for K-State football that is radically different from, and uncannily similar to, Snyder's reign.

There was the firing of men's basketball coach Jim Wooldridge after K-State's 73-65 loss to Texas Tech in the opening round of the Big 12 Conference Tournament in Dallas.

Oh the season that could have been for Wooldridge and the wealth of talent with which he was blessed.

No matter though, because Athletics Director Tim Weiser went out and snagged one of the biggest names in all of college basketball, Bob Huggins, to lead the hardcourt Wildcats.

There is no doubt in my mind Huggins will return K-State men's basketball to its former glory.

And no one can forget the women's basketball team winning the Women's National Invitation Tournament, thanks to the efforts of four freshmen mixing with a cast of veterans.

Add in the disappointment of the actual football season, the elation of beating Kansas in men's basketball for the first time since 1994, K-State distance runner Christian Smith setting a new collegiate record in the 1,000-meter run and winning the national championship in the indoor-mile and the highs and lows of the ongoing baseball season, and, quite frankly, you've got one tired, but completely happy, sports writer.

In covering K-State sports this last season, I've realized I had the opportunities of a lifetime this year.

I can say I've covered some of the biggest events that will continue to shape K-State athletics for decades to come.

None of this would have been possible had my first editor, Josh Witt, not taken a chance on me. He had no reason to.

I was a former engineering student searching for my niche, and I like to think I found it – writing sports – because Witt gave me a shot.

I certainly hope the students on this campus enjoyed the writing I brought to the Collegian these past few semesters.

Whether it be through my columns, my game wraps or my features and profiles, I always wanted to give K-State students something they liked to read.

When I write, I pour my emotions into the words, and I hope that came through in my stories.

Being a die-hard K-State fan – I have a Powercat tattooed on my leg for crying out loud – has made my time covering K-State athletics so much sweeter.

I loved my time at K-State, and now it's time to move on.

After covering Wildcat sports this past year, it looks like K-State athletics are moving on as well.

Michael Ashford is a senior in print journalism and will be graduating, but to what and where, he does not know. You can e-mail your thoughts, prayers and general support to him at sports@spub.ksu.edu.

Bad weather impedes track team

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cold temperatures and more than an inch of rain besieged the Drake Relays in Des Moines, Iowa, over the weekend and forced some members of the K-State track team to pull out of their races.

Coach Cliff Rovelto said the postseason was a factor in whether some athletes ran.

"In the end, we didn't do as much as we had originally hoped, because two weeks out from conference (championships), you just can't afford to risk injury at this point," Rovelto said. "The people that did compete were in an event where there were less chances of injury."

Freshman Scott Sellers placed second in the men's special high jump with a leap of 7-00 1/2. Freshmen Colin Swaney and Tevan Everett, junior Casey Becker and senior Christian Smith finished second in the men's distance medley relay with a time of 9:48.34.

In special events, senior Breanna Eveland finished sixth in the women's pole vault with a vault of 13-05 3/4. Freshman Liliani Mendez placed sixth in the women's 1,500-meter run with a time of 4:30.88, and senior Shunte Thomas finished fifth in the women's 400-meter run with a time of 53.71.

Thomas said, though the weather was a letdown, she was glad to have the experience.

"I thought it was a different experience," she said. "We've never had to run in anything like that before, so it was difficult. It helps, though, to run in this because the weather can always be a trick, so being able to run in that kind of weather helps, because not every track meet can be sunny and 70 degrees."

Thomas said the team performed well, despite the weather.

"I was really impressed with what my teammates did at this meet," she said.

Rovelto said the people scheduled to compete in the Big 12 Conference Outdoor Championships, May 12-14, did not run Sunday.

"Our sport is unique in a lot of ways, in that the conference championship is based on one weekend's performance," he said. "We have to be healthy as well as we possibly can on that weekend.

"We're not trying to baby them. It's just not worth the risk at this point."

Matt Marasco stretches to make an out at first on an infield single. The hit scored the second run to help Oklahoma State to a 2-1 win Saturday.

Powerful pitching

Grand slam sinks Cats; top hitters overshadowed

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The forecast called for offensive fireworks as the top four hitters in the Big 12 Conference squared off at Tointon Family Stadium on Saturday and Sunday.

Byron Wiley walks from home plate after striking out during the second game of Saturday's double header. K-State lost both games to Oklahoma State on Saturday and the final game Sunday.

But the heavy hitters – Oklahoma State's Tyler Mach and Deik Scram and K-State's Joe Roundy and Barret Rice – were overshadowed by dominant pitching for most of the series. The biggest hit of the series came from the most unlikely of sources – Oklahoma State's Shelby Ford.

Ford was 0-for-36 in conference road games before belting a grand slam in the 10th inning to lift the Cowboys to a 9-4 victory in Sunday's series finale. With the win, Oklahoma State (31-13, 10-8 Big 12 Conference) completed a three-game sweep against K-State (24-16-1, 4-13-1).

Coach Brad Hill said the Wildcats played hard through the series, but just couldn't come through in the clutch.

"We just can't seem to get the key hit or make the key play," Hill said.

The Wildcats took a 3-1 lead into the seventh inning Sunday, but two walks and four infield hits opened the door for the Cowboys to score three runs.

"It was just one of those things," Hill said of the infield hits. "They just hit it in some spots where we couldn't make plays."

Junior Jared Goedert tied the game with a solo homerun in the bottom of the seventh – a shot down the left field-line that sailed just inside the foul pole.

K-State had a chance to take the lead in the eighth, but junior Eli Rumler bounced into a double play and stranded freshman Byron Wiley at third.

In the 10th, two singles and a walk set the table for Ford's grand slam. Senior Bryan Peterson (0-2) was charged with four of Oklahoma State's 10th-inning runs and took the loss.

Goedert said the missed opportunities made Sunday's loss even tougher to swallow.

"It's extremely frustrating, because we were right there," Goedert said. "We just need to have guys step up. We just have to get hits when we need them."

K-State lost despite a solid start from sophomore Chase Bayuk. Bayuk pitched six strong innings before exiting in the seventh.

The Wildcats got another solid start from senior Adam Cowart in the second game of Saturday's doubleheader. Cowart pitched a complete game, but was out-dueled by Oklahoma State's Brae Wright as the Cowboys won 2-1.

K-State's lone run came in the second inning when sophomore Matt Marasco's double scored Roundy. The Cowboys scored both their runs in the fourth inning on RBI singles from Mach and Justin Colbert.

Rowers tie with KU for 2nd in Big 12 Invitational

By Ben Fallin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's rowing team finished the Big 12 Rowing Invitational in a 44-point tie with rival Kansas on Sunday at Wyandotte Lake and Park in Kansas City, Kan.

The only Wildcat victory in the event came when the First Novice Eight beat Texas with a time of 8:20.3.

The victory was nothing new for the Novice Eight team this year, as it has won all but one of its races this season.

The members who turned in a program best for a Novice Eight team are freshmen Amber Mulyck, Michael Knoll, Kate Priest Whitney Revell, Carlee Parke and Julia Roque, and sophomores Jayme File and Michelle Higgins, and junior Anna Wagner.

Higgins said she looks forward to ending the season on a good note.

"It was an amazing feeling to beat KU again," Higgins said. "To beat Texas was an amazing feeling as well. The girls in the boat are really good this season. I'm looking forward to working out this week and competing in Tennessee."

Head coach Patrick Sweeney said he is proud of the way his Novice Eight team has performed this season.

"We keep on slowing them (Novices) down, and they keep on going faster," Sweeney said in a press release. "We are moving the Novices up (to the Varsity level) all the time, and to compete with a different crew and get the same results – it's fun to see them be so successful."

Texas, who has not lost a Big 12 Rowing Invitational since 2000, won its fifth-straight by a combined total of 56 points.

K-State and Kansas both finished with 44 points.

Two of K-State's teams tallied program-best times in races this weekend. The Second Varsity Eight finished with a time of 8:25.4 seconds, and the Varsity Four notched a time of 9:20.8 seconds.

K-State will finish the season at the Central NCAA Regional Championships on May 13 and 14 in Oak Ridge, Tenn.

Jeromey Clary, one of the most durable offensive lineman during the Bill Snyder era at K-State, was selected in the sixth round of the 2006 NFL Draft on Sunday by the San Diego Chargers.

Clary

The two-time second team All-Big 12 Conference performer and three-time Academic All-Big 12 honoree was the 18th player taken in the sixth round and the 187th player selected overall in the draft.

Clary is the third K-State player to be picked by the Chargers in the last five drafts and will join record-setting Wildcat running back Darren Sproles in San Diego.

Sproles was a fourth-round selection of the Chargers in the 2005 NFL Draft.

BKC | Wooldridge's recruit signs with Mississippi

Kenny Williams, a post from St. Petersburg Community College who committed to K-State for the 2005-06 basketball season while Jim Wooldridge was still coach, signed with Mississippi Thursday.

Williams

The 6-foot-8, 240-pounder from Miami will attend Ole Miss beginning in the 2006-07 academic year as a junior.

NFL | McNair could be released or traded soon

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Steve McNair's tenure with the Tennessee Titans could be over within the next 24 hours.

McNair

His agent, Bus Cook, said Sunday the team is considering releasing McNair or possibly trading him to the Baltimore Ravens.

The Titans drafted Texas quarterback Vince Young with the No. 3 overall pick Saturday as McNair's successor, and they already were looking for a way to reduce or shed the $23.46 million salary cap number for which the co-MVP of 2003 is scheduled to count in 2006.

Asked if that meant a release or trade, Cook said he didn't know and didn't care as long as the move puts the 11-year veteran into a good position as a starting quarterback.

Titans coach Jeff Fisher said he couldn't confirm nor deny the report of a potential release or trade.

Performing at their first show in six months, Grazgrove's Chad Brothers, vocalist and guitar player, and Greg Herrenbruck, bass player, play at Pat's Blue Rib'n Barbeque in Aggieville. Grazgrove is a jam band that played alternative rock-'n'-roll music. During its show on Saturday, Grazgrove played original, collectively written songs.

Band uses hiatus to write music, refine sound

By Mark Sibilla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After a six-month hiatus, Grazgrove returned to the stage Saturday with a show at Pat's Blue Rib'n Barbeque, 1200 Moro St.

The members of Grazgrove met in the residence halls during their first year in college, said Chad Brothers, guitarist and vocalist for the band. The friends learned they had a talent for music and began jamming together, Brothers said.

Grazgrove officially formed three years ago and performed its first show at Pat's in March 2003, Brothers said.

In addition to Brothers, Grazgrove consists of Greg "Dorf" Herrenbruck, bass and vocals; Grady Keller, rhythm guitar and vocals; Nick Grebel, drums; and the newest member, Grant Haun, keyboards.

Brothers said Grazgrove is influenced by all types of music but especially by bands and artists from the Grateful Dead era.

"I come from a heavy roots-rock background," he said. "We share a common appreciation for a lot of the same bands, but we all bring different influences to the band and our performances. We don't want to be pigeonholed as a 'jam band.'"

Grazgrove's live performances consist of spontaneous improvisational jams that, according to the band's My Space Web site, "will carry you into next week. No boundaries, no expectations – just pure rock and roll. Grazgrove will bend your mind a little to the left."

Haun said he had his first experience with alternative music when he attended a Phish concert in 2000.

From that point forward, Haun said he attended as many shows as possible, especially those of bands like String Cheese Incident, moe. and Widespread Panic.

It was at these shows where Haun said he became interested in playing the keyboard.

"I was very drawn to (the keyboards)," Haun said.

In 2002, Haun said he bought a keyboard even though he didn't know how to play it. He began playing around with it and eventually began jamming with Grazgrove. It was then that he became a permanent member of the band, Haun said.

Six months ago, Grazgrove decided to go on hiatus from performing in order to have time for their personal lives, Haun said.

During this break, the band took excursions to a cabin in St. Louis, Mo., to write new material and refine its sound.

"I feel we are in a good place right now," Haun said. "I'm proud of the new material that we have; we're exactly where I want to be."

Cole Freeman, Manhattan resident, first saw Grazgrove two years ago at O'Malley's Alley, 1210 Moro St. Freeman said when he heard that Grazgrove was performing again, he wanted to check it out.

"They were hot when I heard them two years ago, and they were just starting out," Freeman said. "They were really great; they threw down. They can certainly jam with the best of them."

The band will perform a run of shows in Lawrence and Kansas City, Mo., and will host a camping extravaganza, Brothers said.

To find out more about Grazgrove, go to www.grazgrove.com or www.myspace.com/grazgrove.

Grady Keller, guitar player and vocalist, plays in Manhattan, one of the three cities in which Grazgrove plays. It also performed in Lawrence, but primarily played in the Kansas City area.

Symphony band's benefit concert supports Fiji trip

By Kelsey Childress
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

To help with the expenses required to send the K-State Symphony Band on a tour of Fiji, a group of three students decided to raise money by organizing a benefit concert.

The concert took place Saturday night at P.J.'s Bar.

The idea started first as a battle format and evolved into a concert.

"The idea for the Symphony Band benefit show started as the idea of Wendy Crawford, Jamie Rodgers and Aaron Graverson. All three are members of the KSU Symphony Band," said Jeff Brown, junior in music education and member of Ruckus, a band that performed at the benefit.

"The Symphony Band is traveling this spring on a tour of the South Pacific, and Wendy and Jamie had the idea of organizing a 'battle of the bands' to raise money for extraneous expenses on the trip," he said.

There were six punk/ska bands that performed, including Ruskabank, a popular ska band that formed in Manhattan.

The U.N.I.T., performed its final show at the con.

The cost to enter was $5 and several students came to support the Symphony Band.

"I'm part of KSU bands, so I wanted to support the trip to Fiji," Jenni Eastman, junior in finance, said. "P.J.'s is giving all the proceeds to the Symphony Band, and the turnout has been really good so far."

In addition to Manhattan bands there were a couple of bands that came from other cities to play at the concert, including The New Foes and Beans & Cornbread, both from Topeka.

Students chose the benefit concert format because they liked the idea of being able to choose which bands were going to play at the event, Brown said.

A battle of the bands format usually does not dictate what bands play in the event.

The event was organized almost entirely by students who reserved the bands and used various publicity tactics to promote the event, Brown said.

"(We worked) putting up fliers, chalking and promoting the show on 91.9," he said.

This was the first year the Symphony Band has done any kind of benefit concert to help pay for extra expenses on tours or trips.

"I came to listen to Ruckus because I have a couple of close friends in that band," Bryan Ross, senior in agronomy, said. "I saw a lot of signs and flyers promoting the concert, along with hearing about it from my friends in the band."

Overall, concert-goers said the concert event was a success.

P.J.'s is a popular spot for local music, so it seemed a fitting venue for a concert to fund the K-State band, Ross said.

"I (like that I am) supporting the KSU bands," Ross said. "(This) was definitely a good idea."

Reports conflict about Richards accident

Keith Richards fans gathered outside a hospital Sunday where the Rolling Stones guitarist was believed to be undergoing treatment for a mild concussion reportedly suffered when he fell out of a palm tree on vacation in Fiji.

One newspaper also reported that Richards, 62, got on a Jet Ski after the fall and had another accident. Several Australian and New Zealand media outlets reported the fall from the tree.

Band spokeswoman Fran Curtis said only that Richards was injured earlier this week and flown to New Zealand with his wife, Patti, for observation.

New Zealand's Sunday Star-Times provided no details on the Jet Ski crash, but quoted Dr. Uzzel Kanti Dhar as saying that Richards was admitted to Suva Private Hospital spokesman hospital in the Fijian capital on Thursday, the same day he is said to have fallen from the tree.

Jazz Fest revives the New Orleans area

Opening weekend of the New Orleans Jazz & Heritage Festival drew thousands of fans as superstar acts and local musicians supported and celebrated the city and its music scene.

Springsteen

Bruce Springsteen headlined Sunday's performances, his first appearance at the festival.

Though New Orleans is known as the birthplace of jazz and closely identified with a multitude of genres, including zydeco, blues and rap, its status and a premier music city took a huge hit last year as its musicians scattered in Hurricane Katrina's wake, and some clubs where music played nightly went dark.

So having two weekends of the massive Jazz Fest, now in its 26th year, was critical to helping restore the city's once vibrant music life.

And many of its homegrown stars and superstars like The Dave Matthews Band, Bob Dylan and Springsteen returned to Jazz Fest to help.

Local authors discuss inspirations for ghost stories

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Three authors of "Trespassing Time: Ghost Stories from the Prairie" read excerpts from the book and discussed their literary inspirations at the Manhattan Library Association annual meeting Sunday.

About 30 people were present to hear Jerri Garretson, Sheri McGathy and Linda Madl discuss the collection of 16 fictional ghost stories published in 2005.

Barbara Baldwin, the fourth contributing author, was not able to attend the event.

"The stories in 'Trespassing Time' have been called a delightful read, spooky, spine-chilling and even terrifying. We hope you'll relax and find the reading today enjoyable," Madl said. "Well, maybe don't relax too much, because you never know when the spirits of our world decide to make themselves known."

Among the excerpts Madl discussed were from her stories "Halloween at the Gates of Hell," partially inspired by the legend that Stull, Kan., is one of the seven gates to hell, and "One Night at Whistling Woman Creek," which McGathy called one of the scariest in the book.

Rather than focusing on haunting by the spirits of deceased human beings, this particular tale deals with a spirit of a different nature, Madl said.

"When I was about 10, I saw a pretty hokey production of 'The Windigo,' and it just intrigued me immensely and scared me a lot," Madl said. "I was very intrigued with the idea of a spirit of the forest who claims people who go into the forest alone, and I always wondered why there couldn't be such a spirit of nature in the prairie, so that's what I wrote about."

McGathy, who has published three fantasy novels and several novellas in addition to "Trespassing Time," said she made the transition from fantasy to ghost stories by implementing common themes.

"I tend to use a lot of the legend and myth and lore in my fantasy works so I decided I needed to blend those elements into the first ghost story I've ever written," McGathy said.

Garretson, author of children's books and young adult fiction books, published her first piece of adult fiction in "Trespassing Time," according to RavenstonePress.com.

Even though the book is a collection of ghost stories, they are not all frightening, said Garretson, also a reference generalist at Hale Library.

"One is very humorous and some are sweet. Not all ghosts are scary creatures and there are people who live quite happily with them," Garretson said.

NEWSPAPERS | Collegian to seek investigation

The total loss for the Collegian was estimated at $6,427.

The Collegian publishes 11,500 papers Monday through Thursday and 11,000 papers on Friday.

"I see it as a direct front to everything that the K-State community believes in," Bosco said. "I consider it a theft, vandalism, and it should not be tolerated under any circumstances."

The Collegian filed a formal report with the K-State Police, but Quick said because the newspapers are free, no charges could be filed.

However, Adam Goldstein, attorney with the Student Press Law Center, said that is not true.

"Legally, just because they're given away free does not mean this is not a theft," Goldstein said. "The paper's value and the amount you charge for that paper are totally unrelated. There have been many successful prosecutions that have involved the theft of free college papers being determined a crime."

The Collegian will seek an official investigation into the matter.

Ronnie Grice, director of the Campus Police, was not available for comment Sunday night.

HEALTH | County to receive 4,000 vaccinations

Murphy said the grant received by Riley County for pandemic influenza was $16,000.

The money will go toward equipment, training and staff resources, Murphy said.

"It's very much in the early part of this grant," Murphy said.

Bird flu is difficult to diagnose due to its similarity to other types of the flu, Murphy said.

Manhattan has four respirators, and in the case of a flu epidemic, that isn't enough, Murphy said.

"We're very limited in respirators – very, very limited," he said.

Riley County's plan includes surveillance, an annual flu shot, the creation of priority groups to receive the limited number of bird flu vaccinations, security for the vaccinations, a contact list for staff and media relations.

The priority list of those eligible for vaccinations begins with hospital and health department staff and ends with the general public.

However, there are not enough vaccinations for everyone, and the general public is not likely to receive the vaccinations, Fagin said.

Riley County is eligible to receive 4,218 doses out of the 20 million available.

"It's not going to stretch to this group," Fagin said.

BASEBALL | Hill: Team needs to play well on road

Cowart (5-5) took the loss, despite giving up just five hits and retiring the final 16 men he faced.

"I had better control today. I was able to hit some spots," Cowart said. "They just got one more run than us."

In the first game of the doubleheader, Oklahoma State edged the Wildcats in another one-run battle. Corey Brown's two-run double in the fifth was the difference as the Cowboys won 3-2.

K-State jumped out to a 1-0 lead on sophomore Cris Tapia's RBI groundout in the first inning.

Mach tied the game in the fourth inning with a solo homerun against sophomore Brad Hutt. Byron Wiley's sacrifice fly gave K-State a 2-1 lead before Brown put the Cowboys up for good in the fifth.

Hutt (5-3) gave up all three runs and took the loss for K-State.

With the series sweep by Oklahoma State, K-State fell to 4-13-1 in Big 12 Conference play. The Wildcats are chasing Texas Tech (6-13-1) for the final spot in the Big 12 Tournament field.

Hill said his team will keep fighting despite the lack of recent success.

"It's not going to be easy to bounce back. We need some key guys on the team to step up and try to stay positive," Hill said. "We've got a little 12-game season left to play. We're going to have to play great on the road."

SPRING FEST | Weather pushes bands inside

Daniel Tosh, a comedian who has had several specials on Comedy Central, also performed during the festival in the Forum Hall. The hall was roughly half-full, and Tosh made the show personal by walking off the stage and interacting with several audience members, especially people who came in late.

"It was awesome how he moved through the audience," Andrew Flournoy, sophomore in mechanical engineering, said. "He was going to do duck, duck, goose, but when he got to me, he just rubbed his hand all over my face and said, 'Sup.'"

The performances were intended for mature audiences and some of the jokes bordered on political incorrectness, Flournoy said.

"They were really racy and definitely pushed the edge," Flournoy said.

Although there was plenty of talent, the crowd was small, students said.

"I'm having fun, but there aren't a whole lot of people here," Peck said.

UPC members said the event is intended to celebrate the coming of spring and sunny weather, but on Friday, the weather was far from sunny.

"It didn't go as well as we had hoped because of the weather," said Meghan Newman, junior in English and UPC member. "Normally we have the bands outside, and this helps to bring a lot of people in."

Newman said the UPC staff also lost some help, which made advertising for the event difficult.

"Our advertising didn't get out quick enough, and we lost some manpower," Newman said "I wish more people would have come, because we really did have some amazing talent."

The event takes a lot of preparation to orchestrate, said Mike Katz, senior in psychology and UPC member.

"We have been working on the event since last year," Katz said. "It's an annual event, so we encourage people to come out and enjoy it every year."

Powercat creator

After gaining popularity, K-State symbol brings revenue, recognition

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Tom Bookwalter came to K-State from the University of Iowa a few months after former K-State football coach Bill Snyder and was asked to design the logo now known as the Powercat. Bookwalter said he made 10 to 12 original designs before the two decided on the one used today.

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

No, Bill Snyder does not own the Powercat.

The famous logo of a striped, purple beast with its jaws agape is the de facto symbol of K-State.

While Snyder can be credited for the turnaround of K-State football since his arrival in the late 1980s, the rumors of him owning the rights to the Powercat are false. The true owner is Tom Bookwalter, an instructor at K-State's art department.

Bookwalter moved here after working at the University of Iowa where he had done work for head football coach Hayden Fry, for whom Snyder was the offensive coordinator.

Bookwalter said Snyder asked for a logo to go with the new uniforms they were getting for the 1988 season, something "aggressive and contemporary." After several different designs he came up with what would become known as the Powercat, he said.

Fans did not take to the new mark quickly, said John Fairman, former K-State director of licensing.

"About nine out of every 10 people you met hated it," Fairman said. "And he got his first winning season and everybody loved it ... It became our 'Nike Swoosh.'" Bookwalter and Fairman said they hear the rumor of Snyder owning the Powercat frequently.

"I heard a rumor one time that Sharon Snyder designed it and I laughed myself silly," Bookwalter said.

Fairman said he believed the rumor started when K-State played in the 1995 Holiday Bowl. He said an L.A. Times columnist said Snyder wouldn't leave K-State for UCLA – which some had alleged possible – because he owned the Powercat.

"I guarantee you, I will take a lie detector test, whatever," Fairman said. "All the time here, not one penny from the royalties has gone to Coach Snyder."

The Powercat will remain Bookwalter's property until 70 years after his death. He said he assigned the copyright to K-State, and is paid about 7 percent of all money K-State gets from its use.

Fairman was K-State's first director of licensing. He said he started as an administrator in institutional advancement but was told six months into the job he was in charge of licensing.

"I didn't know if that was for rabbit season, pheasants or what," Fairman said, jokingly.

That was in 1987, he said, and that first year brought in about $10,000 mostly from local shops that used K-State logos for products.

It took four years to break $100,000, Fairman said. In his final year before retiring in 2005, he said there was more than $900,000 in revenue from licensing.

All of that money is used for athletic and academic scholarships, Fairman said.

The money comes from royalties earned in an agreement through the Collegiate Licensing Co. Ten members of the Big 12 Conference are its clients.

Collegiate Licensing sells the rights to companies to use the Powercat and other K-State-owned marks on products. The company follows all products bearing its clients' names and logos nationwide to make sure no one is selling such material unlicensed. Fairman said K-State could not afford to do that on its own.

For the use of its intellectual property, Collegiate Licensing pays K-State 8 percent of the wholesale price of all licensed products. For example, if a store buys a K-State shirt from a wholesaler for $10, K-State gets 80 cents.

K-State's logos sell products, but so do advertisements for games.

If an advertisement is seen anywhere in Snyder Family Stadium this fall, it was likely put there by Learfield Communications through K-State Sports Properties, general manager David Hubbard said.

Learfield took over marketing operations from the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics in April 2005. The contract has them paying the athletic department $30 million over the next 10 years as well as additional money if they reach certain levels of profit, Hubbard said.

Learfield represents half the Big 12 schools.

The athletic department used to handle the marketing itself and make a little over $2 million each year, said

See MARKETING Page 9

Scholarship spending

John Fairman, former K-State director of licensing, said money from university licensing is split depending on how much there is.

The decision to give more to athletic scholarships came because athletics generate so much of the licensing money, Fairman said. He said it got to the point there would be sudden spikes in licensing revenue whenever a team did well, such as whenever Snyder's Wildcats went to a bowl game.

"We felt that, given where it comes from, they deserve a little bigger share," Fairman said.

K-State took in $893,827.56 in licensing during 2004-05 school year

Project to add lanes begins

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The construction of a panel replacement south of Anderson Avenue and construction on the right turn lanes on Anderson and Kimball avenues will begin today.

City Engineer Rob Ott said the construction starting this week is the beginning of extensive construction projects scheduled for the summer.

The intersection of Jardine Drive and Denison Avenue will be completely closed by May 15 to add turn lanes and a new traffic signal to the area.

Construction will go up to Kerr Drive. The intersection's construction will be the first main project of the summer, and Ott said the area will be closed for seven weeks at the minimum.

"That's if we don't get rain, snow, ice or tornadoes," he said.

Ott said the construction is being concentrated during the summer to prevent excess traffic congestion during the school months.

Further construction will begin on Claflin Road and Denison Avenue later this summer after the intersection of Denison Avenue and Jardine Drive is complete.

Ott said most of the work will be completed through the summer, but construction will remain after students return for the fall and will continue to some extent through spring 2007, even during football season.

"It will obviously be a disruption for students and employees," Ott said. "When you weigh your factors of cost and time, it's just a balancing act. You can't satisfy everything 100 percent. You can't make it all happen in three months."

The city is trying to finish a main portion of construction during the summer before students return, Ott said.

"That's the intent – that the two major intersections are open before the students come back," he said.

Prince touts sports, families as keys to kids' success

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sports and close-knit communities help Kansas children grow up to be accepting individuals, K-State football coach Ron Prince said Monday evening.

Kansas' tumultuous history has influenced those who live here today, Prince said.

Beginning with the clash of abolitionists and slave owners on the Kansas-Missouri border known as Bloody Kansas, and continuing through pioneer men and women's shared efforts to settle the new frontier, Prince said that Kansans were among the most culturally inclusive people in the country.

"Take a lot of pride in who you are and where you're from," Prince said. "We may not have mountains in Kansas, but we have people, and people have always been Kansas's greatest export."

Prince said he grew up in a military family in Junction City, which allowed him to meet people from many different nationalities and backgrounds.

"My best friend's family was of Polish descent, and I didn't think anything of it... That neighborhood was so close, and the people in it were so tight. Now you all have the same opportunity during this current conflict."

Experience with other people and cultures is important in a globalized society, he said.

"We have a tendency in the Western World not to want to, or not to be able to, relate to other world cultures... To succeed, figure out how to problem solve and deal with these other cultures," he said.

Staff Sgt. Victor Icenhower, a member of the 450th Movement Control Battalion in Manhattan, said he had witnessed football's ability to unite people as a child in Florida.

"If I had not had the chance to play football, I would not have had the experience of getting used to playing with people of all different backgrounds," he said.

Linda Sallis, resident of Junction City and a K-State graduate, said she related to Prince's speech as a soldier's wife and military community member.

"It made me think of that saying 'It takes a village to raise a child,'" she said. "That's us. All of these cultures and backgrounds come together here. It's a mosaic – a symphony unto itself."

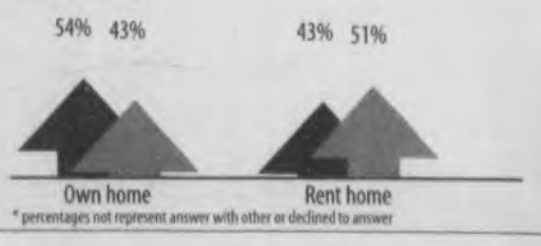
Finance debate delayed

TOPEKA — House members delayed their debate Monday on school finance after discovering numerous drafting problems with the $401 million bill. Instead, Speaker Doug Mays, R-Topeka, said the chamber will debate the three-year deal Tuesday, hoping to send the bill to the Senate and begin negotiations on a compromise.

Programs deteriorate

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The trustees for the government's two biggest benefit programs said Monday that the trust fund for Social Security will be depleted in 2040, a year earlier than expected, while Medicare will exhaust its trust fund in 12 years. The annual report showed deterioration in the financial condition of both programs.



Soldiers occupy gas fields

LA PAZ, Bolivia — President Evo Morales ordered soldiers to occupy Bolivia's natural gas fields Monday and threatened to evict foreign companies unless they give Bolivia control over the entire chain of production. Morales sent soldiers and engineers with Bolivia's state-owned oil company to installations and fields tapped by foreign companies.

Q: What is your duty position?
A: I am a squad leader in an infantry platoon.

Q: What is your job here?
A: Right now I am the lead gun truck commander. Basically, we go out and try to find some bad guys.

Q: What did you think about when you found out your unit was being deployed to Iraq?
A: I was worried about my wife. I didn't really know how she would handle me being gone, but she has been awesome.

Q: Besides your family, what do you miss the most from back home and why?
A: Privacy. I live in a room with eight other dudes. It can definitely get on your nerves after awhile.

Q: How is your family coping with you being deployed?
A: My wife is a little stressed out, but she is doing pretty well considering what is going on over here. My parents are worried about me, but I don't really get to see them much anyway, so it is not a huge deal.

Research specialist's years at K-State are part of the job

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The sign on Pat Patton's desk says it all. "Don't touch anything! I like my room this way!" The walls are covered with framed historical photographs and large stacks of paper stand like sentries by Patton's desktop computer. It's not messy or, just well-used.

Patton is a research specialist for K-State's University Archives. Her formal education finished when she graduated high school, but her knowledge of the school comes from decades of working other jobs here and her enthusiasm for the university.

Tony Crawford, university archivist, said he joked during Patton's interview that she'd need to start quickly because his wife was going to give birth to their first son.

"That's why I've always known how long Pat's worked in the archives," Crawford said, "because my son's 17, going on 18."

Patton assists researchers, students and faculty with the help of several student employees daily in getting hard-to-find information and other items from the archives. She helped K-State's new head football coach, Ron Prince, pick out old photographs of K-State football from the archives to put in his office.

Working in the archives has helped Patton learn about the university's history, but there are many parts of the school's past she has experienced firsthand.

Patton met both Sen. Robert F. Kennedy and Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. in 1968 while she was helping manage their separate lectures at K-State. Both men were assassinated before the end of the year; she described their deaths as "devastating."

"Martin Luther King was everything people had said of him," Patton said. "He was the kindest, the gentlest man."

Kennedy made a lasting impression on her as well, but in a different way.

"Here is this family that are icons in the country, considered American royalty," she said. "And I'm looking at Robert Kennedy thinking 'he has dandruff. That's awful.'"

Born in 1941 in Jefferson City, Mo., Patton first came to K-State in 1965. Her name was Pat Favrow then. She was married to Bill Favrow, then an assistant track coach for the university. They had two sons, Jim and Jon.

They lived in Jardine Apartments for the first year, but lost their home when the apartments were severely damaged by a tornado in 1966. Patton said she remembered her sons' bicycles having a mid-air encounter with decorations from a neighbor's home during the storm.

"All they found were the front wheels and handlebars, and the neighbor's artificial flowers were woven into the spokes," she said.

The family stayed in another apartment until the head football coach at the time, Vince Gibson, asked Patton's ex-husband to take over as director of the university's athletic dormitory. It would be home to about 180 of the school's athletes, most of them on scholarship. Patton said he accepted, and the family moved into what is now Edwards Hall in 1967, the year it was completed.

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN
Pat Patton, research specialist for K-State's University Archives, looks through a cabinet drawer of filed documents in the University Archives in Hale Library on Wednesday afternoon.

Patton said living in the athletic dorms was good for her sons. She said they learned better manners from the athletes, as well as how to play sports well because the athletes refused to go easy on them while playing football or other sports.

However, there was some trouble when Jon, the younger son, got a little too good at playing pool. Patton said a group of athletes would make money by placing bets on the boy as he played against other students who bet they could beat him. She said she put an end to the practice as soon as she learned of it.

Patton said the dormitory was rented out during the summer to visiting groups when the athletes returned home. She said once, when a group of nuns who wore regular street clothes visited, a football player had fun by picking one of them up and carrying her over to the dormitory's swimming pool.

"As he got to the edge of the pool, she said 'I have to tell you, I'm a nun,'" Patton said. "He didn't miss a beat. He just looked at her and said 'That's OK. I'm Catholic,' and threw her in."

They lived in the dorm for eight years, Patton said. She said her sons, now parents themselves, remember the experience fondly and each grandchild and great-grandchild is brought to K-State at about age five to have pictures taken at several university landmarks.

Her newest descendent is great-granddaughter Katrina, named so because her mother was in labor as the famed hurricane hit the Gulf Coast last year.

Patton said she divorced Bill Favrow in 1980. She married Larry Patton later that year. He was a rancher and worked in K-State's agronomy department for several years before his recent retirement.

Her husband isn't fully retired, though. He stands guard over the crosswalk at a local Catholic grade school each weekday morning and afternoon.

Patton said one girl calls Larry "Hubert" because it's the girl's favorite name.

Larry said he has two children from a previous marriage and added that his oldest grandson is a junior at the University of Kansas, something he doesn't exactly support.

"I still send him K-State stuff," Larry said. "I don't know if he wears it, though."

As for Patton's desk, it's looking to see a bit of change. She said the stacks of research and other items have to go soon because she's going to be meeting with representatives of a historical fraternity that is planning to have a conference at Hale Library.

"I told our students, 'We're not about to let these people see my office like this,'" she said.

Day Without Immigrants passes quietly in Manhattan

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The controversy surrounding House Resolution 4437 might have spawned rallies and walkouts around the nation Monday, but all was quiet in Manhattan.

Dubbed the "Day Without Immigrants," the national movement encouraged immigrants and their supporters to stay home from work and school, in addition to a one-day spending boycott.

Barring a spending boycott, much appeared to be business as usual in Manhattan and on the K-State campus.

Mirta Chavez, director of diversity and dual career development, said some students planned on attending a rally in Topeka Monday evening, but no local events were planned.

Chavez, who helped organize the April 11 rally at the Bosco Student Plaza, said even though a local response was not coordinated, the response nationally and internationally was not unexpected.

"I'm not surprised that people have come forward in support of immigrant issues," she said.

The issue of immigration has become a hot button in American politics in the last few weeks, and Chavez said much of the protest comes from HR-4437, the House of Representatives' response to the immigration controversy.

The bill would increase greatly the punishment for being in the country illegally and has been criticized for being overly harsh and unrealistic.

The bill also is supported by many.

Michelle Schroeder, communications director for Rep. Jim Ryun, R-Kan., said in the last week, Ryun's office has received close to 100 phone calls about the bill, all but one in support.

Schroeder said Ryun, who co-sponsored the measure, is waiting for the Senate proposal on illegal immigration but has not changed his position.

"I think that he's been consistent and wants to try to get something passed," she said.

Third-year architecture student and president of Sigma Lambda Beta Clemente Herrera is one of the students who attended a rally in Topeka on Monday.

Herrera said the United States must address the fact that population dynamics are changing across the country.

Herrera's mother and sister, still in his hometown of Garden City, Kan., had planned to stay at home today as part of the rally, he said.

More than a million protesters were expected in Los Angeles and protests in Chicago numbered more than 300,000, according to Reuters News Agency.

"I'm pleased most of all because of the fact that people are standing up for what they believe," Herrera said.

TO THE POINT

Needs of pets, owner should have a balance

Getting a pet in college can be a huge responsibility. On top of the initial cost, students inevitably must find a way to afford food, treats and toys for their pets.

The money situation can only get worse if their loved pets get sick and require medical treatment. With the high cost of drugs and surgeries, this can end up being too much for a college budget.

The idea of getting insurance for your pet may sound a bit ridiculous , but it can be cost-effective.

Many students develop a love for their pets that surpasses the feelings for other animals. Pets become members of the family.

Insurance can cover unforeseen costs.

As hard as it might be, it's also important to remember that your health is still more important then your pet's.

If you can't afford the insurance, and your pet gets sick, there's not much that can be done for it. The best solution in this case may be to put it down humanely.

College students cannot always afford these unexpected costs. This is why students should consider carefully whether to get a pet in the first place.

Sure, pets can be great companions and be there for you when no one else chooses to be.

However, students shouldn't let their excitement at the prospect of a new pet make them forget about their financial responsibility.

Travel often

Americans should explore the world's offerings

JONAS HOGG

Escaping the great American factory every few years is an incurable habit of mine.

I am told that being anywhere else but here is something of a downgrade, though forgotten German ruins and abandoned Mexican beaches have never seemed particularly offensive to my American sensibilities.

Most Americans, it seems, make horrible travelers but extraordinary tourists. It is the Eiffel Tower they want, France is simply extra.

Shooting out of the mouth of the western monster into some strange unknown is bizarre perhaps.

Why would anyone do such a thing? Do they speak English, have McDonald's, country music or enough laws to appropriately regulate the weather and the movement of caterpillars?

Probably not.

As summer oozes into motion, why then, do the youthful languish in fetid bars and in front of the idiot box? Is there no statute of limitations to the amount of "Desperate Sex in the Will" one can watch in a day?

If there is a reason the denizens of the world's richest nation do not travel, it is not known to me. The rest of the world crawls with the curious. You can't spit in Mexico without hitting a German, Swede or Dutchman – they live meagerly, stay in hostels, eat little and are generally agreeable people. If the world is dangerous, no one has bothered to inform them.

Much of the resistance I encounter is from those who feel that outside sovereign U.S. borders lies godless anarchy. Americans, perhaps, have been told too often that the world is dangerous.

This is stupidity of the richest sort.

Away from the tourist areas, Mexico seemed a lovely place. I found myself and my companion unstabbed, unshot, unmugged and generally an object of friendly curiosity.

My total lack of Spanish informed me that the town's burning question seemed to be, "What are two gringos doing away from the resorts?"

Similarly, wandering about Kuwait City produced excitement and curiosity. Smack dab in the middle of Arabia and not a terrorist act to be found, men waved, women smiled in hijabs.

The rude Germans would not rest until I had eaten myself silly. Venezuelans without much to share, shared it anyway.

Again, if the rest of the world is such a wretched place, it seems no one has bothered to tell the rest of the world to behave accordingly.

Folks, it seems, are just folks.

Of course, if we desired to see the world we would do so. The Internet is full of summer volunteer opportunities, internships, English-teaching and other travel opportunities. Such things are generally not in the nicest of places – it could be almost a whole city block to the closest TV, hence their unpopularity in the age of the luxurious man.

Nevertheless, they exist and are seized by many.

As Americans who have traveled return, we hear that the rest of the world is not so god-awful as we have been told. At least the mouth-breathers are kept from raiding the newspaper stands.

Getting up and out of the American salt mine for a month may be intimidating, but worthwhile. Abandoning the tourist traps in favor of the small town is not only fun but educational. "Yes," you can say, "there is more to Mexico than Corona."

Leave, go somewhere new, learn a new language, teach someone yours.

Seedy bars are common throughout the world – why rot in one here when Brazil is so colorful?

Jonas Hogg thinks the campus police need to investigate the multi-thousand dollar loss of Friday's Collegians. Please send your comments to opinion@spub.ksu.edu.

Tradition of changing name unfair to women

JACI BOYDSTON

More than 400 years ago, Shakespeare gave us the immortal question, "What's in a name?"

We finally have an answer.

Last Friday, CNN released the results of a poll that asked respondents their opinions of two politicians: Hillary Clinton and Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Although democrats' feelings toward the New York senator didn't change significantly with the inclusion of her maiden name, there were pretty big differences among other citizens.

For example, 23 percent of republicans polled had positive feelings toward Hillary Rodham Clinton, but only 16 percent approved of Hillary Clinton. Independents also were more likely to approve of Clinton when using her maiden name, and the trend was reversed in the South, where people liked the senator better without the Rodham.

It blows the mind how one little name can have such a big effect on the public perception of a woman, and it's unfortunate that female politicians must worry about this, while no man ever would.

This phenomenon brings up the question of why women are still expected to assume their husbands' names upon marriage. This archaic tradition serves no purpose in modern society, as women have full legal rights and are allowed to stand on their own two feet without men to support them.

In previous generations, when women married young and were expected to be mothers and wives first and anything else second, this practice made complete sense.

Jane Smith was best known as John Smith's wife, so why wouldn't she go by Mrs. Smith?

However, that is less and less often the case. More women are putting education and career ahead of marriage and family, and this often means they delay marriage until later in life.

If a woman embarks on a successful career in her 20s and then gets married in her 30s, why should she have to give up the name she has made for herself to go by a new one? Famous actresses never do this; why should successful businesswomen or politicians?

One criticism often made against women who keep their maiden names is that it's somehow harmful to children when their parents have different last names. Some claim it causes kids to be teased. However, if you polled children in this situation compared with children whose last names can be easily rhymed with "butt," "poop" or "fart," I'm confident the first group of kids would be happier with their circumstances.

If we do move away from the practice of women changing their names upon marriage, however, a new problem will crop up – whose name should the children take?

Hyphenation seems like a good compromise, but it will soon become impractical when hyphenated kids start marrying and having kids with 16 last names.

Plenty of other solutions exist.

Couples could name all male children after the father and all females after the mother; they could alternate, giving the first child one name and the second child the other; or they could simply flip for it after the baby is born. And, under dire circumstances (such as when Jim Butt impregnates Sally Poop), they could find an entirely new, tease-proof name for their children.

Regardless of how children are named, women should have the same advantages as men when it comes to names. Everyone is given a name at birth, and no one should feel pressured to give it up.

City to consider store assistance

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission will meet at 7 tonight to discuss the economic development assistance for GTM Sportswear, 520 McCall Road.

City Commissioner Mark Hatesohl said the city is trying to help hometown businesses and is trying to determine an economic development incentive package for GTM Sportswear.

The package might include low-interest loans, tax reduction on equipment and the issue of Industrial Revenue Bonds.

"Anytime the government starts helping provide a business with assistance, people don't like that," he said. "The good thing about it is that GTM is providing jobs and jobs with good wages."

Dave Dreiling, owner of GTM Sportswear, said the store has promised to create 500 new jobs during the next 10 years, adding to its present 240 employees.

Dreiling said assistance for the store would come from a waive of property tax in some form from Manhattan, Pottawatomie County and the state of Kansas.

About $2.4 million in property taxes would be waived for the store, but Dreiling said Manhattan also would gain about $1 million in additional taxes paid by new store employees.

The store does a lot of business outside the state, and Dreiling said he thought that was something city officials should keep in mind.

"We're bringing dollars into Manhattan," he said. "We're not just trading dollars locally."

City Commissioner Tom Phillips said the city is looking to help the business expansion, but the commission will need to discuss what influence new employees will have in the area.

"I think there's going to be a fair amount of discussion about this item," he said. "There needs to be a clear demonstration about the benefit to the community."

The commission also will be discussing rules, regulations and rental fees for the Union Pacific Depot, Philips said.

Another issue the commission will address is the reading of ordinances annexing and rezoning the proposed Stone Pointe addition, located on Scenic Drive.

Philips said annexing the Stone Pointe addition comes with some history after the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board make an initial recommendation of denial for the area.

Philips said work has been done in the process, but he and the other commissioners will want to hear what previous concerns have been for the area and what is being intended for the future.

"I'm anxious to hear both sides of this discussion," he said.

A request for water and sanitary sewer service for the area also will be discussed in the meeting.

Hatesohl said the country areas need to have a decent sanitary sewer service, and annexing the area possibly would get the water and sewer service needs addressed.

Other items on the commission agenda:

- Rules, regulations and rental fees for the Union Pacific Depot
- An interlocal agreement with Riley County regarding the county-wide sales tax
- Setting the date for a public hearing for the redevelopment plan for the North Project of Downtown Redevelopment
- Facility use policy
- A request from the Public Works Department for the purchase of two new trucks and two new inspectors to help with the oversight of local job construction.

Insurance for pets uncommon, helps owners with costs

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Pet insurance is becoming more popular as the costs of medical work increase, said Scott Beyer, associate professor of animal sciences and industry.

"Being insured could really pay off against a catastrophic thing happening to your pet," Beyer said.

Beyer teaches a course at K-State on small animals. He said 59 percent of the American population have small pets, which includes cats and dogs.

However, the numbers of pets insured in the United States is lower than those in other countries, according to an April 2006 report from MSNBC.

According to the report, in Europe, where the insurance has been available since the 1940s, about 25 percent of British pet owners have the coverage.

In America, less than 3-percent of pet owners carry insurance, where it has been available since the 1980s, according to the report.

From 1994 to 2003, expenditures for veterinary services rose 76 percent, the report said.

The rise might correlate with higher disposable incomes and the elevation of pets to family member status, along with longer animal life expectancies, according to the report.

Stephan Gardner, national sales supervisor for Pets Best pet insurance, said there are multiple types of companies and coverage for pet insurance.

"There are about five to 10 big players in the pet insurance game," Gardner said.

Pets Best pet insurance pays 80 percent of the vet bills and also has some pre-existing and hereditary limitations, Gardner said.

He said the lack of awareness is the biggest reason pet owners don't have insurance. The awareness is better in metropolitan areas and a lot less familiar to people in smaller demographic states.

Dr. John Lyons, veterinarian at Candlewood Veterinary Clinic, 3262 Kimball Ave., said about one out of 100 pets that come into his office have the insurance.

Lyons said it is difficult to get enough people on a pet insurance policy for the companies to continue offering policies in this area.

"Often insurance companies for pets are here for two or three years, and then they go bankrupt," Lyons said.

However, Lyons said the number of good pet insurance programs is starting to increase, and the idea is becoming more attractive.

Lyons said there are two main types of pet insurance, one being the medical insurance commonly used for small pets, and the other is a loss insurance, most commonly used for livestock.

A downside to the increase of pet insurance in veterinary offices is the additional amounts of paperwork that are involved with processing the insurance claims, Lyons said.

However, Lyons said an advantage of pet insurance is being able to practice medicine at the level needed and not having to worry about the owner's ability to pay.

"I'm anxious to see policies that I can recommend to clients," Lyons said.

TO THE EDITOR

Protests at soldiers' funerals is disrespectful

Editor,

There is a severe and somewhat overlooked problem here in Kansas and in United States, as well. The continuation of protestors being allowed to protest at the funerals of our fallen men and women soldiers is an utter tragedy.

The current congressional session is not looking at the issue as if it should be allowed or not. They are looking for ways to push protesting to further from funerals. Legislators should not look at the issue as a regular freedom of speech issue; military men and women give us all the rights that we enjoy today.

The fact that we allow this to continue is a total disrespect to servicemen and women. On an issue bound to make it to the Supreme Court, judges need to set a precedent that we are supporters of free speech; however, our support goes to men and women in uniform first.

This is a great way to increase the morale of our soldiers and the healing process of our families with lost sons and daughters. The true victims are the families of the soldiers, children who don't know what is happening, or why people are saying terrible things about their moms and dads, the spouses just wanting to pay their last respects in peace, and mothers and fathers having to deal with losing one of their children.

Holding up signs saying "Thank God for Dead Soldiers," should be a felony. It is such a level of disrespect I can't even put it into words. We must step up and take action. We can no longer allow this to occur. There must be a law passed banning this type this type of protesting all together. God bless our soldiers.

Concert holders should be considerate of others

Editor,

Saturday was not a good day. Sigma Nu had what they called "Sunset Revival" from noon until 10 p.m.

I guess the end justifies the means here at K-State and in Manhattan. The music was very loud all day. Luckily, I was gone until about 2 p.m., but had to endure it until at least 10 p.m.

Most of what I could hear was the bass, which made me a nervous wreck. The noise level was so high one could hear it for several blocks away. When one accepts the philosophy that the end justifies the means (in this case raising money for a charity, certainly a good thing, justifies intruding on people's lives in a very negative way), the door is thrust open to so much more.

At first I didn't know what was going on, so I called the police and was informed they had a permit to make the noise until 10:45 p.m. The dispatcher told me the city commission had approved it. Well, when I finally talked to (Mayor) Bruce Snead he said the commission had not directly approved it – apparently, permits are obtained through the city clerk's office, and unless he or she perceives a problem, it's more or less automatically issued.

The police did send an officer to the fraternity, but of course it didn't do any good. After 20 to 30 minutes I again called the police. The dispatcher said they wouldn't send another officer since the fraternity had permission. The dispatcher would not give me phone numbers of the city commissioners, nor would she give me any names. She claimed she didn't know who they were and didn't have a list. She did, however, give me the phone number of the city commission office. It was closed until Monday, but I called and left a message. Besides giving my opinion on the subject, I said that a permit should not have been issued.

I called the public library and got the names and phone numbers of two of the city commissioners – Snead and Ed Klimek – and proceeded to leave messages for each of them. Klimek hasn't called me back, but Snead called me in the evening. He explained the situation, apologized for its effect on me and was sorry I had to go through what I did. He was very friendly, empathetic and supportive.

All I had wanted to do was lie down for a while and listen to the radio, but all I could hear was the noise coming from the fraternity house. So after leaving messages for the two city commissioners, I walked up to the fraternity. I explained what I wanted, viz., to have the music turned down. Although the guy wasn't "blatantly" rude, he was condescending and somewhat obnoxious. He said I should join in the fun instead of staying home and complaining. Although I was very angry at the situation, I turned away and walked back to my apartment.

I feel the fraternity owes an apology not only to me, but to all residents within hearing distance of the noise they caused. Regardless, I will do everything in my power to prevent the event from taking place at the fraternity house next year, or at least come to a compromise acceptable to both sides.

Students don't capture homeless experience

Editor,

Upon reading the April 27 article, "12 students sleep in boxes to experience life of poverty," I cringed.

The fact that some of you actually think you can experience a life of poverty by sleeping outside one night during beautiful weather is illogical.

Having all the amenities of cell phones, free food and friends makes your project laughable.

Building castle shelters out of cardboard boxes and hanging out with your friends might be good time, but doing those things in the name of poverty-stricken people is offensive.

Athletes recognized for academic achievements

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State student athletes were honored for their classroom achievements at a ceremony Monday night at the K-State Alumni Center.

Director of athletics Tim Weiser said the goal of the ceremony was to recognize student athletes who successfully balance school and sports.

"We hear an awful lot in the media about what our athletes do competitively, but not nearly enough about what they do academically," Weiser said.

About 230 student athletes were eligible to attend the banquet. The ceremony recognized students with grade point averages of 3.0 or higher, either cumulatively or for the fall semester. Students could also be invited based on outstanding academic progress, said Phil Hughes, associate director of athletics for student athlete services.

Hughes said it is important to recognize student athletes for their achievements outside the sports arena.

"We are a society that embraces and celebrates winners," Hughes said. "In the world of the student athlete, it seems the athletic component gets all the accolades. It is extremely important for college student athletes to have recognition for their work in the classroom."

Several student athletes were selected for individual awards, including senior Jessica McFarland of the women's basketball team, senior Christian Smith of the track team and senior Dramane Diarra of the men's basketball team.

"Dramane Diarra has had multiple injuries," Hughes said. "He didn't really see the court until his third year. He has hung tough, fighting his way and winning."

The event was named for Mark Chapman, a K-State graduate and letter winner in football and track. Hughes said Chapman was honored because of his interest in K-State student athletes and his financial support of the ceremony.

"He selected this event as something he wanted to support because it recognizes students from all sports," Hughes said.

Summer Hamil, senior in family studies and human services and member of the K-State equestrian team, said the ceremony was a good way to honor student athletes.

"It always does feel good to be recognized for the hard work we do academically, as well as athletically," Hamil said.

BAS | Roundy named to Dick Howser Trophy list

K-State senior outfielder Joe Roundy is one of 64 players named to the 2006 Dick Howser Trophy Watch List, the National Collegiate Baseball Writers Association has announced.

Roundy

The Dick Howser Trophy, given in memory of the former Florida State University All-America shortstop and major league player and manager who died of brain cancer in 1987, is regarded by many as college baseball's most prestigious award. Criteria for consideration for the trophy include performance on the field, leadership, moral character and courage, qualities that were exemplified by Dick Howser's life.

Roundy has been among the Big 12's offensive leaders this season and has hit safely in 34 of the Wildcats' 41 games this season, which included a career-best and then-Big 12 season-long 16-game hitting streak. Roundy is currently among the Big 12's leaders in eight offensive categories and heads into the week as the league's No. 5 hitter with his .391 average.

NFL | Giants add George Mason's Lewis

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — The New York Giants said Monday they have agreed to terms with rookie free agent Jai Lewis, who has not played organized football since high school but who played forward on the George Mason University basketball team that reached the Final Four this spring.

Lewis

Lewis, who is listed at 6-foot-7, 275 pounds, is projected by NFL scouts as a defensive lineman or tight end.

He played defensive tackle, tight end and fullback in high school. At George Mason, he helped the Patriots reach the Final Four, where they lost 73-58 to Florida.

Lewis scored 20 points in George Mason's 86-84 upset win over Connecticut in the regional final.

Next year appears hopeful for Wildcats

MATTHEW GIRARD

Today is a day I thought would never come.

After three years of toiling away at the Kansas State Collegian as a sports columnist, my days as a regular columnist for the campus newspaper are done.

It's a bittersweet end for me. Although I'm ecstatic to finally graduate, after an eight-year process, I'm sad that I won't be around to see the great things to come from the K-State's Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

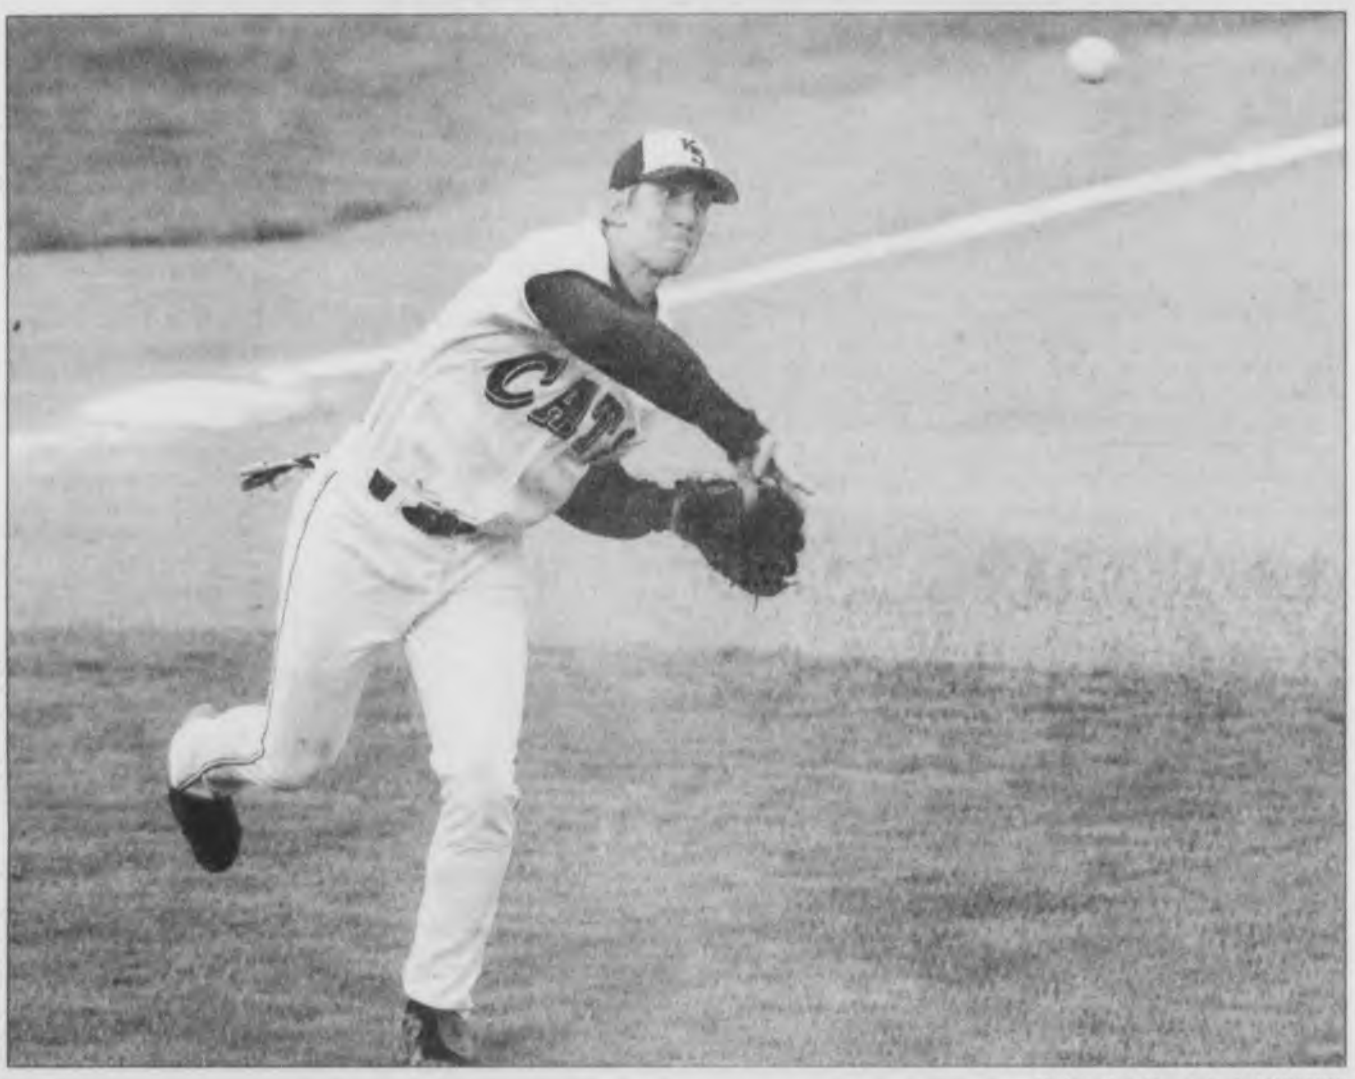
You see, in my time of writing, my opinions about football, men's basketball and baseball have not been good, to put it bluntly.

The football team went 9-13 over the last two years with no post-season bowl appearances, the men's basketball team didn't reach the 20-win plateau and didn't make an appearance in the NCAA Tournament, and the baseball team has yet to claw its way out of the Big 12 Conference cellar.

Obviously, not the best of times to be a sports columnist, and some might say I've been harsh over the past couple of years, but I always tried to say what I thought everyone else was thinking.

Thankfully though, the women's basketball team gave me the chance to be positive during my time here.

Needless to say, it's been a rough couple of years for the men's side of the athletics department, but because of the excitement of a new football coach, basketball coach and coach Brad Hill finally having his type of players in the system, I am leaving in high spirits.



K-State men's athletics is headed in the right direction, and I envy the next Collegian columnists for getting the chance to cover such an exciting time in K-State sports history.

When the football team makes its way back to national prominence, the basketball team is competing in the NCAA Tournament and the baseball team is playing in the College World Series – I'll be proud to say that I was here when it all began.

Whether you loved me or hated me, thanks for reading my columns and e-mailing me your thoughts. I will always cherish my time at the Collegian and the events I was able to be a part of – even the time when it took a few thousand Chickenhawks more than an hour to tear down a goal post.

Matthew Girard is graduating on May 13 and will be the new sports editor at the Jacksonville Daily Progress in Jacksonville, Texas. You can still e-mail him at sports@spub.ksu.edu, but there are no guarantees it will get forwarded to him.

Wildcats take on Coyotes in 1-game tilt before road trip

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Wildcats are looking to snap a four-game losing streak and finish up the non-conference home schedule against Kansas Wesleyan.

The Wildcats (24-16-1, 4-13-1 Big 12 Conference) are coming off a three-game sweep by Oklahoma State and will play in their last home game before embarking on an eight-game road trip against Oklahoma and Texas A&M.

The Coyotes (15-30, 6-16 Kansas Collegiate Athletic Conference) are 2-3 in their last five games and will play in their final regular season game before competing in the KCAC Tournament on Thursday.

Kansas Wesleyan is led by junior Andrew Gulla and senior A.J. Anthony. Gulla is hitting .370 with seven homeruns and 44 RBIs, while Anthony is hitting .343 with 24 RBIs.

Despite the hitting of Gulla and Anthony, the Coyotes are last in the KCAC in hitting, with a .298 batting average and have struggled on the mound with a 7.83 team ERA.

The Wildcats are led by seniors Barrett Rice and Joe Roundy. Rice is third in the conference in hitting with a .394 batting average and Roundy is fifth in hitting with a .391 batting average.

On Monday, Roundy was one of 64 players to be named to the 2006 Dick Howser Trophy list by the National Collegiate Baseball Writers Association. The award is given to the player who performs on the field, shows leadership, moral character and courage.

Roundy leads the Wildcats in multi-hit games (21) and multiple-RBI games (14).

K-State is fifth in the conference in hitting with a team batting average of .310 and are fifth in the league in pitching with a team ERA of 3.98.

Texas A&M sweeps K-State at Big 12 Tourney

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's tennis season now will be determined by a selection committee.

The Wildcats will have to wait until later this week for word on an at-large bid to the NCAA tournament.

The seventh-seeded Wildcats were eliminated from the quarterfinals of the Big 12 Tournament 4-0 by second-seeded Texas A&M on Friday in Waco, Texas.

K-State lost No. 1, 2 and 3 singles in straight sets.

"We were just plain outplayed at the top of our lineup," coach Steve Bietau said. "Texas A&M was just that much better."

The bottom half of the Wildcat rotation showed signs of life, but the No. 35 Aggies clinched the match when Texas A&M's Tiffany Clifford defeated freshman Katerina Kudlackova (6-3, 2-6, 6-4).

"They really put up a good fight," Bietau said. "Every one of them showed improvements over the last time they played Texas A&M."

The doubles matches were not played because weather forced singles to be played first.

K-State notched a 4-0 opening-round victory over Oklahoma on Thursday.

The Wildcats (11-10) have now finished with a winning record in five of their last eight seasons.

"I thought we made very good progress this season," Bietau said.

"We had a lot of potential last year, but we couldn't overcome injuries. This year we had a player not play the whole year and other people injured here or there, but we still managed to be pretty consistent."

Sophomore Fernanda Da Valle ended her year with a strong late-season push. Da Valle won her last three matches and was ahead a set in her match against Texas A&M before the competition ended.

"She's really taken off," Bietau said. "She improved because of a combination of things that she has been working really hard at."

Texas A&M's Anna Blagodarova defeated Simosa in straight sets (6-3, 6-1).

"Jessica meant a lot to our team in her career and especially this year," Bietau said. "I feel good about who we have coming back, but we will definitely miss her."

Springsteen makes his best album in years despite reputation of covers

"We Shall Overcome"
★★★★☆

Nothing kills a career (or makes critics and fans cringe) quite like a cover album. Often, cover albums are simply filler, quickly regurgitated by artists to appease record contract obligations, to conceal a stagnating creativity or as a cynical cash-grab to take the money from rabid fans who will buy anything from a certain artist.

Some of the worst offenders are "Thank You" by Duran Duran (a covers album which contains, among other horrors, an awful interpretation of Public Enemy's "911 is a Joke"), Joni Mitchell's self-indulgent albums where she re-recorded and re-released her own material and the various orchestral albums that turn great songs by great artists into insipid elevator music.

Imagine my trepidation before listening to the newest album by Bruce Springsteen, "We Shall Overcome: The Seeger Sessions;" the concept seems pretty horrifying.

Prominent musician (Springsteen) discovers old recordings (the song "We Shall Overcome") that were recorded in 1997 for a tribute album to the great folk singer Pete Seeger. Upon this discovery, the prominent artist decides to explore Seeger's catalogue and enlist a group of New York City musicians to play certain songs that Seeger had made famous.

The album was lovingly created by Springsteen and a group of nearly 20 musicians (including those who play banjo, accordion and a washboard) who bring a rollicking energy to each track. It gives each song the feel of a group of friends sitting on the porch in the summer heat jamming to their folk favorites.

The amazing aspect of "We Shall Overcome" is, before the day sessions where Springsteen and the musicians met, none of the band had ever played with Springsteen.

Even more amazing is the recording process itself. The album is a completely live recording cut in three one-day sessions with no prior rehearsal of the songs. As Springsteen says in the liner notes, "This approach takes the listener along for the whole ride, as you hear the music not just being played but being made."

The songs of "We Shall Overcome" are extremely topical, even though some are more than 100 years old.

Many songs contain characters torn by poverty, war and strife, but Springsteen always keeps the arrangements jubilant and rambunctious.

"Jesse James" – a traditional folk song about Robert Ford, the man who killed Jesse James by shooting him in the back – begins with Springsteen and his acoustic guitar before the bass and banjo enter. By the third verse, the song is off and running with horns, fiddle and back-up singers joyfully proclaiming Jesse James' legend.

The distinctly Irish song "Mrs. McGrath" is an anti-war protest song that never panders, and its lyrical honesty never becomes burdensome. The song tells the story of an Irish Navyman who returns to his mother without his legs, which were lost in battle. The lyrics to the final verse are simply timeless:

"All foreign wars I do proclaim/Live on blood and a mother's pain."

"O Mary Don't You Weep," adopted as a freedom song during the civil rights movement, is a raucous song that is gloriously sloppy and is as uplifting as anything I have heard so far this year.

Springsteen has beautifully compiled an album that celebrates important songs from America's past. The album, one of the finest Springsteen has released in more than a decade, asks listeners to raise their hands and their voices and salute these precious artifacts of Americana. These songs are as important as ever, and their messages can help assuage our fears of this uncertain world. All we must do is come together, lift our voices and sing.

'Legends' sequel sure to please die-hard 'X-Men' fans

By Sam McCoy
DAILY NEBRASKAN

(U-WIRE) LINCOLN, Neb. – "X-Men Legends II: The Rise of Apocalypse" is exactly what a game based on the X-Men should be. It excels in every way and helps bring the classic comic book come to life.

A sequel to the 2004 game "X-Men Legends," the new version picks up closely after the events of the original game, which saw the appearance of mutant villain Apocalypse.

The story sees the X-Men team up with the Brotherhood of Mutants against the evil forces led by Apocalypse.

Playable X-Men characters include Wolverine, Jean Grey, Iceman, Cyclops, Gambit, Storm, Colossus, Nightcrawler and newcomers Sunfire and Bishop.

Unfortunately, Beast fans such as myself will have to play as another character as he is not active in this game.

Even though the number of characters offers the promise of many combinations, players will probably pick one team and play with it throughout because there are combinations that are just too powerful, such as Wolverine and Colossus.

One of the great aspects of this game is how it handles the world in which the X-Men live. For a true "X-Men" fan, there are tons of small references that will get any fan excited.

Other than Apocalypse, the game supports a fine supporting cast of villains. The cast reads like a who's-who list of 1990s X-Men villains and includes Omega Red, Lady Deathstrike, Sabretooth, Mr. Sinister and many more.

The one really nice addition to the villains is the X-Men-turned-horseman of death, Archangel.

"X-Men Legends 2" plays much like its predecessor. Both games borrow heavily from a style similar to "Gauntlet."

This is also one of the major drawbacks to the game; it is too much like the original. One thing necessary to make a truly great sequel is building and improving upon the original. While a few problems were worked out, there just weren't a lot of improvements. The graphics were only a little better and the game play didn't improve much.

New members selected for sophomore honor society

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The new members for Silver Key have been selected for 2006-07.

Silver Key adviser, Carla Jones, also assistant vice president and senior associate dean of student life, said students eligible to apply must have a GPA of 3.0 or higher after the fall semester of their freshman year.

The organization then sends letters to eligible students, whose records they get from the Registrar's Office.

The committee interviews qualified applicants and selects 35-40 new members.

When looking for applicants, Jones said they look for a variety of characteristics.

"We like students who have prior involvement in service activities, as well as leadership experiences," Jones said.

Jones said Silver Key's service includes a project for every month; the focuses are on youth, K-State community and senior citizens.

The group has had a senior prom for the elderly, she said.

Jones said the organization has a new set of members every year. When the new sophomores are selected they are involved from March to February.

"There is always a new group," Jones said. "And the organization is one of the few sophomore organizations in the region."

Jones said when members leave the group after their sophomore year, they can still stay involved informally.

She said several former members attend the homeless awareness sleepout or donate money.

Leann Spinden, freshman in agricultural education, said she was a member of the freshman honorary organization Quest.

Spinden said after being involved in that organization she wanted to stay involved and applied for Silver Key.

"It's a great way to be involved with K-State and the community," Spinden said.

Spinden said she enjoys helping others and getting to know other students.

Zach Oswald, sophomore in pre-professional business administration, said he was also a member of Quest.

"I haven't been able to do as much community service in college as I've wanted," Oswald said, "and I wanted to stay involved my sophomore year."

Oswald said he has been involved with multiple community service activities in the past that made him feel he was a good candidate for Silver Key.

In high school, Oswald said he set up his own fair-trade business where he imported coffee from central Mexico, and sold it in Kansas.

Oswald said he gave back the profit, which was used to build a church in Mexico.

"I feel like I'm equipped to do anything that's thrown at me," Oswald said, "and Silver Key will be a good opportunity."

Aggieville director to resign

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After 16 years as director of the Aggieville Business Association, Cheryl Sieben has announced her resignation.

Sieben is leaving the association because she is moving to Kansas City, Kan., to be with her husband, who received a job offer and has already begun work, she said.

"We've lived here our whole married life, so it will be different," Sieben said of the move. "But we'll be back a lot."

For the past 16 years, Sieben's job has been to organize special activities, events and fundraisers in Aggieville; to promote, improve and develop businesses; and to communicate with association members and merchants, Sieben said.

When Sieben began her job, the association consisted of about 30 businesses. Membership has more than doubled since that time, and Aggieville itself has grown as well, she said.

The Aggieville area has expanded to include the whole strip of businesses behind FedEx Kinko's, 1329 Anderson Ave., and there are less empty store fronts than there used to be, Sieben said.

"It's like our own little chamber of commerce," she said. "We have 100 businesses in Aggieville, basically in a four-block area."

While the new association director is not yet known, the Aggieville Business Association Board of Directors has established a transition committee to begin the search for the replacement, said Jeff Pfannenstiel, member of the board of directors and co-owner of Mercado Gourmet Grocery, 1222 Moro St.

This committee is working to identify skills needed to fill this position and to evaluate the position itself.

Pfannenstiel said he worked closely with Sieben during her 16 years as director, both as an association member and a business owner.

"She's just been invaluable to Aggieville. I can't think of Aggieville without her now, even though we have to," he said. "She always had Aggieville in mind – she was the voice and face of Aggieville as a whole."

The transition committee has not established a set time frame, and in the beginning Sieben will continue some duties to assist the association, Pfannenstiel said.

"She's kind of going to hang on to her position, but won't be as visible in the near future," he said. "The board will pick up some of her duties because she will be moving out of town, but she will still be behind the scenes for several weeks to help us make the transition."

Sieben will be missed by Aggieville businesses and their owners, said Kevin Peirce, co-owner of Bluestem Bistro, 1219 Moro St.

"We're really, really going to miss having Cheryl around," he said. "She has done so much for Aggieville and the Manhattan community."

Professors recognized for excellence in their fields

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Three K-State professors have been named distinguished professors.

Distinguished professors are chosen for their excellence and public renown in their respective fields of study.

Potential distinguished professors must be nominated by faculty members and appointed by a committee of current distinguished professors.

Vice Provost Ron Trewyn said they are recognized as having made an outstanding and continuing effect on their field, having recognition in important ways to the diversity of contributions, both national and international.

John Blair, professor of biology; Daniel Marcus, professor of anatomy and physiology; and Richard Marston, professor of geography; have been named university distinguished professors.

"It is the highest honor a professor can receive at K-State," Trewyn said. "It really aids their success in their professions as teachers, mentors and researchers."

Blair has been the director of the ecological research program at Konza Prairie since 1999. His studies have been supported by more than $20 million in grants from government agencies like the National Science Foundation and the Department of Energy.

According to his Web site, Blair has written 77 journal articles and book chapters that have been published in more than 30 different national journals. Many of the articles focus on his research on ecosystem ecology and terrestrial biogeochemistry.

Blair's research includes the effects of decomposition, soil nutrient cycling and other nutrient dynamics on the ecosystem. He also examines the effects of climate change and other disturbances on ecosystem processes. Much of this work takes place at Konza Prairie.

"We have a very active and excellent research program at Konza Prairie," Blair said. "My intention is to continue what I have been doing and build off the excellence of my previous accomplishments."

Blair received his bachelor's and master's degrees of science at Kent State University in Ohio. He received his Ph.D at the University of Georgia and became a postdoctoral associate. He was a member of the research faculty at Ohio State University and in 1992, he joined the staff as an assistant professor at K-State, eventually being named a professor of biology in 2002.

Blair said he looks forward to joining the university distinguished professors group and continuing his excellence in the field of ecology.

"The leadership opportunities will help me play a role in directing academic activities and make input on other ways to make an impact at K-State," he said.

Marcus joined K-State as an associate professor in 1998 and was named a professor in 2002.

Marcus is known internationally for his research on the physiology of inner ear epithelial cells. He researched topics like how these specialized cells transport dissolved salts since 1976, when he was in graduate school.

"My work concerns the underlying pathologies of the inner ear," he said. "There's not that much out there on this topic, so there's a lot to be learned."

Marcus has received more than $7 million in support from the National Institutes of Health, including a large portion of an $11 million grant from the National Institutes of Health's Centers of Biomedical Research Excellence program. Much of this money has been used to create the Center for Epithelial Cell Function at K-State.

In 2003, he was awarded the Pfizer Research Excellence Award from the College of Veterinary Medicine at K-State.

Marcus said he has had extensive experience as a teacher and researcher at Creighton University and the Boys Town National Research Hospital in Omaha, Neb. He received his master's and doctoral degrees from Washington University in St. Louis, where he also served as a member of the faculty.

"This award points to the high level of cooperation and excellence in the research," Marcus said. "It affords me the opportunity to work with other university distinguished professors and shape policies on academic issues."

Marston is the head of the geography department. He came to K-State in 2005.

Marston said his research focuses primarily in geomorphology and environmental geosciences. He measures the human impact of deforestation, grazing, fires, mining, river regulation, construction and urbanization on rivers and several other land forms.

Marston has had several positions in the field of geography and science. He is the president of the Association of American Geographers and a fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. He has written several articles and has been a co-editor in chief of the international journal Geomorphology since 1999.

He earned his doctorate from Oregon State University in 1980 and went on to teach at the University of Texas-El Paso, the University of Wyoming, the University of Alaska Southeast and Oklahoma State. At Oklahoma State, he served as a professor of geology and geography from 1999 until he was hired at K-State.

"It's a great honor because it means I have reached some level of recognition at the university and in the international science community," Marston said. "If you do work that government agencies recognize, you have a great opportunity to get this recognition."

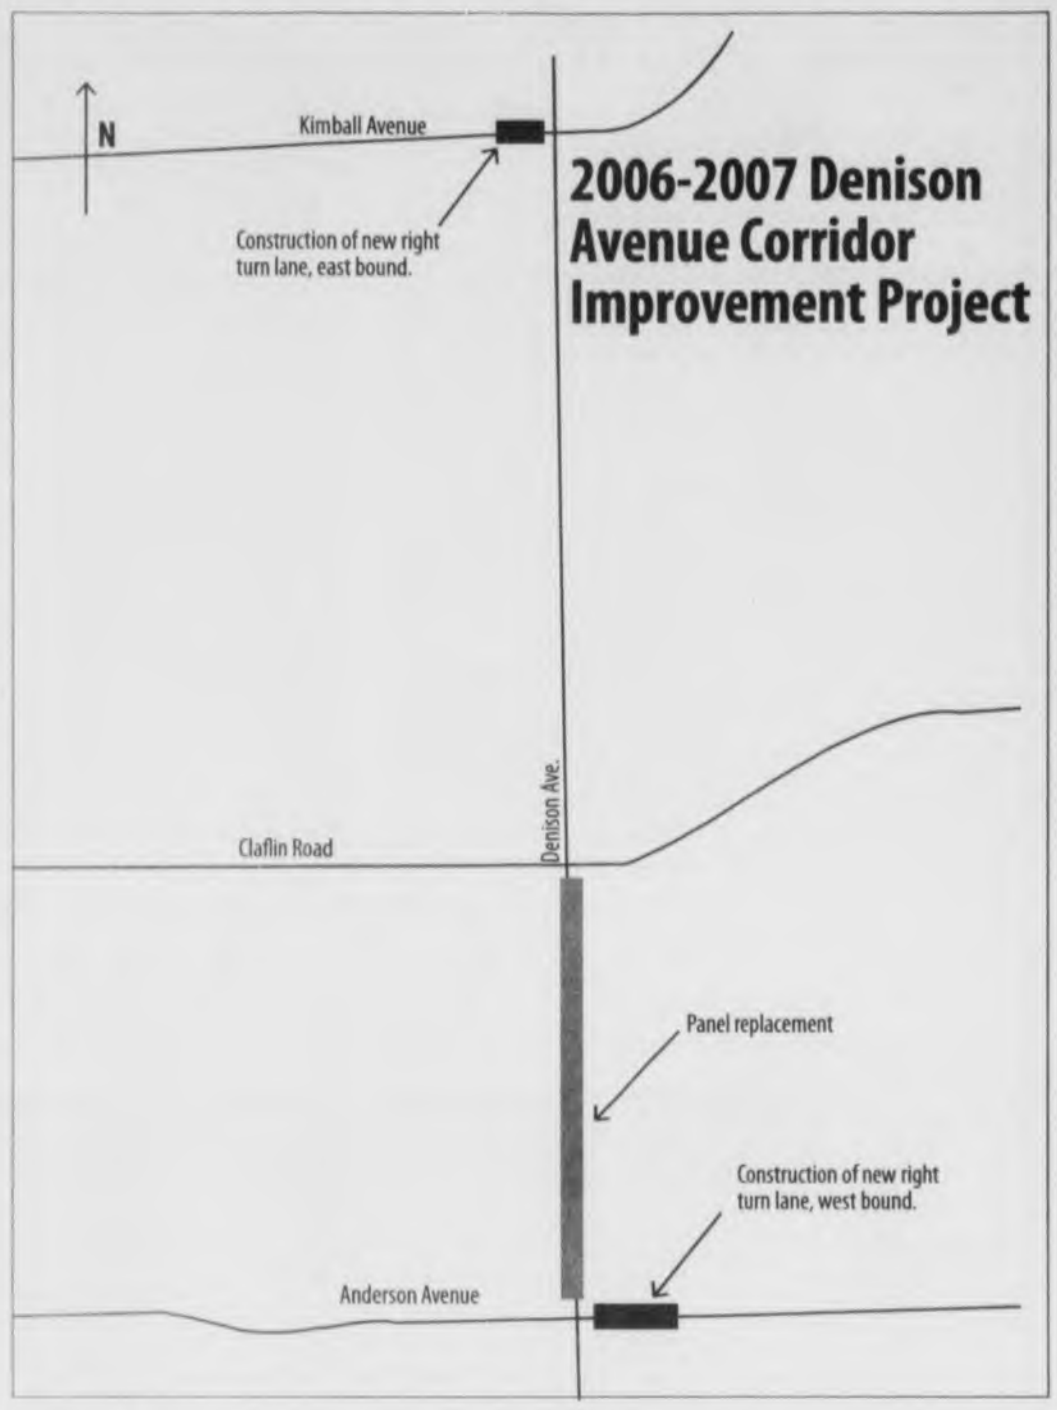
Laura Tietjen, associate athletic director. She said Learfield has much more reach and will be able to find more advertisers than K-State could, so they will be able to make enough revenue to pay the athletic department what will average $3 million a year or more.

KSSP will be paying more toward the end of the contract than at the beginning, Hubbard said. There are two reasons for this.

First, he said, KSSP is taking over contracts held by Action Sports Media as they expire.

Second, Hubbard said, it takes time for a company like KSSP to establish itself before selling advertisements at its full potential. He said this fall's longer football season will help.

The current system has KSSP selling ads for K-State games, but its involvement in the fulfillment of the orders depends on the medium, he said. It has the most involvement with radio, Hubbard said, as it produces the shows for the 29 stations that air the games. He said KSSP's involvement with television is much less, and the athletic department does a lot of the production of ads within its facilities.



KSSP also arranges about 80 percent of the about $500,000 worth in trade the athletic department does each year for goods and services it needs, Tietjen said. The most common currency the athletic department uses is tickets, she said, to get services like printing or goods like food.

The advantage of trade is in the cost to both parties, Tietjen said. The athletic department pays only the cost of the tickets, which is very little as long as the seats are not sold out, and the trading party only pays their cost of whatever they are providing.

The athletic department also trades some advertising, but not as often, Tietjen said.

"Some of those trades will naturally become less than they have in the past," she said. "That's an understanding that we have and it's in the contract."

CONSTRUCTION | Rezoning to be considered

When students begin arriving for the start of classes in August, Ott said North Manhattan Avenue and other alternative routes will be open to gain access to the university.

Detour routes will be posted for the summer, but Ott said motorists are encouraged not to cut through residential areas.

"It all depends on where people live and what portion of Denison they want to access," Ott said. "The whole key is to turn off before Denison.

"There definitely will be a learning period of the motorist to find alternative routes."

Danny Troop, student office assistant at Jardine Apartments, said due to construction and gas prices, he's planning on an alternate mode of transportation.

"Parking is already limited," Troop, freshman in English, said. "I'm planning on buying a bike."

Julia Bonney, senior in interior design, said the intersection is a main thoroughfare for many students.

While she will not be in Manhattan during the summer, Bonney said she will have to drive all the way around the construction and would waste time and gas.

"It's going to be crazy," she said. "I know that this year, I have an 8:05. I have to plan when I'm going to leave.

"It's going to be really, really challenging. We're going to have to plan to get up earlier and leave earlier."

All of Denison Avenue will be under some kind of construction, said Mark Taussig, university landscape architect for K-State Facilities Planning. Taussig said the pavement on the streets has been patched several times, and the pavement resurface needs to occur.

"It's going to cause some inconveniences," he said.

The city is trying to make detours easily accessible, and Taussig said people should try to find alternative routes.

"It's going to be an improvement," he said. "It will be a vast improvement."

Q: What do you do to pass the time or unwind to keep your mind off of duty in a War Zone?
A: We like to play poker or Blackhawk Down. Other than that, I do a lot of reading or just play on the Internet.

Q: What has been your most memorable moment here?
A: It would have to been when my Humvee rolled over into a canal. We were pretty lucky the canal was not full of water at the time. It could have gotten pretty ugly.

Q: Has your opinion about Iraq changed since you've been here?
A: No, not really. I pretty much knew a majority of the people here were good and honest people just trying to have a better life. There are just a few people here doing all of the damage. They have their own agenda. It has nothing to do with trying to help their fellow Muslims. All they do is attack the Shiites and the Sunnis, trying to cause a civil war.

Q: Do you think the news coverage presents an accurate account of the Iraqi conflict?
A: No. According to the news, everything is death and destruction over here. You don't hear any of the good things that happen over here. Everything we do over here is to help the Iraqi people. We put ourselves in more danger in order to legitimize the Iraqi government.

Q: Do you think the news coverage in Iraq is beneficial to the support of the war in Iraq?
A: Absolutely. If the American people heard all of the good things going on over here we would have a lot more support. But all they get is body counts every day.

Q: Do you think the election process will work for Iraq and the Iraqi people, and do you think Iraq will ever achieve some democratic form of government?
A: I don't know. There are a lot of tribal and religious differences in Iraq. If they can learn to accept their differences and choose to work together they might have a chance. If not, Iraq could be in trouble.

Q: What are your personal experiences with the Iraqi people, and how do you think they perceived you?
A: Most of my experiences with the people have been pretty positive. I think most of them were pretty impressed that I knew a little Arabic. Most of them liked trying to help me with my Arabic. But, for all I know they were making fun of me the whole time.

Q: Do you believe the pressure put on President Bush by the American people is fair, now that you are serving in Iraq? Why and why not?
A: Absolutely not. The people of America think the world is a huge Burger King. They want it their way, right now. And if it doesn't work out how they think it should, all they do is complain.

Q: What is the morale of your troops and peers and if low, why?
A: It is pretty high right now. But everyone is really starting to miss home. Before long, stress and missing home will start to have an effect.

Q: How do you feel about the drawdown of troops in Iraq?
A: If we start pulling out it will force Iraq to start taking responsibility for the security of their country. They will either stand up to the challenge, or they will just let someone else take charge of their lives. I don't know what they will do. They have lived for decades with a dictator where they didn't have to make any decisions for themselves. Right now they would probably just go back to the old ways and let someone rule their lives.

Q: How much longer do you think we will be in Iraq?
A: Probably not long enough. The American people are getting a little antsy to get out of here. The next election will probably decide how long we are here.

Q: How has being deployed changed your outlook on the future?
A: I want to spend as much time as possible with my wife. Life is too short to be out goofing off. Being gone has shown me how important my wife is to me. I will never forget that.

Q: When this is over, do you think it was worth it?
A: Ask me again in about 20 years when we know how things over here turned out.

Bike rental program offers international students transportation

By Jonathan Garten
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jim Lewis, K-State director of international recruitment and pre-admissions, makes the world a smaller place.

He goes on three-week tours of Asia, traveling to universities in China and other Asian countries, where he encourages prospective students to study English at K-State.

However, Lewis said he does not quit helping students once they reach campus. Since 2003, he has located, overhauled and rented bicycles to international students.

The bikes provide the students with a reasonable means of transportation, Lewis said.

"It's really not that hard to ride a couple miles from an apartment to campus," Lewis said. "It's a heck of a lot more healthful, and you're not spending money on a parking space."

The bikes Lewis provides are reminiscent of his first bicycle, a 24-inch balloon-tire single-speed coaster painted red and given to him by his parents when he was 7 years old, he said.

"A bicycle is basically a simple machine, and that's one of the reasons I like to simplify them more," Lewis said.

Growing up in St. Louis, Lewis said he rode a bicycle wherever he wanted to go.

But, when it came to cycling, he was special in his family.

"There was always a love of music growing up, and my father and I shared a love of sports and other outdoor activities, but bicycles were my own thing," Lewis said.

Although Lewis was alone as a child with his passion for bicycles, he said he now has a riding partner in his son, Rob. The pair has managed to take several long-distance biking trips.

Riding on recumbent bikes built by Lewis, the duo cycled 750 miles through three states in six days.

Even muggy Kansas weather could not ruin the father and son bonding experience.

"It was lots of fun for us to take that trip," Lewis said. "It was extremely hot that particular week but you adapt to that to some extent."

The $10 rental fee the students pay allows Lewis to maintain the 46 bicycles in the program and buy new "projects" found at garage and church sales. The bikes that are no longer safe to ride are recycled.

"The program pays for itself," Lewis said. "I'm getting ready to take the money from last spring's semester registration to buy some replacement locks, tires and break cables."

Martin Svarovsky, an international exchange student from the Czech Republic, has been riding one of Lewis' bicycles since the day he set foot on the K-State campus August 2005.

Having a bike has allowed Svarovsky to get extra sleep.

"When I have class early in the morning I can get up a little bit later than I would if I didn't have a bike," Svarovsky, student in computer science, said.

Stephane Guenee, an international exchange student from France, takes pride in being able to get around town on his own.

"I feel independent," Guenee, student in agricultural economics, said. "I don't have to ask friends for transportation."

Although Lewis typically works alone, he does allow a students help him when it is time to check the bicycles.

For the past few semesters, Jamie Espinosa, an information systems student from Colombia, has adjusted seats and test-ridden bikes before Lewis rents them out to students.

"Jim is a kind and wonderful person, and he is always willing to help the students with our bicycles," Espinosa said. "I remember one time that my rear tire was rubbing the brake pad, and I tried to realize what was happening. So I took my bicycle to Jim and he told me in the snap of a finger, 'It's one of the spokes.'"

File photo

Jim Lewis helps a group of international students pick a bike to check out from him.

Both Lewis' bike program and the international exchange student program can link international students to the rest of the world, he said.

"Bringing students here who have not perhaps had a chance to be out of their countries does a lot to open up understanding," Lewis said.

K-State Police to investigate theft

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Police have decided to begin an investigation into the theft of an estimated 8,000 Collegian newspapers that occurred last Friday.

After initial hesitation to investigate the incident, director Ronnie Grice confirmed Tuesday that the K-State Police will look into the matter and forward any findings to the county attorney's office.

"I'm happy that they (the K-State Police) changed their minds because it would have been a headache for the Collegian staff to try to convince them to investigate and work with the Student Press Law Center," Collegian editor in chief Leann Sulzen said. "It was another hurdle avoided."

The investigation has been turned over to Detective Donald Stubbings.

To aid in the investigation, the Collegian will supply the K-State Police with copies of surveillance video and photos obtained from the K-State Student Union and from Varney's Bookstore matching descriptions of people and vehicles the Collegian received Friday after the papers were stolen.

GTM requests city aid

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

GTM Sportswear came one step closer to getting help for expansion from the city of Manhattan Tuesday night.

The Manhattan City Commission unanimously approved a resolution that will likely lead to granting $6 million in Industrial Revenue Bonds to GTM, 520 McCall Road. The money would be used for constructing a 19,250-square-foot addition to its facility.

Diane Stoddard, Deputy City Manager, said the city only arranges the bonds, which are bought by banks and private investors, and the city will incur no liability for them. The resolution said the city may eventually approve up to $28 million in IRBs for GTM's expansion.

It also announced the commission will likely grant GTM 10 years of property tax abatement as well as an $800,000 incentive package. The decision will require a second hearing which has been scheduled for May 16, but Deputy City Manager Diane Stoddard said some parts of the process might take longer to arrange.

The abatement will mean that GTM will not have to pay any property taxes to the city for its existing facility where it manufactures decorated clothing as well as any additions it makes for one decade. Stoddard said the retail parts of the building will not be included in the abatement.

Commissioner Ed Klimek expressed disapproval of the tax abatement on existing facilities because it will mean an actual reduction of tax revenue instead of missing out on potential revenue.

"That's the part that I can't support, and that's just on principle," Klimek said. He said he would still vote for the assistance to GTM if it's included.

The $800,000 incentive package will be paid out as four $200,000 forgivable loans paid in the first four years. Stoddard said that GTM will not have to pay those loans back as long as they meet certain performance marks.

She said the money from those loans will come from previous loans being paid back to the city, which in turn were paid from money made from a half-cent city sales tax no longer in place.

John Pagen of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce said 90 percent of GTM's sales come from outside Kansas. He said it effectively exports clothing and imports money.

GTM's plans have its facilities growing from 65,000

Academic Learning Center monitors student athlete class attendance

By Matthew Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's 9 a.m. and there is an alarm screaming at Jimmy to start his day.

Jimmy, in his third semester at K-State, wipes his eyes to find the snooze button to get a few extra minutes of sleep.

A second scream, and Jimmy has no choice but to make a tough decision – get up and go to class or to check the lecture notes online.

Student athletes, on the other hand, might have a representative of the K-State Academic Learning Center standing outside a lecture hall and documenting whether they are in class.

Associate Athletics Director Phil Hughes said although the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics has no official attendance policy regarding student athletes, the ALC uses different methods to monitor their attendance upon requests from head coaches.

"For some athletes, and for some classes, I assign staff to physically check whether a student is present at that class period," Hughes said. "We send letters requesting information about student athlete academic performance and their attendance to all faculty of all student-athletes.

"About a third to a half of the faculty will respond with information regarding student's attendance and academic performance, so that's another way we know whether students are attending or not."

Hughes, who has checked athletes' attendance in person, said the staff members have lists of athletes and will either stand outside the classroom before or after a class to make sure an athlete is there.

"It's not like we go into a lecture hall and start walking down stairs while someone is lecturing," Hughes said. "You certainly want the students to know that the class was being checked, but you don't want anyone else to know, including other students."

Hughes said there are a variety of reasons an athlete might be monitored.

"Monitoring of performance and attendance is one way an academic support program can acquire information regarding the student's attitude, regarding a student's commitment, regarding a student's level of distraction, so we can prevent academic problems and try to address them and solve them on an ongoing basis," he said.

NO CLASS, NO PLAY

Along with grades being at stake, student athletes also face the pressure of staying academically eligible on the playing field.

"There are eligibility issues and requirements that the NCAA has handed down that all student-athletes have to ensure they meet in order for them to be eligible," said David Flores, assistant athletics director of compliance.

"Our office, along with Phil Hughes' office and along with our registrar's office, we all work as a team to ensure that students are meeting those requirements to ensure that we, as an institution, are certifying that those requirements are being met the proper way."

If an athlete isn't meeting eligibility requirements set forth by the NCAA, the athlete can be deemed ineligible to compete, Flores said.

Varsity Graduations

This year is the first year the NCAA changed its graduation rate formula. The Graduation Success Rate (GSR) report takes into account students who have left K-State in good standing and uses 1995-1998 graduation rate statistics to figure the graduation rates of scholarship athletes for K-State's 11 varsity sports. The Federal Rate is the previous formula used by the U.S. Department of Education. The Federal Rate uses a six-year time span — starting with the 1998-99 academic year — to figure graduation rates for scholarship athletes regardless of standing with the university.

Graduation rates for K-State:

Men's sports	GSR	Federal Rate
Baseball	57	33
Basketball	80	33
Cross Country/Track	58	43
Football	75	56
Golf	100	40

Women's sports	GSR	Federal Rate
Basketball	100	67
Cross Country/Track	75	53
Crew/Rowing	33	33
Tennis	71	71
Volleyball	100	69
Golf	100	75

K-State women's basketball coach, Deb Patterson, in her 10th season at K-State, said if a student-athlete is skipping class, she will take away what her players love the most.

"To me, the ultimate

Aggravated robbery arrest

Salina resident Darryl Woods Jr. was arrested in Manhattan Monday night in connection with an April 6 robbery.

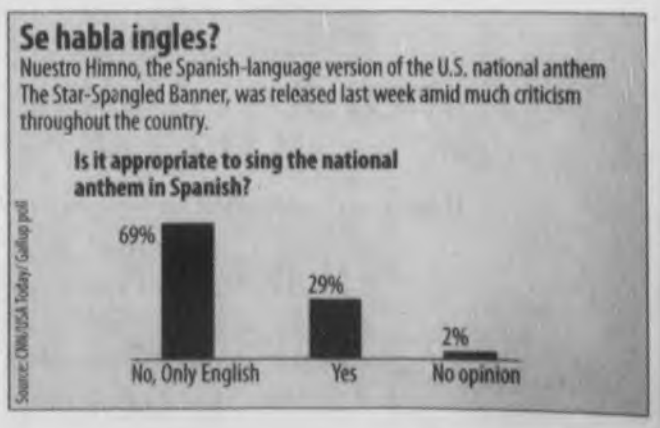
Woods was charged with three counts of aggravated robbery and bond was set at $50,000. Lt. Mike Quintanar said the robbery occurred in the 1000 block of North 12th Avenue.

Woods is the second person to be arrested in connection with the April 6 robbery.

Man arrested for fleeing

The RCPD arrested Rondal W. Massengale on two counts of felony possession of methamphetamine, two counts of felony possession of marijuana, one count of felony possession of a firearm, one felony count of obstruction of legal process, one felony count of attempting to flee and elude, two misdemeanor counts of possession of drug paraphernalia and one misdemeanor count of driving with no driver's license. Bond was set at $35,000.

School bill approved



TOPEKA — The House tentatively approved a $532.7 million, three-year school finance plan Tuesday that is smaller than one supported earlier.

On a 63-62 vote, the bill was sent to final action, which is expected Wednesday morning. It would return to the Senate heavily modified but slightly less than the $541 million senators approved last week.

Student on road to recovery after motorcycle accident

By Cynthia Hoffman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Chris Wallace isn't afraid to tell people what he thinks. He said he only wishes they could understand what he was saying.

"Not being able to talk fluently is a challenge I face every day," Wallace said, slowly and tediously forming each word and then typing it in his LINK Assistive Talking device for clarification. "I ain't afraid to tell it like it is. I just wish people would not judge a person for talking incorrectly."

Wallace, junior in animal sciences and industry, survived a motorcycle accident five years ago and is still working on the recovery process.

He used a piece of paper, his talking device and hand gestures for emphasis in recalling a March 10, 2001, accident that changed his life.

Chris and his father, Heinz Wallace, were riding motorcycles about 7 1/2 miles south of Junction City on Kansas Highway 57 when two dogs ran out onto the road. Chris said he didn't want to hit the dogs, so he swerved off the road and hit a small group of yearling trees. Upon hitting the trees, he lost his balance and fell off his 1976 Harley Davidson Sportster. He said he was thrown 500 feet, or more than the length of 1 1/2 football fields, before hitting a fence post.

"I remember flying in the air and hitting a fence post with my shoulder," Chris said as he took a deep breath and mapped his explanation on a piece of paper. "My mom told me that there was a big oak tree five feet away from the fence post. If I would have hit it I probably would have died."

Chris was flown to Via Christi St. Francis Hospital in Wichita, where he was in a coma for two months before waking up in the Wichita Lady of Lourdes Rehab Center.

Chris said he was wearing a helmet, leather jacket, pants and motorcycle riding boots the day of the accident. But despite the safety practices, he still received numerous injuries, including a fractured ankle, torn liver, bruised kidney, broken ribs, a broken bone in his upper arm, a shoulder injury and a traumatic brain injury that left him with reduced motor skills and the inability to talk like he did before the accident. He participated in rehab for five months and went to outpatient physical, occupational and speech therapy.

Pam Wallace, Chris's mother, said he has made great improvements.

"Chris has put his heart and soul into his recovery," she said. "If you would have seen him five years ago you wouldn't believe that he has come so far. He was released from outpatient therapy in 2004, but still continues to work on different things at home."

Five years ago, one of Chris's goals was to learn how to walk again. On Jan. 1, 2005, he said "no more chair," and began walking. Now he's focused on improving his speech and completing school.

Kevin Donnelly, assistant dean of the College of Agriculture and Chris's academic adviser, said Chris's progress has been steady, and he's gradually been able to increase the number of courses he takes per semester.

"I know it's a challenge for him to get around and communicate, but he always seems to be progressing," Donnelly said. "He's very persistent, and I believe that he will make it through college."

Chris first attended K-State in fall 2000 and was going to major in agriculture education. After the accident, he returned to school in fall 2002 and changed his major to animal sciences and industry.

Besides attending classes, Chris also works for the animal sciences department. He helps professor emeritus Miles McKee with a history project for the department.

Chris sat up a little straighter at his work desk as he talked about his responsibility of scanning old pictures and livestock reports to be used for the project.

"I enjoy working with Chris very much. I think it gives him a feeling of worth because we value his work very much," McKee said. "This project allows him to learn about our department history and background. It was something he could do, and it seems to be a good fit."

Chris has worked for McKee for two years, and McKee said Chris is different than his other employees, because he has an extreme amount of patience.

"I won't give up," Chris said, forcing his mouth to articulate each word.

Chris Wallace, junior in animal science and industry, uses a talking device and hand gestures to communicate with people. In 2001, Wallace was thrown over 500 feet from his Harley motorcycle when he swerved off the road to avoid hitting two dogs.

Pam said he has always been self-determined and self-motivated. She said she and her husband are proud of how Chris deals with the situation.

"It is really difficult to talk about Chris's accident," she said. "The kid had everything going for him. He lived in an apartment and was doing well in college. He didn't ask for this, and he doesn't deserve it, but he deals with it every day."

Chris combats the everyday challenges with a positive attitude. Donnelly said Chris's positive outlook on life is one thing he enjoys about being his adviser.

"One day he showed me the lift system he made for his truck," Donnelly said. "He was really excited, and I was impressed that he came up with it. We stood out in the cold, looked at the truck and talked for an hour. I had a winter coat on, and he did not, but he was happy despite the bad weather."

Chris began driving again in fall 2003. He said the doctors thought he might need something special, but he said he knew his 1998 Chevrolet truck would work just fine.

Instead of being stopped by obstacles, Chris said he seems to find his way around them. He said accomplishments like driving and walking again encourage him to keep going. His "I-won't-give-up" attitude seems to be what encourages others to keep going as well.

"He has so much patience when working with each of us," McKee said. "There are days when I get so frustrated with trying to understand what he's trying to say, and sometimes I just want to give up. But I look at him and see that I can't give up because this amazing young man won't give up."

Jim Lewis and Mary Wood spoke about the process of recruiting international students Tuesday afternoon.

The lecture was a part of the Vernon Larson International Luncheon-Lecture Series and took place in the Ramada Plaza Ballroom. Lewis is the director of the International Pre-Admissions and Recruiting Program, and Wood is the director of the English Language Program. The name of their speech was "International Student Recruiting: Contact, Support, Teach, Advise."

Lewis spoke first about the areas of the world in which they are currently looking to recruit. These include Asia, the Middle East, Turkey, Europe and Central and South America.

"One of the most recent changes that has come about in our program is a new scholarship program in Saudi Arabia," he said. "Under this program, we have had 47 new students in January."

He said when visiting countries in which they wish to recruit, they speak about things like the costs of attending school here, the types of degrees offered and what a K-State student looks like.

"Once a student arrives, the International Student Center is usually their first stop," Lewis said. "They check in, and staff there makes sure everything is set with their passports and visas. I cannot stress enough how important the ISC is. If not for them, we may not have any international students."

Wood then spoke of the English Language Program, which she said is usually an international student's second stop after the ISC. She said they give these students English proficiency tests to see what kinds of classes in which they should to be placed in.

"We have used the same test for 16 years," Wood said. "We have our own in-house test, which has many advantages. We can test whenever we want, which is a change from how the policy used to be. Students used to have to travel and pay to take the test somewhere else, which added much time and expense to them."

Stacey Tilley, foreign student adviser at the International Student Center, said she goes to the lectures because they have much to do with international communication.

"I think it's great to let people know what we're doing, because many don't know. I think both Jim and Mary were very informative and do a great job."

Wood agreed with the importance of presenting the information and keeping open the doors of communication.

"Recruiting students is contact, support, teaching and advising," she said. "These things make students stay and enjoy their time in Kansas and at K-

TO THE POINT

Student athletes are attending their classes

Before complaining that student athletes never go to class, you might want to rethink your stance.

K-State has deterrents for student athletes who skip class. This is more than can be said for non-student athletes.

Student athletes are monitored if a teacher, professor or instructor reports they are missing too many class periods, and if they are found to be skipping class, they will suffer the consequences.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

At the Vanier Football Complex, the names of players who miss class are displayed on a plasma screen TV as one enters the building, and the rest is dealt with behind closed doors.

Non-student athletes don't have such a mechanism to deter them and are free to skip class whenever they please.

K-State is near the national average in graduation rates for student athletes, according to new statistics. The latest figures indicate student athletes graduate at a higher rate than non-student athletes at K-State, but those figures have yet to be updated and therefore are incomparable.

While it generally is inexcusable to miss class, the "phenomenon" of skipping is not confined to those athletes who don Wildcat jerseys on the court or field.

The next time you see an empty seat in class where a student athlete should be, know there are people checking in on them and there are consequences they must face.

Summer plans

Republicans can have fun with no moral worries

KODY COOPER

When faced with the prospect of an entire summer, a pocketful of cash from my trust fund (I'm Republican), and absolutely no moral compass to direct my path (again, Republican), I ask myself only one question; what is a fat, rich white guy to do?

Since simply buying everything I like gets boring, maybe I could instead destroy everything I hate. Surveying my fat, rich, balding self, I reasoned the only things I hate more than taxes are innocent animals and the environment.

How did I become so lost?

Ted Turner had a chance to save my malleable mind during my youthful cartoon years, but Captain Planet's green mullet actually scared me into the infernal ranks of the Republican Party. Thus, my hero became the capitalistic tycoon "villain" Looten Plunder.

Now that I'm all grown up and completely close-minded and insensitive, I only need some avenue to diffuse my diabolical malice.

Luckily, the Republican National Committee is sponsoring a hunting excursion to the Alaska National Wildlife Refuge this summer. College Republicans from around the country are planning to kill enough of the Porcupine Herd to put a taxidermied Alaskan caribou head on every campus.

That is definitely tempting. But, since I can now carry a concealed gun around Kansas, I figured I could just as easily hunt innocent animals in Konza Prairie.

Still, before I can brandish my brand-new Remington Model 870 pump-action 12-gauge shotgun, I will have to pass a gun-licensing exam. So, I've been taking gun lessons this semester. My grey pony-tailed, combat-booted Vietnam Vet instructor has taught me much.

The most interesting lecture topic of the course was titled "Hunters and Feminists." The instructor proclaimed to the class:

"As hunters, you will be morally superior to feminists."

The class was completely silent. Perplexed, I queried him how that was possible. He responded:

"When you see a buck in the woods, you will pull the trigger. When you see a person, you hold your fire. When you're unsure, you also hold your fire. The feminist who is unsure whether the fetus is a person aborts it anyway. Basically, she just pulls the trigger."

I was flabbergasted.

How exciting. Draped for so many years in the rags of wretched Republican-ness, I had accepted my position amongst the moral dregs of the societal wine cask.

But, maybe now I could achieve moral supremacy over the epitome of morality – the American feminist.

No, that's impossible. If I were honest with my fat, rich balding self, I would realize how unfair my Vietnam Vet instructor's analogy is.

I mean, as a hunter, I know a buck has obvious features like fur, antlers, hooves, etc. On the other hand, just because a fetus has a human head, torso, arms, legs, hands and feet doesn't mean it's a person. What are "heartbeats" and "brainwaves," anyway?

OK. Destruction of furry animals. Check. Now, on to man's "natural" enemy – the environment.

As a Republican, I will spend the summer regularly pimp-slapping Mother Nature in my oversized, gas-guzzling sport utility vehicle. Furthermore, since I'm a grotesquely fat Republican, I will gleefully contribute even more pollutant carbon dioxide through labored breathing.

After all, Republicans' very livelihood depends on increasing greenhouse gases in our atmosphere. How else will we keep our tropic resort beach houses warm all year round?

That reminds me. Any of you poor Democrats looking for a summer job can apply to join my summerhouse servant staff.

I know that seems uncharacteristic of me, but even Republicans are compassionate sometimes.

Kody Cooper is now accepting applications. Preference will be given to feminists with prior foot rubbing experience. Please send your comments to opinion@spub.ksu.edu.

Halting internet predators a daunting task

KELSEY CHILDRESS

In an age where almost everything is driven by technology, from the cars we drive to the phones on which we talk, it is easy to see that more people are turning to the Internet in their free time.

However, some with bad intentions use this resource as a way to prey on or manipulate children.

Can this ever be stopped?

It is hard to say. Many will state that, because the Internet has become such a booming universe of infinite pages, it is impossible to track down each and every instance of child pornography or other illegal activity.

News organizations and companies have declared a crusade on Internet predators, employing the police to pose as pre-teens and volunteers who lure the older individual into a meeting, which inevitably lands them in jail.

Last week, "Dateline NBC" ran a special that showed a team of investigators catching Internet predators. A specialist pretended to be 13- to 15-year-old girls home alone and chatted online with men from the area.

The men, some of whom drove more than two hours to visit her, showed up at the address the girl gave them. They were then confronted by "Dateline" cameras and told they had been caught.

Some had brought alcohol; one man was a sixth grade teacher. Many brought condoms and confessed they were planning on engaging in sexual activities with this young underaged girl.

Knowing about laws to punish those who seek to harm children and pre-teens is a relief and a warning to parents and other adults out in cyberspace.

Meanwhile, there is a lot more that can, and cannot, be done about this epidemic.

Obviously, children should have more restrictions when it comes to his or her freedoms on the Internet, because even those who don't mean to give out personal information can accidently end up doing so.

On the other hand, there is little that can feasibly be done about the rise of Internet predators. Many have become very resourceful in discovering personal information, often hacking into e-mail or servers to access addresses, last names and other private matters. As restrictions and security tighten on the Internet, these criminals will become smarter and invent new ways to outsmart children or parents.

Even though it could be deemed unfair to not let a child browse the Internet unattended, it might make it safer to have some level of supervision, whether it be through filters or restricting what Web sites they can visit.

The Internet becomes bigger and bigger every day, and even though a little girl is in a chat room for pre-teens, she might be stumbling into a darkened tunnel of deception.

Usually those on the Internet are not who they claim to be. It is so easy to hide behind a screen and pretend to be someone who isn't real.

There are a lot of lonely people in the world, and many are so desperate for any type of human contact or affection that they will go to horrifying (and criminal) lengths to get it.

Rally's message misleads students, visitors to the reality of rape cases committed each year

Editor,

On April 26, Bosco Student Plaza was home to the "412 Rally." Also on this day, campus was host to around 165 high school juniors, prospective K-State students visiting campus to evaluate if our university is the right fit for them. How comforting it must have been for those students along with their parents to hear people talk about how our campus is not safe.

According to the Collegian article published April 27, "The 412 rally presented victim testimonies of support and information tables to promote rape awareness on campus. There were 412 numbered stickers passed out, signifying the rape victims at K-State."

What they fail to leave out of their rally message is that this is not representative of our campus itself, these numbers are from a national average. That means that statistic applies whether you're on our campus, UCLA, NYU, as well as every other campus in the U.S.

According to the 2004 Kansas State University Annual Security Report, there were a total of 12 reported rapes involving both on-campus and non-campus buildings and areas. Don't get me wrong, I condemn rape in any and all aspects, and I believe that one rape is too many, but it pales in comparison to the supposed 412 rapes said to have happened on our campus.

K-State is a great university, and I can only hope this negligent act of free speech doesn't negatively affect the attitudes of those juniors and their parents.

When people visit campus they don't see your acts as being individual, they see it as a reflection of the university as a whole.

So please, think of the consequences of your actions, because in the end, you're representing K-State.

Problems caused by abortion extend beyond physical wounds; also inflict mental trauma

Editor,

With the Supreme Court's decision to consider the constitutionality of the Partial-Birth Abortion Act, and South Dakota's passage of the most restrictive abortion statute on the books, the battle over life continues to rage.

I question the effectiveness of focusing on the law to solve a problem of the heart. If the pro-life community continues to address issues like abortion solely at the level of regulating behavior, we will never meaningfully affect the torrent of pain and death caused by abortion.

A crisis pregnancy that prompts an abortion decision is generally a symptom of a deeper rooted issue or trauma – a wound to the heart. That is why problems don't go away after an abortion, but tend to escalate. For not only is the deeper wound neglected, but now it has been exacerbated by the physical, emotional and spiritual trauma caused by the abortion. No amount of litigation or lobbying will change this fact.

When pro-choice advocates frame the issue as one of personal freedom and autonomy, we must respond with the truth of science and liberty. Conception creates a human life distinct from the mother. Therefore, during the nine-month pregnancy, the mother not only loses her autonomy as it relates to the life she carries, but her personal liberty becomes secondary to that life.

Volunteering with local agencies like HopeNet, Choices Medical Clinic and the Crisis Pregnancy Center provides the opportunity to serve a wounded heart by meeting people at their point of need. These agencies are on the front line of the human pain that tempts the abortion decision. And their staff knows where the real battle lies.

Fraternity's fundraiser a considerate deed for those suffering from debilitating ailments

Editor,

I am not a frequent writer to the editor, but there were a few points I wanted to make.

For one, the idea that Sigma Nu is not being considerate of others is in itself false. Sigma Nu has been putting on Sunset Revival for many years as just a concert for a good time. It is precisely because they are considerate of others that they turned the event into a fundraiser and now consistently raises more than $10,000 (this year $12,000) for the Christopher Reeves Foundation.

That is pretty considerate in my book.

Two, I believe there is a slight risk you take when moving into a residence with such neighbors living next door.

Thirdly, it sounds like Sigma Nu took every legal step they are required by law to take.

If they are being law abiding and you are having such a problem with the situation, I think you should take the "blatantly rude" fraternity boy's advice and join in the fun a little more, or possibly look in the want ads for a different apartment in a quieter area.

I would feel very sorry for anyone affected by paralysis that would not get to appreciate the repercussions of Sigma Nu's sizable annual donation because Sunset Revival was too loud.

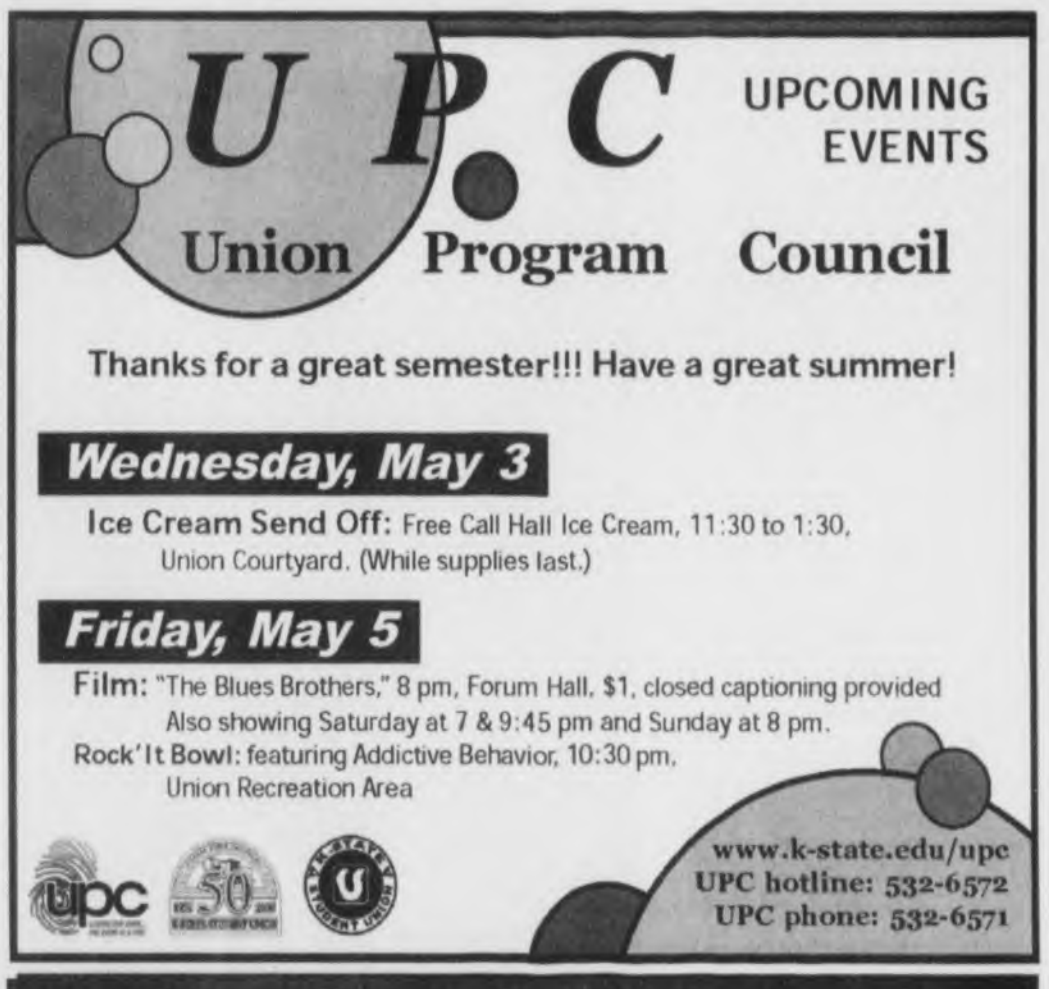
Left hypocritical when discussing issues relating to global human-rights conflicts

Editor,

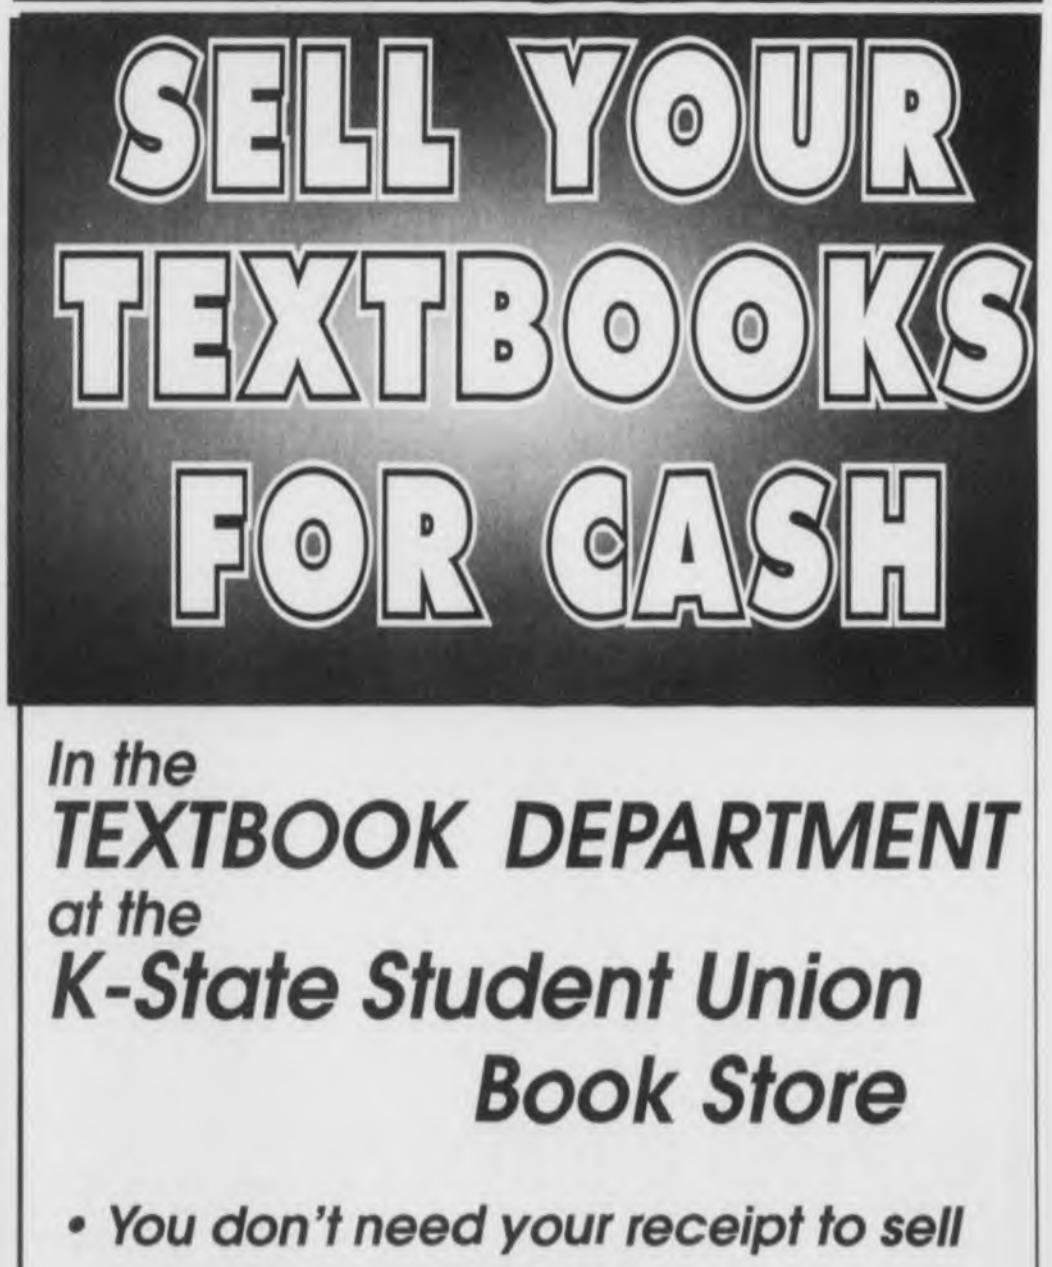
I opened the USA Today and was greeted by an entire article about how George Clooney and Chris Rock are suddenly foreign policy experts on the Darfur region of the Sudan. What I don't understand is why the Hollywood left and the "mainstream" media are suddenly all for sending troops in to stop this genocide.

Where was this "willing to stop a madman" when 500,000 people were dying under the Taliban from 1996-2001? Where has it been when thousands of "political prisoners" are executed every year in China, yet, when someone cries out for it all to stop at a press conference, she's called a troublemaker by the news?

Most of all, where was the outcry for action when Saddam Hussein murdered just more than 1 million of his own people over 20 years from 1983-2003?



Why does the left in this country and around the world call one liberation "the wrong war, wrong time, wrong place," when it will turn around and yell at an overburdened administration, demanding that we send in troops to help save another country?



Why don't they cry to France, or Germany, or Russia, or their mighty U.N. to help (it might be all the charges of money laundering, bribery and underage rape)?

Don't get me wrong, I believe that as a country with the power to do something, we should.

But what I am tired of is constant stonewalling and hypocrisy from the other side of the aisle.

K-State added a game against Kansas Wesleyan to its schedule, which was played Tuesday night at Tointon Family Stadium, and the extra outing allowed the Wildcats (25-16-1) to snap a four-game losing streak.

The loss pushed the Coyotes to 17-33 on the season.

Seniors Brandon Farr, Barrett Rice and Joe Roundy all sat out the game to give some younger guys playing time they normally would not have received.

Coach Brad Hill started five freshmen, playing seven total, and said it was nice to be able to get those guys some experience before the weekend series against Oklahoma.

"We were able to put some fresh, new guys out there and they were just trying to do what we asked of them," Hill said. "They all did a nice job, which was nice for us because we haven't scored that many runs in a long time."

K-State starting pitcher Chase Mitchell was the only Wildcat senior to compete in the contest, as he earned the victory, which moved him to 4-1 on the season. He did not give up a run and allowed only two hits in five innings of work, while striking out four.

Freshman Trevor Hurley relieved Mitchell in the sixth inning and gave up the only run for the Coyotes, a home run to junior Andrew Gulla. K-State sophomore Daniel Edwards came in to pitch the eighth and ninth innings and retired six of the seven batters he faced to secure the Wildcat victory.

Coyote starting pitcher senior Rob Ozga pitched just the first inning, and gave

MLB | Gordon's card costs because of boo-boo

Alex Gordon has yet to play a single game in the major leagues and yet his rookie card is the hottest in all of baseball, selling for as much as $2,550 in recent weeks.

Is Gordon the Kansas City Royals' next great player? Could be. But that isn't why his card, which is No. 297 in Topps' 2006 set, is worth that kind of money.

The piece of cardboard is worth that much only because it never should have been produced in the first place.

Last year, the MLB's Players Association ruled that card manufacturers could make rookie cards only of players who either made the 25-man roster or played in a major league game the season before.

Gordon didn't qualify either way.

Use your celebrity status wisely

ANTHONY MENDOZA

I'll admit it; I'm like most of the student population and waste my free time, that should be spent studying, searching Facebook.com. But unlike most of you, I have used the Web site as a research tool.

Pretty much everyone is free game unless they block you from viewing their profile, but for the most part, a good 95 percent of people listed at K-State are available.

That's why I'm sending this public service announcement out to all athletes who participate in the world that is Facebook – be careful what you post, because people are stalking you.

I've been to some message boards lately that are taking information from your profiles or pictures that were probably not intended for others to see, that are now being linked, and at times, becoming the signature pictures for the poster.

For example, during the men's basketball signing period, the K-State fans and Kansas men's fans went on an online smear campaign. The Jayhawks discovered the account of K-State recruit Jason Bennett on Myspace.com, which did not make him come off as the most flattering person in the world. Needless to say, they made it available for viewing to all other KU fans.

Not to be outdone, the Wildcat posters countered with the Myspace profiles of freshmen Mario Chalmers and Brandon Rush.

This is just an example of ways people have used your information, which you have made available to the public.

Here are my tips to protect yourselves in the future so you don't become the latest person to be exposed by Joe Blow sitting in his parents' basement.

GRAMMAR

Use it. Don't forget your profile is your open diary and if someone wants to read it, they will figure out how to do so. This is not a problem with most profiles, but a few give the impression they have not attended an English course in the last five years (see Rush's and Chalmers respective profile).

PICTURES

Remember why you are here. You are a scholarship student athlete who is supposed to be representing the university that is paying for your education. Some things to avoid when choosing pictures are such things as underage drinking. If you are a freshman or sophomore, there is a likely chance you are not of the legal age.

Other things to avoid in pictures include gang paraphernalia, throwing up gang signs alongside the rest of the people in the photo and self-serving pictures that you took of yourself. That just makes you look cocky, and if you're a selfish player on the court or field, it does not help to deter your reputation off it.

Leah Marietta, sophomore in kinesiology, found her niche for powerlifting in a high school physical education class and has since become a nationally recognized lifter. Marietta competes in the squat, bench press and hang clean and has earned state and national titles.

National champion lifter hopes to see K-State add team in the future

By Austin Meek
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Leah Marietta started lifting weights in her high school physical education class, she had no idea what she was getting into.

As she hoisted barbells in the weight room of Decatur Community High School in Oberlin, Kan., Marietta realized something. She was strong. Really strong.

"My P.E. coach told me I should go to one of the state powerlifting meets, because my maxes were really close to the state records," Marietta said.

Marietta proceeded to set state records in the squat, bench press and hang clean.

Marietta placed third in her weight class at the Women's Collegiate National Powerlifting Championships, which took place April 14-16 in Miami. Marietta lifted 331 pounds in the squat, 176 pounds in the bench press and 320 pounds in the deadlift for a total of 827 pounds.

Just to put things in perspective, 827 pounds is roughly three offensive linemen, one small cow or 3,308 quarter-pounders with cheese.

But Marietta said she doesn't like to dwell on the numbers.

"I try not to think about how much weight I'm actually lifting, because most of the time, it kind of scares me," Marietta said.

Marietta placed first in the 2005 National Powerlifting Tournament. Although she said she'd hoped to repeat her championship, Marietta said she was not disappointed with a third-place finish.

"I was happy with the place I got," Marietta said. "I can't complain about getting third in the nation."

Marietta's parents, Alan and Judy, were happy as well. Judy said the family has enjoyed following Leah's accomplishments with the USA Powerlifting organization.

"It's been a lot of fun to see how well she's done and travel to all the different places," Judy said. "We've met a lot of really interesting people."

USA Powerlifting is a drug-free organization dedicated to promoting powerlifting in the United States and across the world, according to www.usapowerlifting.com.

Jim Hart, Marietta's coach with USA Powerlifting, said Marietta has all the traits needed to succeed in the sport.

"She is dedicated, she is a hard worker, and she listens well," Hart said. "She listens and follows what I tell her to do."

Hart helps Marietta with her technique and determines which contests she will compete in. However, Hart lives in Nebraska, which makes scheduling practices difficult.

"One of the biggest obstacles to coaching Leah has been the distance," Hart said. "If I was able to work hands-on with her more, she would be so much better. Her time is busy and my time is busy, and three hours of travel time is hard to overcome."

The sport of powerlifting is made up of three events: Squat, bench press and deadlift. In contrast, Olympic weightlifting uses only two – the snatch and the clean-and-jerk.

Leah Marietta, sophomore in kinesiology, squatted 331 pounds, bench pressed 175 pounds and lifted 320 pounds in the deadlift to earn third in her weight class at the Women's Collegiate National Powerlifting Championships.

K-State does not have a powerlifting team, so Marietta said she usually works out by herself.

She joined a private gym in Manhattan, because she said she doesn't like the big crowds at the Peters Recreation Complex.

Judy said she hopes to see a powerlifting team at K-State in the near future.

"There are some universities that take whole teams to nationals," she said. "It would be fun to have something like that at K-State."

Leah agreed that being part of a team adds to the powerlifting experience.

"A lot of the Southern schools have huge teams," Marietta said. "Every time one of their lifters gets up there, people are in front of the platform yelling and screaming."

Marietta said she is not aware of any other powerlifters at K-State, so the chances of getting a team might be slim. Even so, she won't have to lift alone next year.

Marietta's younger sister Lora also is a powerlifter and plans to attend K-State in the fall.

"I'm really excited about her coming here," Marietta said.

Students each receive $1K for cancer research

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State student researchers are being honored for their work on helping fight the battle against cancer.

Fifty undergraduate students received awards for cancer research from Johnson Center for Basic Cancer Research.

Students each received $1,000 for their work, and each mentoring faculty member also received $1,000 to help with research expenses. All donations are provided from private donations, most from endowed funds.

One award winner, Erica Hutfless, senior in microbiology, has been working on research titled "Effects of N-Glycosylation on Baculovirus Fibroblast Growth Factors."

Hutfless said she looked at sugars on protein and analyzed the increase or decrease in protein activity by adding and subtracting extra sugars.

In cancer patients, she said extra sugars show up when the protein is present. Hutfless has been working on the research under the guidance of Lorena Passarelli, assistant professor of biology.

When she heard she would be receiving an award for her research, Hutfless said she was happy and thankful. As a first-generation student, she said any additional funding for school is greatly appreciated.

Hutfless said she enjoys research and finding out new things.

"I've learned a lot because I've learned all the techniques," she said. "There's just so much to learn.

"I could write a whole paper about what I've learned."

Chelsea Wright, senior in nutritional sciences, has been analyzing the anti-cancer drug Bleomycin, which has had positive and negative effects on patients.

Wright said receiving an award for her research has been an added bonus.

"It was really an honor, because I loved what I was doing," she said.

Kathryn Miller, senior in animal sciences and industry, researches the effects of TGF-Beta reducing tumor growth. Miller said a lot of research has been done, but she and others are working on reproducing, extending and duplicating previous research.

Miller received an award from the center and said she was excited with the honor.

"It has made the work a lot more rewarding," she said. "It can be very rewarding when you work on something for three months."

Marcia Locke, public relations and outreach coordinator for the center, said the number of students honored has increased over the last several years. The award has been changed from $500 to $1,000, and Locke said the center wanted to increase the awards value to honor students who have excelled.

"We've really tried to push this program," she said. "We wanted it to be more awarding. We're getting more students into cancer-related research."

Locke said most people have been affected by cancer in some way, and the center has tried to encourage students to work in research related to a timely concern.

The center has become significantly more visible, and faculty have helped to provide laboratory experience for students, Locke said.

"Things are growing," she said. "We have more faculty at K-State that are doing cancer-related research.

"K-State does an excellent job of getting undergraduates into the laboratory. We want to be a part of that."

House OKs school finance bill

By John Milburn
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – The House tentatively approved a $532.7 million, three-year school finance plan Tuesday that is smaller than one supported earlier by a bipartisan coalition.

On a 63-62 vote, the bill was sent to final action, which is expected Wednesday morning. It would return to the Senate heavily modified with policy provisions, but slightly less than the $541 million approved by senators last week. Negotiations on a final version could begin later in the day.

Both bills include additional money for all school districts, money for students at risk of academic failure, increases in special education and $75 million in teacher pension contributions.

House Speaker Doug Mays said he expected the bill to pass by the same margin, but that it's better than the $633 million plan passed by a coalition of moderate Republicans and Democrats in March and reinserted temporarily in the bill Tuesday.

"It's a stronger position because leadership's behind it," Mays, R-Topeka, said of the bill.

The bill's final composition was the product of an amendment offered by Rep. Mike O'Neal, R-Hutchinson. A similar version that included the same money as the Senate plan was rejected on a 62-62 vote.

However, Rep. Mario Goico, R-Wichita, returned later in the day from being out of state and cast the deciding vote for O'Neal's amendment, sending fellow conservative Republicans into cheers.

Because both chambers had previously passed a school bill, Tuesday's debate wasn't necessary and negotiations already could have started. However, Mays said he went forward in hopes of finding a bill that could garner more support.

"We're trying to be fair," Mays said.

Both chambers would rely on existing state revenues to fund their proposals, though budget projections show the third year could cause the state to exhaust all available revenues and be faced with a deficit, something prohibited by state law. Last year, the Kansas Supreme Court ruled that the state wasn't spending enough on its public schools or distributing the dollars fairly.

Pottery sale offers handmade ceramics to students

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lazare Rottach, graduate student in fine arts, held up two mugs, each with a dark brown glaze. While they initially might look identical, Rottach said he will make the same style of piece but alter the design.

"It's a mug, but there are different forms," he said. "You mix it up as you go."

Handmade pottery of all shapes and sizes can be purchased at the K-State Potter's Guild pottery sale this week. The sale, which started Monday, will continue through the rest of the week as long as there are pieces to sell, Rottach said. The sale is from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. in the Bosco Student Plaza.

About 15-20 artists provide pieces for the sale, and Rottach said he has made more than 300 pieces to sell.

The price of a piece is dependent on how much time was spent on the work and the skill required. Rottach said he tries to keep the price reasonable.

"You take into account that it's handmade," he said, "but I don't want a mug that's $20, not even if it is handmade."

Rottach said the sale has been successful this week and said the guild hopes to get more pottery to sell in the last few days.

"We've been selling like crazy as you can see," he said as he pointed to the emptying tables. "We had eight tables full of pots at the beginning, and tomorrow, we'll have about three."

Some of the most commonly purchased items include vases, platters and big bowls. Rottach said variety sells, and people like to compete to find the best pieces.

Rottach said he thought the guild would raise about $4,000-$5,000 during the week's sale.

"It depends on how many we sell," he said.

About 70 percent of the sale's proceeds go to the artist, and 30 percent goes to the guild, covering the cost for conferences and other organizational expenses.

Machiko Yamazaki, graduate student in fine arts, said she has made about 200 pieces for the sale. Yamazaki said making a number of pieces has been helpful in perfecting her skills as an artist.

"It's good practice," she said.

Sunny Shultz, graduate student in fine arts, said the sale provides creative, handmade items for people to buy. She said a lot of students have stopped by the sale to purchase pieces for family members, especially Mother's Day gifts.

Lauren Choi, graduate student in family studies and human services, looks through pottery at the annual Potter's Guild sale in the Bosco Plaza Tuesday afternoon.

Shultz said the response from students and faculty has been encouraging.

"The K-State faculty and workers have supported us for so many years," she said. "We really appreciate that."

New county touch-screen voting system demonstrations to be available to public

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Demonstrations for the new touch-screen voting machines that will begin August 1 are available throughout Riley County.

The demonstrations are open to the public and will be at different locations across the community, said Jolene Campbell, Riley County deputy clerk.

Demonstrations also are available at the county clerk's office, 110 Courthouse Plaza, when the two existing machines are not in use at the scheduled demonstrations, Campbell said.

She said additional demonstrations can be arranged by calling the Riley County clerk office.

"The demonstrations are beneficial because when people go to make their actual vote they'll be comfortable with the machine," Campbell said.

The touch-screen voting machines are the new voting device for Riley County after they were approved by the Riley County commissioners on Dec. 5, said Joy Mendez, Riley County election clerk.

Mendez said 175 machines were purchased for $548,870, which was funded both by the federal government and Riley County.

The 175 machines are expected to arrive by the end of the month, Mendez said.

One of the benefits of the machines is their adaptability to the disabled, Mendez said.

She said the machines come with a sip-and-puff-device that allows a person to inhale or puff a number of times into the device to make their selection on the ballot without having to use their hands.

"Headphones are also available with the machines, as well as braille buttons," Mendez said.

The demonstrations were done on Thursday at the K-State Student Union, and the Meadowlark Hills Retirement Community on April 18, Campbell said.

She said the touch screens have had a good response, and people have been pleased with them because of their simplicity.

Riley County Clerk Rich Vargo said the two machines are taken out to the demonstrations, and the ballots are already programmed.

Vargo said the demonstrations are completely hands-on.

"We want to show people how easy it really is," Vargo said, "That way people aren't intimidated."

Kathy Johnston, special events coordinator at Meadowlark Hills Retirement Community, said the demonstrations done there on April 18 went well.

"Most of the residents thought it was pretty easy," Johnston said.

She said during the demonstrations the officials explained how to use the machines as the residents used them.

"The officials did a fantastic job," Johnston said. "They made sure the residents understood everything before they left."

Johnston said the demonstration at Meadowlark Hills was such a success that they invited the demonstrators to come back, in order to refresh some people and for those who were unable to attend.

Upcoming demonstrations for touch-screen voting machines

- 8:30 to 9:30 a.m. today, Riley County Senior Center
- 9:30 to 11:30 a.m. May 8, Pottorf Hall, CiCo Park
- 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. May 9, Manhattan Town Center up one hit and struck out one batter. Junior Bryan Dobyns relieved Ozga and pitched a solid second and third innings, giving up only one run on two hits. He took the loss, however, to move to 1-4 on the season after he could not retire a batter in the fourth inning giving up all six Wildcat runs before being pulled from the game.

The Coyotes brought in four more pitchers in the game and they combined to surrender eight more runs off 11 hits while striking out only three.

The Wildcats totaled 18 hits while the Coyotes could only manage six.

K-State began the scoring in the second inning when freshman Jordan Cruz hit a single to bring in freshman Nate Tenbrink, giving the Wildcats a 1-0 lead.

The one run was not enough to take down the Coyotes, so the Wildcats used the fourth and fifth innings to add insurance runs to cement the victory.

Sophomore Cris Tapia began the onslaught in the bottom of the fourth inning when he hit a 2-0 pitch over the right field wall for his third home run of the season.

He said it was nice to get one because he has not hit the ball well recently.

"It felt pretty good to get another one," Tapia said. "I've been struggling this season, so I have been working on some new things the past couple weeks. I felt real good at the plate tonight, and I took a lot of RBI swings and good things happened."

Cruz drove in two more runs in the fourth with a single to left field, and freshman Rob Vaughn and junior Eddie Vasquez both drove in a run to give the Wildcats a 6-0 lead after the fourth inning.

Freshmen Byron Wiley, Drew Biery and Nate Tenbrink all added to the Wildcat attack when they scored in the fifth inning to give K-State a 9-0 lead.

Kansas Wesleyan scored its only run in the top of the sixth when Gulla homered to left center field, and the Wildcats answered with five total runs in the seventh and eighth innings to give them the final 14-1 score.

Tapia went 2-for-3 with one RBI and one run scored, which came off his home run.

Vasquez, Biery, Cruz and Wiley combined for nine RBI off 12 hit, combining for half of the Wildcat runs.

Tenbrink went 3-for-3 on the evening, and he crossed the plate five times.

He said he was happy to get some playing time, and he hopes the team can build from this victory.

"We did everything right tonight," Tenbrink said. "We got a lot of hits and played great defense.

"It was nice to finally win a close game, and hopefully we can build off the intensity that we showed tonight and pull some more W's."

accountability is gametime," said Patterson, who has had 41 players named to the Big 12 Conference Academic First Team. "It's not getting up at 6 a.m., it's not a scolding, it's not an office visit to the head coach – it's the thing they love, and that's gametime."

B.J. Kissel, relief pitcher for the K-State baseball team and senior in mass communications, said the baseball coaches have their own way of punishing athletes who skip class.

"In baseball, if you get caught, you touch every step in the football stadium at 6 a.m.," Kissel said. "If you get caught twice, you have to do it twice and three times you're done."

SURGICAL APPROACH

Hughes said the number of student athletes is so great that to check on them all would be a waste of manpower.

"We have 450 athletes, and they are scattered throughout campus, in all kinds of different majors, in all kinds of different degree programs, so there is no logistical way you can monitor attendance on all of those individuals," Hughes said.

"You have to have a surgical approach to check on the attendance or the effort of very specific individuals. We might check on five students any given day, and the next day we might check on 10 or 15 students."

Dana Reinert, program assistant dean of Human Ecology and a former expository-writing graduate teaching assistant, acknowledged positive experiences with the athletics department – when she had five student-athletes in her class in spring 2004.

"They had a program liaison for English, so there was someone that, every week, we reported to that liaison how the students were doing and give an estimate of their grade and what days they had missed that week," Reinert said.

BEHIND THE NUMBERS

Along with tracking the progress of student athletes at K-State, Hughes said the ALC looks at the graduation rates of K-State's 11 varsity sports.

Until the 2005-06 school year, the NCAA used the U.S. Department of Education graduation rate, called the Federal Rate, to track the number of scholarship athletes who left a university with a diploma. This year, the NCAA changed its format for figuring graduation rates, called Graduation Success Rate (GSR), to more accurately gauge the number of athletes graduating from a university, Hughes said.

Hughes said although K-State still reports the Federal Rate, the rate is a raw statistic and is not an accurate reflection of graduation rates.

"It talks about who came in on scholarship, on a particular team and then six years later, who graduated," Hughes said. "No one is removed from the rate. Not if you die; not if you leave in good standing or whatever it is; it's a raw statistic."

Under the new GSR, which was figured using 1995-98 graduation statistics, Hughes said factors such as transferring, leaving school or entering into professional sports are now taken into account.

"For the first time this year, the NCAA says that students who leave the university in good standing, they transfer or go professional are taken out of the rate," Hughes said. "In turn, transfer students who come into the program on scholarship are added into the rate, to make it a little more accurate."

Under the Federal Rate, which is currently figured using 1998-2002 graduation rates, seven of the 11 varsity sports have less than a 60 percent graduation rate. Women's basketball, tennis and golf were the only varsity sports over the 60 percent mark, with women's golf having the highest graduation rate at 75 percent. On the men's side, only football had a graduation rate over 50 percent (56), with the men's basketball and baseball teams being the lowest at 33 percent.

In contrast, the new GSR formula shows women's basketball and golf at a 100 percent graduation rate, with football at 75 percent, men's basketball at 80 percent and baseball at 57 percent.

K-State's overall GSR stands at 74 percent compared with the NCAA's overall GSR of 76 percent.

TRUST ISSUE

Patterson said she trusts her players to make it to class, and if they don't, they suffer the consequences.

"Often times, I'm not necessarily into the spying concept because I think as a coach on gameday, when you recruit, when they're on their own as well as when they're in the class, you have to be able to trust them," Patterson said. "I recruit players that I want to be able to trust."

GTM | Company expected to add 500 new jobs over next 10 years to 200,000 square feet through multiple expansions over the next decade, Pagen said.

The company is expected in the agreement to hire 500 new employees in the next 10 years to add to its current 240 employees. President Dave Dreiling said that is a safer number.

"I really think we could make 600 to 800 jobs," Dreiling said.

He said he expects large amounts of growth in coming years, and plans to meet the performance requirements for any assistance given.

"We're in a $52 billion industry," Dreiling said. "We're sitting here with a puny $20 million of it, so we feel we've got room to grow."

John Exdell of the Flint Hills Living Wage Coalition told the commission his organization believed the GTM should not get the economic assistance because they said its employees aren't paid well enough.

"We have nothing against GTM of Manhattan. The issue is whether we should subsidize its expansion ... we think this fails the living wage test quite substantially."

Dreiling disagreed, saying his employees are paid well. He said he has many who don't have college degrees but make more than $100,00 each year.

GTM pays a starting wage of $7 per hour, Dreiling said, and it goes up to $7.50 per hour after 90 days. He said he plans to raise the starting wage to $8 per hour soon to attract more employees.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, supported Dreiling at the meeting and said the average K-State student works through college and takes more than four years to graduate.

"We need local jobs, and his plan provides local jobs," Bosco said.

Senate passes sex offender legislation on to House for approval

By Carl Manning
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – Getting tough on child molesters and other sex offenders has been a priority for legislators since the start of the session, and now they're in position to send a bill to the governor to do just that.

But there could be a problem – another bill hitched to the sex offender legislation. A House-Senate conference committee bundled the crime bill with another allowing private prisons in the state to hold Kansas inmates.

The Senate voted 33-7 Tuesday to send the bill to the House, which last year refused to debate private prisons. Because it's a House-Senate conference committee proposal, House members must either accept or reject both ideas.

"We'll run it. There's no way to tell whether it will pass," said Speaker Doug Mays, R-Topeka.

Some see it as a power play by senators.

"It doesn't play well with me. It's not a game," said Rep. Shari Weber, R-Herington. "Children abused and exploited shouldn't be held hostage by the personal views of the leadership of the Senate chamber."

If the House rejects the bundled bill, negotiators could remove private prisons and leave the portion modeled after Florida's "Jessica's Law," named for a 9-year-old Florida girl who killed last year by a convicted sex offender. Virginia, Oregon and Arkansas this year enacted their versions of "Jessica's Law."

The bill calls for a minimum 25-year sentence for adults convicted of any of seven violent sex crimes against anyone under 14, including rape, aggravated sodomy and sexual exploitation. Trial judges could impose a lesser penalty in cases with "substantial and compelling" reasons.

"There are two policies in this bill. The right way is to separate them," said Sen. Jay Scott Emler, R-Lindsborg.

Sen. Greta Goodwin, D-Winfield, said it's cheaper to contract with a private prison than to have the state build a new facility.

"We don't have a lot of options to take care of a lot of prisoners," said Goodwin, D-Winfield.

The Department of Corrections would license and regulate the facilities and private operators would build and operate them in counties where voters approve the idea.

"They are going to cherry pick. They are going to pick the best and leave the worst," said Sen. Phil Journey, R-Haysville.

But Sen. John Vratil, R-Leawood, disagreed, saying the state would decide which inmates a private prison would take.

Senate Majority Leader Derek Schmidt said at least 30 other states have private prisons, and noted that corrections officials estimate the increased penalties for sex offenders would generate the need for an additional 1,000 prison beds by 2016.

Schmidt, R-Independence, said while Woodson County in his district wants a private prison, the bill leaves it up to the secretary of corrections to decide where any facility will be located.

While Kansas law prohibits housing state prisoners in private facilities in the state, they can be housed in private facilities in other states.

Those convicted a second time, no matter the victim's age, would face 40 years and third-time offenders would get life without the possibility of parole.

Once released after serving every day of their sentences, offenders would face a lifetime of parole and wearing a Global Positioning System monitoring bracelet so their movements could be tracked.

All other offenders, such as first-time convictions in which the victim is older than 14, face lifetime parole when released. If they violate parole, they must wear the tracking bracelet for life.

The bill also makes it a crime to entice someone on the Internet or telephone if they believe the person is a child.

The Kansas Bureau of Investigation has nearly 4,000 registered sex offenders in its public database dating to 1994.

Share a secret, see a secret

Postcard service allows anonymous people to share their innermost thoughts, feelings

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"Take a postcard, or two.
Tell your secret anonymously.
Stamp and mail the postcard."

These are some of the brief words director Frank Warren offered when he embarked on the PostSecret project.

It started in November 2004 without a specific purpose, Warren said. In the beginning, Warren made 3,000 self-addressed postcards and distributed them randomly. He scattered them everywhere, he said, from bus stops to the pages of library books.

A few weeks passed, and the postcards began to fill his mailbox. Warren recalls the first returned postcard.

"It didn't really even look like a postcard," he said. "It looked like two shopping lists, but squeezed in the corner it said: 'I am still struggling with what I've become.'"

Warren said he receives hundreds of postcards each day.

"I get 100 to 200 everyday," he said. "Surprises every day in the mail."

After weeks of getting the distributed postcards filled with secrets, he said he began to see more and more homemade and self-crafted postcards in the mail.

The cards – or rather, secrets – were eventually used in an art exhibit in Washington, D.C.

"The cards just kept coming," he said. "I had to come up with something to do with them."

Warren's Web site, www.PostSecret.com, which has about 3 million visitors each month, is in conjunction with the cards. Each Sunday, he updates the site with a posting of 20 to 30 new cards.

"I post about 1-2 percent of how many I get each week," he said.

Warren also published "PostSecret: Extraordinary Confessions from Ordinary Lives," a compilation of postcards he has received.

The postcards reveal secrets exposing people's rich interior lives, he said.

"The postcards illuminate that landscape," he said.

Some of the cards seem to express anger, some read as self-confessions, and others lean on the side of humor.

In 2005, Warren was contacted by members of the popular punk band All-American Rejects about using some of his postcards for their music video "Dirty Little Secret."

Warren said the band offered to pay him for the use of the postcards, but he instead suggested it donate money to the National Hopeline Network, a suicide prevention hotline that was struggling financially.

"He's a supporter and volunteer," Hopeline founder Reese Butler said about Warren's relationship with Hopeline. "He has raised awareness through his Web site and book."

Butler said PostSecret is a good way for people to express secrets anonymously.

"PostSecret is phenomenal," he said. "It's a great adaptation with total anonymity and no risk."

The Web site displays secrets that connect and normalize people, he said.

"It's just so important to break down stigmas," Butler said.

Butler said there were more than 900 responses to the plea, and about $30,000 was raised by PostSecret bloggers.

"The amazing outpour literally saved Hopeline," Butler said, "and it re-energized our spirits."

Erin Schroeder, creator of the Facebook.com group "PostSecret," said she has been a fan of the Web site since fall 2005.

"I've known about it since last semester, and now I check it every week, and I have the book," said Schroeder, junior in elementary education.

Although not everyone has personally experienced some of the secrets displayed, viewers can relate to most everything posted, she said.

"It shows a side of people you would never know," she said. "Even if you haven't experienced it, you can relate to almost everything."

Schroeder said the project helps connect people by allowing them to share secrets they might have in common with strangers.

Warren lives in Germantown, Md., with his wife and 11-year-old daughter. His family has learned to live around the thousands of postcards and is supportive of the project.

"We just kinda deal with it," Warren's wife, Jan, said. "It's amazing he's still getting all these secrets."

She said it is her husband's project, and she and her daughter just go about their daily lives.

"The postcards fulfill him," she said. "I've always been a big supporter. He's happy, and he's making the right decision with the project."

Warren isn't concerned about fame and money from the cards, the book or the Web site, Jan said.

Warren's wife said he has helped more people than he will ever know.

"He's the middleman without judgment," she said. "He has created something that allows people to bear their souls."

While Warren continues to receive hundreds of postcards each day, he has respect for the people behind the secrets, Jan said.

"He has the utmost respect for all of the secrets," she said, "and he truly honors that. It's about him reaching as many people as he can."

'Stick It' not a masterpiece, but an enjoyable flick

"Stick it"
★★★★☆
Movie review by Eileen Laux

"Stick it" is a term gymnasts use to solidify a landing. The film "Stick It" just debuted in theaters and the majority of reviews have not been promising. Written and directed by Jessica Bendinger ("Bring It On"), I thought it would be a ripoff of "Bring it On," but I was pleasantly surprised.

However, when I read a bad review for a movie, I usually disagree with the critics. Most of the press have said the film doesn't stick. But they said the same thing about many movies I have enjoyed in the past.

The movie centers around 18-year-old Haley Graham (Missy Peregrym), a rebellious teen who was once part of the straight-laced, disciplined world of gymnastics. Haley is now one of the most hated women in the sport, because she walked out of her portion of the World's Championship and cost Team USA the gold medal.

Haley finds herself in trouble with the law and is sentenced to the rule-centered world of the Vickerman's Gymnastics Academy (VGA). She is not happy, but after negotiations with her coach, Burt Vickerman (Jeff Bridges), who has a reputation for producing injury-ridden athletes, she agrees to train and compete. But she refuses to do the same tired routines and follow the rules.

Her teammates soon follow suit and want to win the competition on their own terms. The movie centers around what many people feel about some sports: that the old rules should be updated.

Frank and Poot (Kellan Lutz and John Patrick Amedori, respectively) provide most of the movie's comedic banter. Joanne (Vanessa Lengies), Mina (Maddy Kurley) and Wei-Wei (Nikki SooHoo), plus several professional gymnasts, compose the rest of the team and provide opposition and team unity.

I didn't expect the movie to be amazing. But I enjoyed the one-liners, the story line and the bad-ass attitude of the female characters, mainly the defiance presented by Haley.

Overall, I liked the movie. It had a blend of humor, drama and gymnastics. Yes, the movie may have been unrealistic, but isn't that what we go to the movies for? No gymnast could bounce back into shape in a couple of weeks after being retired for a while. However, last time I checked, giant machines weren't attacking and super-heroes weren't flying around.

"Stick It" | BUENA VISTA PICTURE

While most may not be rushing out to see the film, at least give it a try when it comes out on video.

DAILY HOROSCOPES

Taurus
(April 20 - May 20)
You're fussing with your hair too much. Perhaps you should temporarily cut back on shampoo, or at least demand real poo.

Gemini
(May 21 - June 20)
An elderly Chinese gentleman will drop by for a visit. You'll spend the entire visit in complete silence, except for the occasional clink of a teacup in a saucer.

Cancer
(June 21 - July 22)
You will invent a modernized version of the ancient game of horseshoe throwing. You will call it "hubcaps." This will have several advantages over the older game, not least of which is that a car doesn't beat you up when you try to steal its hubcaps.

Leo
(July 23 - Aug. 22)
Today you will decide to have a bit of illicit fun and will slip bits of dry pasta into other people's pockets, shoes, etc., when they're not looking. Good advice: don't get caught.

Virgo
(Aug. 23 - Sept. 21)
Today you will break all the resolutions you made yesterday, and you will grin.

Libra
(Sept. 22 - Oct. 22)
While looking through comparative salary figures, who will discover that the job of "village idiot", in many metropolitan areas, pays better than that of the mayor. Don't even consider a career change, though — it's a lot harder that it sounds.

Scorpio
(Oct. 23 - Nov. 21)
You will accidentally throw your back out. Not only will that really hurt, but the trash guys will get really surly when you ask for it back.

Sagittarius
(Nov. 22 - Dec. 21)
Today you will receive a gift horse. Unfortunately, it will have a really horrendous case of gingivitis.

Capricorn
(Dec. 22 - Jan. 20)
As you are walking along, you will notice someone leaning back in a chair. You should stop and insist that they bring their seatback to a full upright and locked position until the captain has turned off the "remain seated" sign.

Aquarius
(Jan. 21 - Feb. 18)
You will be detained by the police today, on suspicion of having removed a tag from a mattress. Eventually they will let you go with just a warning.

Pisces
(Feb. 19 - March 20)
Good day to do crossword puzzles in the park. Life is short enough, without letting it get you all stressed out like that.

Aries
(March 21 - April 19)
Three kings from arid countries will wander by, leading their horses, and apparently searching for something. This will seem innocuous at first, but later, you'll start to worry.

New scan system to eliminate ticket reuse

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Airline passengers get more seat space than patrons of the student sections at Snyder Family Stadium.

The bench seats where thousands of K-State students spend football games are numbered to give each student 16 inches of actual bench, said Robin Fosha, director of ticketing for the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

Meanwhile, Delta Airlines gives its economy passengers at least 17 inches in seat width, according to its Web site.

Fosha said all but one section of the public benches in the stadium are measured to have 18 inches of space per seat. The students get less, she said, because they rarely sit down and need less space for standing room.

"It's fairly standard. Some schools actually go a little smaller than that," she said.

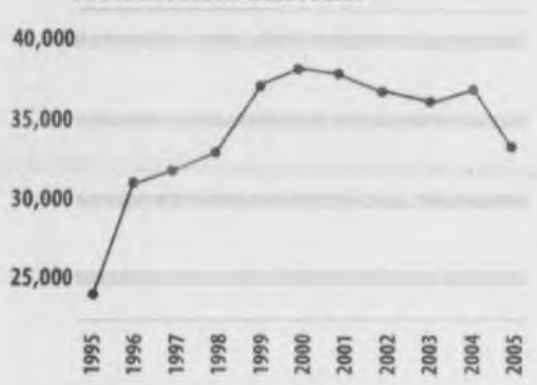
She said the spacing requires a bit of packing to get everyone in.

The result is that the general admission section can quickly resemble a sardine can as students must stand at an angle to fit on the benches.

Many students believe the athletics department oversells the section, but Fosha said the student section never sells out.

The athletics department sets aside 9,500 football tickets and 5,900 men's basketball tickets for students each spring, she said.

About 1,000 football tickets have gone unsold each year for the last three years, according to ticket operations data. The data said the athletic department hasn't sold more than half its men's basketball tickets in four years.



Fosha said unsold sections of the stadium or Bramlage Coliseum are put up for public sale if they are still available in late July. She said there are eight sections in the coliseum initially set aside for students, but only five were needed this last season.

Another cause of crowding in the student section is ticket misuse, Fosha said. She said the reserved football section usually sells well but is mostly empty during games, likely because its patrons use their tickets to get into the GA section. Also, some students sneak used tickets out to friends for free entry to the games.

Some of those problems might be solved soon. Fosha said a new $120,000 computerized system will be used this fall at the student entrance. She said the system will scan each ticket and check it with a database to make sure they aren't used multiple times.

"It's still going to have a stub," Fosha said, "so if we have problems with the scanners or things aren't reading, we can still stub the tickets."

Football season ticket sales

The belief that there isn't enough room for fans exists in the public seats as well, and some wonder if the arrival of new head coaches Bob Huggins and Ron Prince might boost sales enough to require expansion.

Kurt McGuffin, associate athletic director for development, said he hears demands for more seating even though there are more than 10,000 season-ticketed seats available in the stadium.

Average faculty salaries decline

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

According to a national report issued by the American Association of University Professors, average salaries for full-time faculty members declined by 0.3 percent during the 2005-06 school year, when adjusted for inflation.

This is following a 0.5 percent decrease in 2004-05, the annual report said.

This means faculty salaries have been going up, but not as much as inflation has, said Lloyd Thomas, professor of economics and head of the Department of Economics.

"We're falling behind," Thomas said. "Especially at public universities, salaries have not been keeping pace with inflation."

For the past year, the inflation rate was about 3.6 percent, and faculty members received a typical salary increase of about 2.4 percent, Thomas said.

This is partly because the share of state income the Kansas Legislature grants to higher education is being depleted, Thomas said.

"The Legislature is spending lots of money on highways and quite a bit on K-12 (education), because court decisions have forced them to increase, so higher education is kind of left holding the bags," Thomas said. "It certainly is true that salaries at this university and at others in Kansas have declined relative to inflation, to the price level."

As a result of this shortage of salary funding, Thomas said he has seen the teacher-to-student ratio increase dramatically within the economics department, and more graduate students are being hired to teach, because it is cheaper to pay them than professors.

"I've been here for 30 years, and the number of students has doubled since then, but faculty has increased just a tiny amount," he said.

A number of K-State-specific assessments are completed on an annual basis. These compare K-State to other universities in three specific areas, Ruth Dyer, associate provost, said.

K-State is compared to other Big 12 Conference universities, to universities within the National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges and five peer schools throughout the country, Dyer said.

"We are behind," Dyer said of K-State's rank in professor salaries. "We're behind every one of our peer groups."

For the 2004-05 school year, K-State paid professors about 81 percent of the salaries received by other NASULGC universities and about 85 percent of other Big 12 universities, according to a handout distributed by the office of the Provost.

The five other peer schools K-State is compared to are similar to K-State in the areas of admission, service and size. K-State pays its professors about 87 percent of what these other institutions provide, according

USD 383 votes on beginning assessment

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At Wednesday night's USD 383 Manhattan-Ogden Board of Education meeting, board members voted 7-0 in support of implementing Measures of Academic Progress (MAP), a computerized assessment program for the 2006-07 school year.

This item was approved on first reading but will return for a final-action vote.

"This would follow the children as they move through the system," Carol Adams, director of secondary education, said.

In addition to state assessments, schools currently are required to complete other local tests of varying degrees of quality, according to the recommendation presented to the Board.

The recommendation also stated that these local tests do not provide longitudinal data on students and make it difficult to monitor the achievement of individual students.

Current plans are to assess reading in grades 3-11 and math in grades kindergarten to 11 at least twice a year, Adams said.

The proposed program software will require 12 computers, one in each school, to be set aside as a central file server, and the tests will be administered electronically, Kevin Emery, data management specialist, said.

The cost to start the program is $64,545, which will be drawn from the district's at-risk AYP and data management account.

Future costs will be an annual license fee of $48,995, to be removed from the same account.

One main benefit this new program will provide is the ability to track the progress individual students make over a period of time, rather than comparing students by grade level, Emery said.

"It will compare apples to apples to apples, not apples to oranges to bananas," Emery said.

This program also will make administering assessments an easier task for teachers. Tests will be administered in a computer lab, and an administrative official can access the results online within 24 hours, Emery said.

"The teacher will have the results in her mailbox," he said. "The teacher does not have to print them off and worry about them, and neither will the Ed Center."

This also will be beneficial during parent-teacher conferences, because teachers will be able to see what a student is struggling with and present that information to parents in both numerical data and graphs, Adams said.

"If a child takes a math test and has problems with fractions, the system will kick out a report that says this child has problems with fractions, and parents will receive that information at conferences," board member Pete Paukstelis said. "That's pretty cool."

While results are posted online through the company, students' privacy is guaranteed, Emery said. Further, a Spanish audio tool can be implemented in this program.

This is also in line with the longitudinal data Kansas education commissioner Bob Corkins is activating on a state level, which could put Manhattan ahead of what Corkins is planning for the state, Adams said.

"You see several districts in Kansas saying, 'We want this information, and we're not going to wait for it,'" she said.

In other business, the Board voted 7-0 to pursue further efforts in the utilization of Bluemont School for the 2007-08 school year.

This vote was not a final-action vote, and no action will be taken at this time, board president Randy Martin said.

"It is an effort to go ahead and have a vote of intent on our part and to go ahead and look at the facility and evaluate what it's going to cost," he said.

The final-action vote will be on the Board agenda for a future meeting, and will be publicly announced, he said.

Tsunami warning lifted

NUKU'ALOFA, Tonga — A powerful earthquake struck early Thursday near the South Pacific nation of Tonga, prompting tsunami warnings for as far away as Fiji and New Zealand. But the warning never reached Tonga — and was lifted after a tsunami of less than 2 feet. There were no reports of injuries from the quake or tsunami.

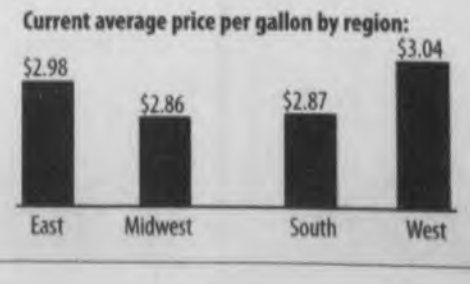
Moussaoui gets life

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui escaped the death penalty Wednesday as a jury decided he deserved life in prison instead for his role in the bloodiest terrorist attack in U.S. history. After seven days of deliberation, the nine men and three women rebuffed the government's appeal for death for the only person charged in this country in the four suicide jetliner hijackings that killed nearly 3,000 people on Sept. 11, 2001.



Gouging penalty gets OK

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The House on Wednesday approved criminal penalties and fines of up to $150 million for energy companies caught price gouging, yet lawmakers acknowledged there is no quick and easy fix to higher pump prices. President Bush summoned Democrats and Republicans to the White House to discuss legislation to address long-term energy concerns.

Rising prices at the pumps

The average American says the price of gas will peak at $3.62 a gallon where they live this year, much higher than the $2.93 a gallon Americans report paying now.

Current average price per gallon by region:

Students aim to educate at demonstration

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Shedding light on sexual violence issues, Take Back the Day participants led a traveling demonstration around campus to increase awareness of sexual assault and offer ideas to inspire students to eliminate sexual violence on campus.

The event took place from noon to 1 p.m. in the K-State Student Union courtyard, from 1-1:30 p.m. in front of Kedzie Hall and concluded at about 2 p.m. in front of Waters Hall.

Sponsored by the K-State Women's Center, Ordinary Women, Wildcats Against Rape and the K-State Department of Women's Studies, the event was created to educate students, not to protest, Saylor Burgess, junior in theater said.

"This all started in my feminist theory class, where we decided that we needed to get a program together to educate students on this issue," Burgess said.

A similar annual event, Take Back the Night, took place April 20.

Take Back the Night is an event in which women walk on Manhattan Avenue to make the point that the women of Manhattan should be able to walk at night and be safe.

"I felt like it was a great name to bring the knowledge back into the daylight," Lisa Gottschalk, junior in social work, said.

It was the first time the event took place, and participants said they hope to continue the demonstration every year, Gottschalk said.

"Silence only re-victimizes the victims of rape," Burgess said.

She said her favorite sign, "We will stop when it stops," is in response to a column in the April 26 Collegian.

Men also participated in the demonstration.

"As men, we need to recognize that we are the ones perpetrating. We also realize that this is affecting us all," Willie Wake, senior in political science, said.

The participants said they understand this is not only a problem at K-State, but also a problem on campuses and communities nationwide.

"A lot of people on campus are not informed about the issue," Whitney DeHart, senior in mass communications, said.

The event was designed as more of an educational opportunity for students to learn about what rape is, she said.

"We are trying to end rape, and in order to do that, we must educate first," DeHart said.

According to a press release, students involved said they felt compelled to bring the issue of sexual assault on campus and in the community of Manhattan into daylight.

"We are breaking the silence," Burgess said.

Businesses celebrate Cinco de Mayo

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Several Manhattan businesses have special events planned to celebrate Cinco de Mayo on Friday.

The cost to enter for those under 18 is $5, and it is free to adults.

Salsa and swing dancing are available every Thursday, but a slightly larger event honors Cinco de Mayo, said Quentin Green, who works at P.J.'s.

Latino music will be played, and free chips and salsa will be available for those attending.

"We usually have something going on," Green said. "The salsa nights here are generally our biggest night of the week."

Texas Star Café, 606 N. 12th St., will have a special menu for Cinco de Mayo on Friday, which will include a wide variety of appetizers, soups, salads, entrées and desserts not typically offered, said Jared Becker, co-manager of Hibachi Hut and Texas Star Café.

"It's not just Mexican, but we take a good cross-section of authentic Latin American and North and South American foods, and we expand the Texas Star menu in the afternoon," Becker said.

This will be the second year the special menu has been offered.

The special menu for this year's Cinco de Mayo consists of three appetizers and two soup and salad selections.

"Last year we had a fun time with it," Becker said. "We had a lot better response than we expected, and it was a weekday last year."

Many dishes on the menu are the same as last year, but a few changes have been made, Becker said.

One new dish is the shrimp and swordfish ceviche, a cold lime-marinated salad with shrimp, swordfish, peppers, onions and avocado.

Becker said one interesting aspect about the entrée is that the meat is cooked by the acid in the lime juice and is not heated.

"It's as close to raw fish as I'll ever feel comfortable serving," he said.

The special Cinco de Mayo menu will be served 4:30-10 p.m. Friday, Becker said.

"We are going to try to make this something that we do each year, where we change the menu a little bit, keep the favorites and add a few things that hopefully will catch on," Becker said.

Also on Friday, a large musical event will be from 9 p.m. until the bars close at about 2 a.m. at the Blue Hills Room, 2317 Tuttle Creek Blvd., said Luis Sainz, owner of LS Productions.

Miguel "Mambo" DeLeon, a salsa band from Kansas City, Mo., will provide live Latino music, and free salsa dancing lessons will be offered 9-10 p.m. by the K-State LatiRitmo Dance Group, said Sainz, senior in management.

Chips and salsa will be provided for refreshments, and a full bar will be available, Sainz said.

As this is the biggest Cinco de Mayo event Sainz said he has been involved with, a large attendance is expected.

"This is probably the first time we're bringing in a big band from Kansas City," he said.

This event is sponsored by the Student Governing Association, Sigma Delta Pi and LS Productions, Sainz said.

Community members, K-State students and faculty and Fort Riley personnel all are welcome to attend, Sainz said.

"I'll always be looking to get everybody involved," Sainz said. "My main goal is to improve diversity in the community."

Residents observe National Day of Prayer

Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's time for a moment of prayer.

Manhattan residents can participate in local events today to celebrate the 55th annual National Day of Prayer.

Events include a time of prayer from noon to 1 p.m. at the Riley County Courthouse Square, 5th Street and Poyntz Avenue, and a prayer watch 2-10 p.m. at City Hall Auditorium, 1101 Poyntz Ave.

Mark Taussig, university landscape architect in the Department of Facility Planning, said about 50 people come for the annual time of prayer.

The time of prayer will be divided into seven-minute increments with prayers directed toward community, schools, the state and soldiers. A time of praise will follow.

"For those of faith, it's a good opportunity to just pause in our busy lives and consider what God has done for us," he said. "It's a once-a-year deal, but we should be doing it every 10 minutes."

Seventeen churches have agreed to lead or spend a prayer watch at the auditorium. A few campus ministry groups also will be represented during prayer, including Trumpeters of God and Midwest Student Ministries.

Manhattan resident Barbara Murphy said prayer at the courthouse has been an annual event for about 10 years, but the time at the prayer watch will be a new event.

Murphy said the prayer time is open to all churches and is an opportunity to release blessings and provision of the nation through prayer.

"We feel like it's necessary to come to God and pray for our nation, because He is sovereign and supreme, and He wants us to come humbly," she said.

Manhattan resident Rose Marie Hoerman is a member of the First Baptist Church and said she plans on spending a few hours in prayer at the auditorium.

"There's a real need for people to recognize that we need to pray for our nation," she said. "Things won't change if we don't get down on our knees to pray."

TO THE POINT

Professors deserve fair salary increases

Professors are a vital part of any university.

They prepare college students for life after their formal education days are finished and provide valuable research to different communities for the dissemination of knowledge.

Although university professors help shape the future and are generally compensated for their time and effort, when it comes time for an increase in that compensation, some professors are left behind.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

According to an American Association of University Professors report, salaries for full-time faculty members declined by 0.3 percent for the 2005-06 school year, after being adjusted for inflation rates. During that time, the inflation rate was about 3.6 percent, while the average salary raise for a professor was only 2.4 percent.

This means the cost of living is going up, but the salary increases are not matching the inflation rate.

The Kansas Legislature needs to take the inflation rate into consideration when it grants money for salary raises.

Without this consideration, K-State might lose professors who want to use their talents and expertise to make this university better.

Not only does the university lose, but so do K-State students. Having fewer professors available to help students leaves some students behind.

The salary increases must allow professors to raise families in the towns they work in and to provide K-State students with a better education.

Smart fight

U.S. should follow Mexico's lead in war on drugs

ZACHARY T. ECKELS

Uncle Jimbo made one of the best quotes I've ever heard on South Park when he and Ned were buying illegal firecrackers. I was assured of Matt Stone and Trey Parker's pure genius when he said, "Hell, everything's legal in Mexico. It's the American way."

This quotation could become much more meaningful in the near future with the passage of the new bill Mexican President Vicente Fox is expected to sign.

The bill, which passed through the Mexican Legislature last week, would decriminalize small amounts of the most popular drugs in their country. According to The Associated Press, this means people could legally possess small amounts of heroin, cocaine, peyote, marijuana, LSD, ecstasy, opium, hallucinogenic mushrooms, mescaline, PCP or amphetamines.

As one could guess, the news of this bill has blindsided our government. On top of previous concerns of drug trafficking, there is now a worry that citizens will cross the border to get their fix and become addicted.

The AP article also said this move could affect our cooperation with Mexico in the war on drugs. For once, I really wished this didn't mean we're going to enforce sanctions just to get our way. It might do us some good to accept that maybe this bill isn't such a bad idea.

Right now, Mexico is fighting a much tougher war on drugs than we could ever imagine. It isn't relying on those stupid commercials nobody could possibly believe about how using pot eliminates the ability to make decisions about anything else in life.

The Mexican war on drugs actually is a war. The number of casualties it has produced has reached more than 1,500 in the past year alone, according to the Washington Post. This number includes police officers, drug traffickers and civilians.

So why in the world would they want to legalize any amount of drugs with all their problems, you ask?

It's simple – the people and addicts who are staying under these minimum amounts aren't the hard criminals Mexico is looking for; they are the victims.

Possessing the amounts required to be a dealer is still going to be illegal. Getting the drug, if the bill passes, will be just as hard for their citizens as it is now.

Let's face it, since Nixon began the war on drugs in our country, we have been harshly punishing both the dealers and the users. With increased risks, the dealers are getting rich, while larger numbers of addicts and recreational users are more often caught and face jail time.

This strategy is obviously not working.

If we really want to do something about the drug problem in the United States, we should start by taking care of the victims. With the taxpayer dollars we could save keeping these people out of jail, we could build methadone clinics to help ease those who suffer addictions. Knowing they can't get in trouble for having their problem, it also might convince many users that it is time to change.

Either way, people are going to be using drugs in the United States. That's a fact, whether they're right or wrong to use. Let's take a lesson from a country that actually needs a war on drugs and start punishing the real criminals. In the words of one of my all-time favorite groups, Steppenwolf: "God damn the pusher-man."

Cheaper medicine controls bipolar disorder

LOLA SHRIMPLIN

$360.

That's what it would cost for me to remain on an even keel for a month with medicine from Lafene Health Center. That's more than my rent. It's more than my car payment. That's for half a 15-milligram tablet of Abilify a day.

Abilify is a medication used to treat bipolar disorder, which I have. I also take Prozac, a well-known drug that treats depression. I can get Prozac at Lafene for $20. At other pharmacies around Manhattan the price is about $60. Personally, I think it's a lot more fun without the medication.

I have a lot of energy. I go for as long as a week without sleeping and get a lot of things done – not very well – but I get them done.

But a drawback to all this energy is a lack of ability to concentrate and remember things. I forget appointments, interviews, what day of the week it is, even what month it is. Sometimes I draw a blank on where I am, but after the caffeine kicks in, I'm fine. It's a sudden "fine," too, as in, "Oh, yeah. I'm at work."

Working nights, and two jobs, exacerbated the situation.

I was working three jobs and going to school, but that was too much. It turns out working two jobs and going to school was too much, too. It was kind of like being hit by a car after you've been hit by a truck.

So I went to Pawnee Mental Health after contacting University Counseling Services and saw an emergency psychiatrist who prescribed Abilify for me again. Then I went to Lafene to get it filled.

The pharmacist was helpful, and I got the pills, went across the hall to check an appointment time, and then I looked at the price. I was sure it had to be wrong, so I went back. Of course, it wasn't. The pharmacist said it is an expensive drug, and he was a little annoyed that I didn't realize what it would cost, seeing how I had taken the four pills they had available when I first went in, and they cost $44.

Hello – mental, here. I can't remember what freaking month it is, and I'm supposed to do math?

I do sympathize, though. I imagine they had to destroy or send back $360 worth of medication because I was too stupid to look at it before I left the pharmacy.

Having this disorder is a little difficult, because I fly into rages over the littlest things, then swing back to the opposite extreme and want to hug everyone I meet.

Some people spend money; I can't keep track of bills, so my phone gets shut off, the electric bill is late, and I have trouble paying rent and car payment on time.

Others sometimes cut themselves to regain control. I get tattoos. When I moved to Manhattan, I had four. Now I have 16.

Hopefully that will stop now that I'm on the medication again. Pawnee Mental Health and a great guy named Terry got me in a program so I can get medication at a lower cost.

Pawnee and Lafene, despite the price of Abilify, are my new best friends. With their help, I hope to regain control again.

Russian veterinary students, faculty tour K-State

By Jonas Hogg
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Russian scholars and students were welcomed to K-State Wednesday with a reception in their honor.

The four students and two faculty are taking a hiatus from their own veterinary studies in Russia to tour the facilities and see the methods used at K-State. The group is split between students and faculty of the Moscow State Academy of Veterinary Medicine and Biotechnology and the Novosibirsk State University of Agriculture. The group is here as part of an exchange learning about K-State's College of Veterinary Medicine.

The exchange is a continuation of a program that last year saw K-State veterinary medicine students and faculty visiting the same universities that have forwarded guests to K-State.

Since their arrival on April 19, the visiting students and faculty have observed lectures, participated in activities at the teaching hospital and toured pet food production facilities – all as part of a comprehensive tour meant to educate about animal science study and methods in the United States.

"The primary objective is for them to learn about how veterinary education is done at K-State and second to that... foster international understanding between U.S. vet and food safety scholars and the Russian Federation," said Justin Kastner, assistant professor of diagnostic medicine and pathobiology.

Wednesday's reception in the K-State Alumni Center was put on by Friends of International Programs, an organization founded in April and led by Ruth Ann Wefald, the wife of K-State President Jon Wefald. Friends of International Programs was founded to support exchange students attending K-State and Wildcats studying abroad.

"Our intent is to do exactly what we're doing this evening, which is welcome our guests," Ruth Ann said in an address to the visitors and guests.

Unlike the U.S. system where students often complete a four-year degree before attending veterinary school, students in the Russian system apply to veterinary school immediately after high school.

This results in second-year veterinary students who, in some cases, haven't celebrated their 19th birthday yet.

The competition to enter the schools and the coursework in the Russian programs can be intense, Moscow student Nina Shestakova said.

Finals for the semester will be in June, she said, and, once completed, will leave her with three years to go.

"We have to do enormous work within those three years," Shestakova said.

Shestakova noted differences between the institutions, saying K-State's high-tech multimedia presentations are rare in Russia, where dictation is still the norm.

Cultural and language differences aside, the motivation to become a veterinarian seems universal.

"I like pets, and I like animals," Novosibirsk student Kirill Dernor said.

But even being selected for the Kansas trip was a competitive venture in itself, said Novosibirsk students Alexsy Zlotin and Mariya Bunyakina. To qualify, the students said they had to pass a language proficiency test and interview with faculty supervisors while continuing their studies.

Visiting professors Denis Oelnoshevsky of Novosibirsk and Alexander Sidorchuk of Moscow said they are using the trip to absorb local knowledge and share some of their own.

Oelnoshevsky, professor of pharmacology and general pathology, was one of the hosting faculty members when Kastner and others from K-State visited Novosibirsk last year.

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Russian student Mariya Bunyakina, left, laughs with Friends of International Program co-president Ruth Ann Wefald during a reception in the Tointon Room of the K-State Alumni Center on Wednesday afternoon.

Lisa Freeman, associate dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, said K-State's emphasis on pharmacology meant there would be a good flow of ideas between Oelnoshevsky and K-State faculty.

Sidorchuk, Moscow State professor, stressed in a short address the concept of cooperation and idea-sharing between universities.

"I think it's a very good idea because the whole world is (a) very close community," he said.

Sidorchuk will give a lecture today on veterinary education at the Center for Veterinary Practice Management, located on the fourth floor of Trotter Hall.

For those who initiated the exchange program by traveling to Russia a year ago, the chance to be host to the friends and colleagues they met was too good to pass up.

"[Oelnoshevsky] practiced hospitality for us," Kastner said, "and we taught him how to cook s'mores."

On May 9 President Wefald will be host to a Victory Day celebration in the Konza Room of the K-State Student Union.

Victory Day is a Russian holiday that commemorates the victory over Nazi Germany in 1945.

Student earns national fellowship to work with government

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sarah Bouker, graduate student in public administration, received a Presidential Management Fellowship, awarded by the U.S. government through its Presidential Management Fellows Program. The award is given to students who have an interest in working in federal service agencies.

About 350-400 students are chosen nationwide to work with a federal agency for two years.

Joseph Aistrup, associate professor and head of the Department of Political Science, said Bouker being chosen as a fellowship winner signifies her hard work and future involvement at the federal level.

"It's a very huge honor," he said. "It's a type of accomplishment that we like to have our students receive."

Earning the fellowship exemplifies Bouker as one of the top students in the nation graduating with this degree, Aistrup said.

"The message I want people to see is that you come and get a degree, and the sky's the limit," he said. "You have outstanding potential to take this degree and win national awards."

Krishna Tummala, professor of political science, nominated Bouker for the award and said Bouker has the experience and drive to make her succeed.

"Sarah is one of the top students," he said. "She has the ability to take this responsibility. She is a very committed young lady to public service."

Bouker said becoming a fellowship member has been a long process, with a decision made by personnel in Washington, D.C.

Bouker found out she was a finalist in March and went to Washington, D.C., to be interviewed by federal agencies. She interviewed with 12 different agencies and received five offers but said some of the agencies still are deciding.

Two agencies Bouker is considering are the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, working in program analysis, and the Department of Homeland Security, working in management and program analysis.

Bouker said she is waiting on final agency decisions and finishing her own research of the various agencies in which she has interest.

Because the program is highly competitive, Bouker said she was not depending on getting far past preliminaries.

"When I found out I was a finalist, I was very surprised because I knew only a few students make it this far," she said.

Bouker said she has long desired to work for a government agency but did not think she would be able to obtain a position early in her career.

"I have wanted to work in the federal government," she said. "That was always my goal, but I thought I would always have to work at the local government level or move to D.C."

"I've met my longtime goal, short-term," she said.

Through the program, Bouker said she will be able to be promoted faster and receive additional training to learn about different areas of the agency in which she works.

In the future, Bouker said she eventually would like to work in international travel, working with the government and going abroad.

Becoming a fellowship winner has taken time, Bouker said, and students should remember to take present opportunities for the future.

"It takes a high amount of motivation," she said. "You have to know where you're heading and set goals for yourself."

Building gates on campus drives to bar cars during peak hours effectively would prevent injury-causing accidents to students

Editor,

I am currently enrolled in Public Speaking II and have recently given a persuasive speech concerning a problem on campus that needs to be fixed. The problem I spoke about was car congestion on campus during the busy times of the day.

I have been here six semesters, and there have been many instances where I have either been clipped by an oncoming vehicle or have seen someone else nearly get hit. This happens because, at the peak hours of the day, from about 10 a.m. to 2 p.m., there is such a large amount of both cars and students on campus that an accident is bound to happen. This is a serious problem that could end in injury or even death.

I think a logical solution to this problem would be to not allow vehicles on K-State's campus from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. This way, students can get to class quicker and without having to worry about cars when crossing Mid-Campus Drive. To regulate this, we would have to put up gates at all of the major entrances to campus. This would be a cheap and effective way to keep cars off campus at these peak hours of the day.

Bryant deserves MVP

CEDRIQUE FLEMMING

3... 2... 1... ballgame.

That's about all the time it took for Los Angeles Lakers All-Star Kobe Bryant to run down the court, pick his spot and sink the game-winning basket in overtime, over two defenders, with no time left on the clock Sunday afternoon.

The victory for the Lakers gave them a 3-1 series lead against the Phoenix Suns in the first round of the Western Conference NBA Playoffs, pretty much putting a dagger in the hearts of Suns fans.

Each round of the NBA Playoffs is a seven-game series, so the first team to win four games moves on to the next round.

I did not like Bryant after he dismantled the Lakers more than two years ago, sending Karl Malone into retirement, Shaquille O'Neal to Miami and Phil Jackson into a one-year hiatus. Jackson has since returned to the Lakers and is a big reason why they are in the playoffs right now.

The other big reason is Bryant, and I'm not talking about the Bryant from earlier in the season.

Bryant has transformed himself into something new, something better. He has mixed his amazing one-man show with a little bit of team play, and that, my friends, is scary.

I don't care what people say – this new Kobe Bryant is the Most Valuable Player, and anybody who doesn't believe that need only look at Game Four.

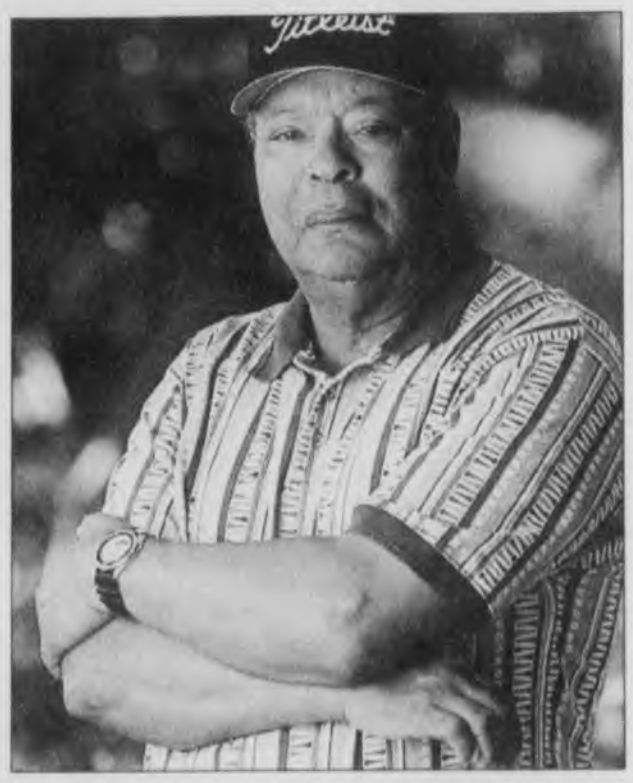
His game-winning shot reminded me of some guy named Michael Jordan, and, in regulation, he got his team involved, and they were the reason the Lakers had a chance to win the game late. The Lakers were trailing most of the game, and Smush Parker hit a 3-pointer late to bring the Lakers closer. He and Luke Walton also caused Suns' point guard and current two-time MVP Steve Nash to cause late turnovers, which frustrated him.

Bryant only took 14 shots, but he had eight assists in the game. Old Kobe would have taken 40 shots and only had three assists. Old Kobe would have lost the game.

The Lakers would have no chance of beating the Suns if Bryant was taking 40 shots a game. Bryant is doing what Jordan used to do, and that is making mediocre players look like All Stars.

The Lakers' Kwame Brown also is starting to look like he can actually live up to the hype of when he was selected No. 1 in the 2001 draft. Lamar Odom also played a huge role in the Lakers winning three games so far in this series.

The Suns have since defeated the Lakers to move the series to 3-2, but that was at home, and the Suns were supposed to win, so I'm not worried about that.



Game Six is 9:30 tonight, and the Lakers will be the home team. I believe having home-court advantage will give them the edge over the Suns. I will go out on a limb and predict the Lakers will become part of a select group of No. 7 seeds to defeat a No. 2 seed, because it's been done fewer than 10 times.

Hopefully the new Kobe can continue to impress me and defeat the Suns tonight. If they do win, I believe they have what it takes to defeat the Los Angeles Clippers and move into the Western Conference Finals.

Cedrique Flemming will be living it up in New York over the summer, but he will be back next year for his senior season to continue writing his awesome columns. You can forever and always e-mail him at sports@spub.ksu.edu.

Earl Woods, best known as Tiger Woods' dad, died from cancer on Wednesday. Woods grew up in Manhattan and was the first black baseball player in the Big-7 Conference.

Tiger Woods' father, former K-State baseball player dies

By Angie Hanson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He might be remembered by most as Tiger Woods' father, but Earl Dennison Woods, who died Wednesday morning at age 74, was a forerunner in integration at K-State – and the country – when he became the first black baseball player to play in the then-Big Seven Conference.

"My dad was my best friend and greatest role model, and I will miss him deeply," Tiger Woods said on his Web site. "I'm overwhelmed when I think of all of the great things he accomplished in his life. He was an amazing dad, coach, mentor, soldier, husband and friend. I wouldn't be where I am today without him, and I'm honored to continue his legacy of sharing and caring."

Earl – a long-time smoker – underwent heart bypass surgery in 1986 and was diagnosed with prostate cancer and treated with radiation in 1998. However, in 2004, the cancer resurfaced and spread throughout his body, according to ESPN.com.

While Woods died in Cypress – where he's lived since March 1974 – his life actually began in Manhattan, when he was born on March 5, 1932, to Miles and Maude Carter Woods.

Earl grew up at 1015 Yuma St., which was located in the segregated part of town, during a time when racial discrimination was the norm. Blacks were not allowed in City Park, they could not eat in restaurants

The K-State equestrian team will wrap up competition today through Sunday in Harrisburg, Penn., at the IHSA National Championships.

To earn the opportunity to compete in the IHSA show players had to place first or second in their class during Zone Championships.

The Wildcats are coming off a disappointing performance at the Varsity Equestrian National Championships in Albuquerque, N.M. In Albuquerque, both the English and Western teams lost in the second round to the No. 1-seeded teams in the tournament. The English team lost to Georgia, and the Western squad lost to the Texas A&M Aggies.

K-State had to win the Zone 9 Championships in English and Western competition to advance to the IHSA Championships. There are only two other Zone 9 teams in the Western bracket at the IHSA Championships – St. Mary of the Woods College and Nebraska. The only other team competing on the English side from Zone 9 will be Indiana.

Head coach Teresa Slough said she feels her team's practices this week have been good enough to be successful this weekend.

"This is the national championship, and competition will be tough," Slough said in a press release. "We are very prepared to face such high caliber competition. I hope to see us succeed."

There will be 17 teams competing on the Western side for the tournament championship and 18 teams in the English bracket.

Junior Casey Finnell earned the most points in Zone 9 this season in the Flat and Fences categories. This honor will allow her to compete for the USEF Cacchione Cup against the top-30 English riders in the nation.

This will be the last event for the Wildcats this season.

Some tracksters to sit out home invitational

By Wendy Haun
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State track team will be host to the Ward Haylett Invitational on Saturday at the R.V. Christian Track complex.

Coach Cliff Rovelto said many athletes won't participate, in order to rest for the Big 12 Outdoor Championships on May 12-14.

"A lot of folks won't compete because it's the week before the conference," he said. "We'll have some people competing in off-events that they wouldn't do at conference just as a sharpening."

Rovelto said this event hopefully will boost the team's confidence.

"I want it to be a positive influence the week before conference," he said.

Freshman Scott Sellers said he has been focusing on the high jump in practice. In his last meet, Sellers placed second in the men's special high jump at the Drake Relays on April 29 with a height of 7 1/2.

"I've been working on the high jump lately, so hopefully I can do some of the things we've been working on in practice more efficiently," he said. "Hopefully a lot of the things that we've been working on in practice I can put to use."

Sellers said he thinks the team will fare well this weekend.

"I think we can do really well because everyone's been training real hard," he said. "I think everyone's feeling pretty confident in their training."

Rovelto said the team's performance this weekend could depend on several different factors.

"A lot of the field eventers will be competing, but for them, they want to have a good experience the week before the conference," he said. "A lot of it depends on weather and conditions, but you hope to have decent conditions so they can have good performances."

There are 12 seniors, including Christian Smith, Coby Cost and Breanna Eveland, who will compete for the last time at a home event.

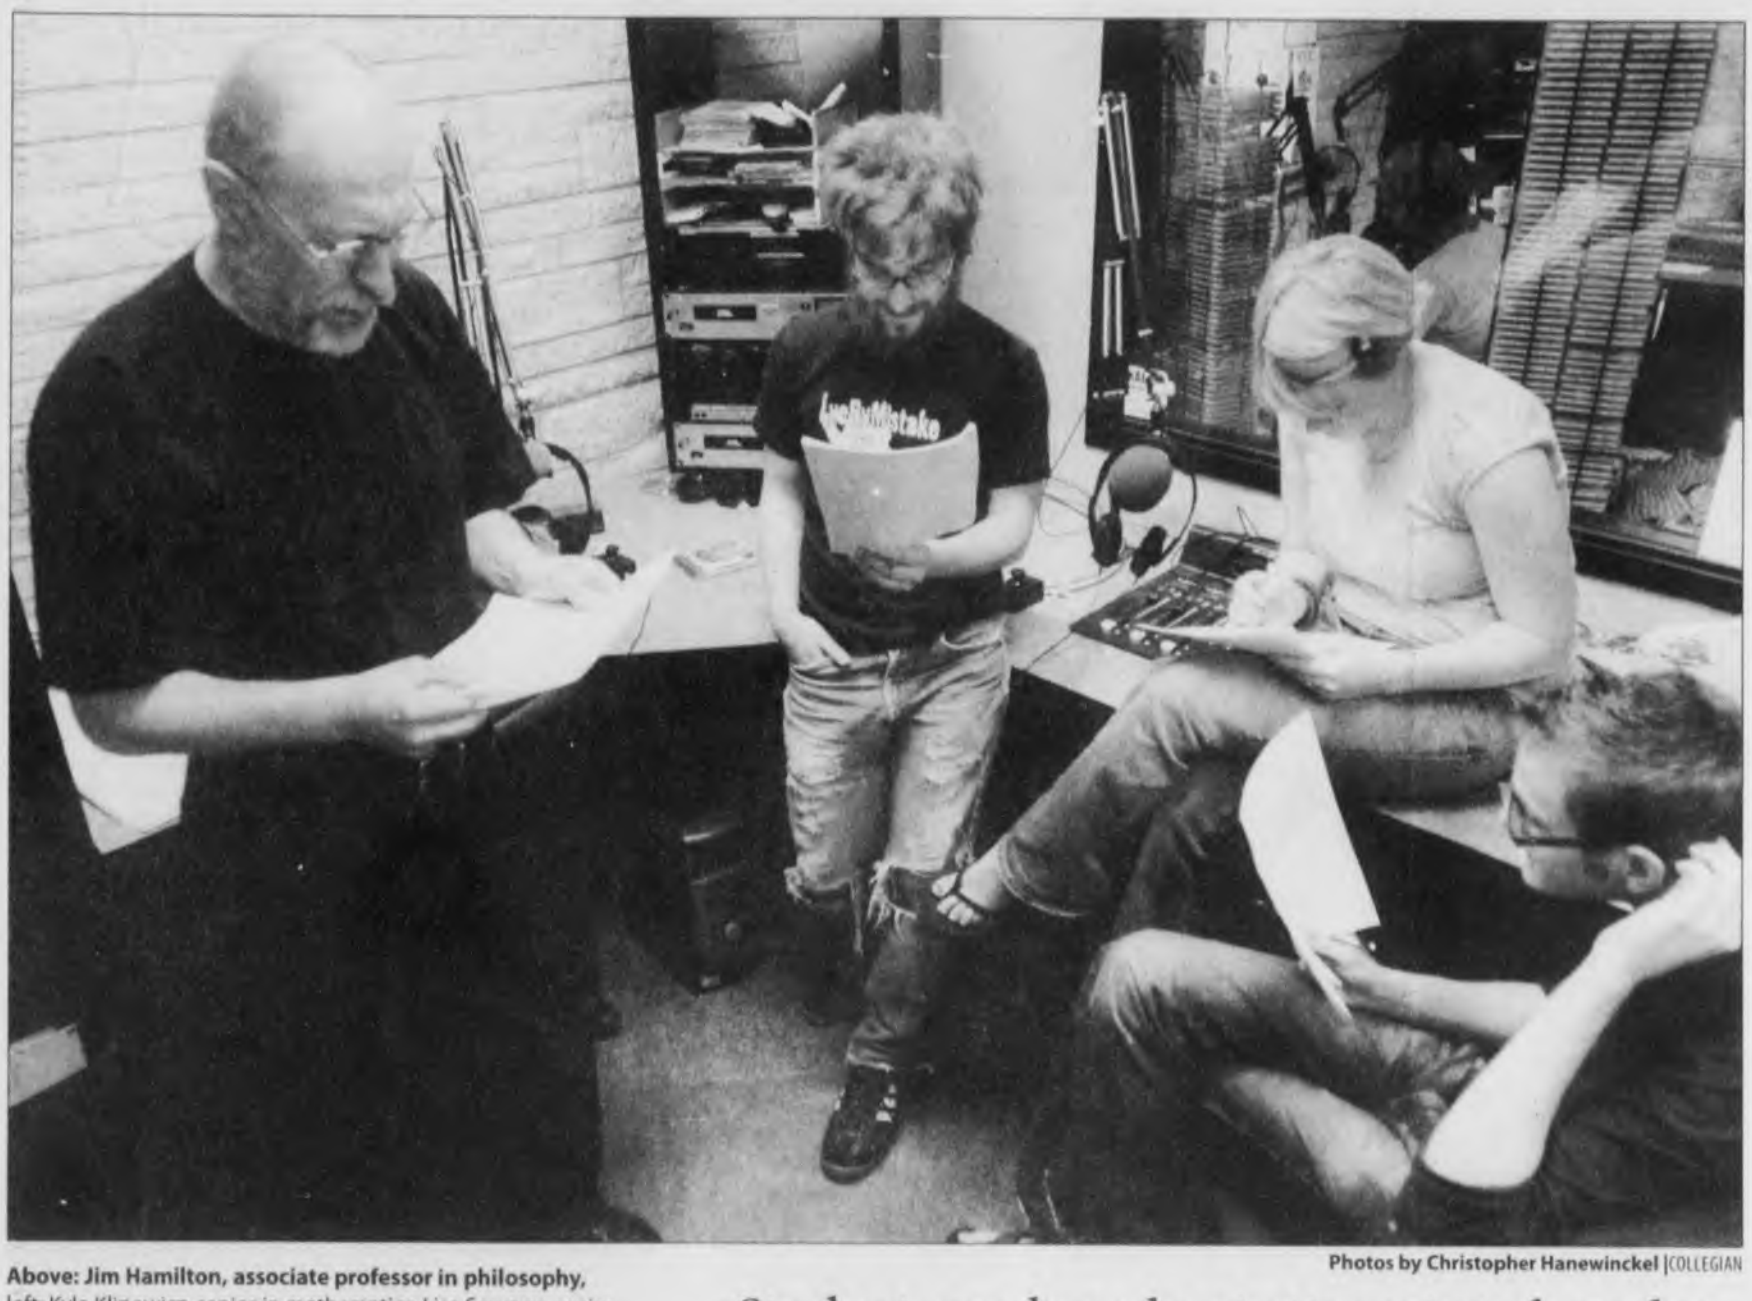
NBA | Suns' Bell receives 1-game suspension

Bell

PHOENIX — The NBA suspended Phoenix guard Raja Bell for one game on Wednesday for throwing Kobe Bryant to the floor in the fourth quarter of Tuesday night's playoff game against the Los Angeles Lakers.



That means the Suns will be without Bell, the principal defender against Bryant, for Game Six Thursday night in Los Angeles.

Phoenix beat the Lakers 114-97 in Game Five, but Los Angeles still leads the best-of-seven series 3-2 and can eliminate the Suns with a victory. In a brief news release, the NBA said Bell was suspended for "excessive and unnecessary contact."

After the team landed in Los Angeles, Suns coach and general manager Mike D'Antoni called the suspension "consistent with what the league has been doing with other fouls of this sort."

One K-State student, aided by the talent and input of several friends, has attempted to take back the radio airwaves and bring the medium back to its golden age.

Kyle Klipowicz, senior in mathematics, created The Radio Project on KSDB-FM 91.9 as an experiment with audio mass communication.

The goal of The Radio Project is to take back the airwaves from the increasingly narrowing venues of expression on public airwaves. It attempts to preserve the design of what radio was intended to be a medium for communication of ideas, stories, humor, drama, information and art, Klipowicz said.

He said he feels radio is straightjacketed by a shallow marketing strategy that is afraid to try anything new because of a desire to appeal to as broad an audience as possible, thus increasing profit margins instead of expanding the public lexicon.

"The Radio Project is subversion," he said. "We create for the sole joy of it, uncaring of advertising demands or public fancy. We make content for ourselves and those willing to expand their views of what qualifies as entertainment."

Klipowicz said because there is a hostility toward shifts in the status quo, The Radio Project attempts to transcend the medium of radio by offering each weekly show as a podcast.

"A podcast is a blog with an RSS enclosure that allows users to subscribe to the content of their choice and have that content delivered to their computers," Klipowicz said. "Anyone with a computer can create a podcast, and anyone with a computer can subscribe to one at no cost."

He said those who work on The Radio Project are interested in democratizing mass media.

"The homogenizing forces of demographic marketing and political control have suppressed any democracy of mass media by watering down any artistic revolution that poses a threat to the status quo," Klipowicz said.

The Radio Project attempts to wrangle control from forces that prevent mass communications from public, democratic discourse, he said.

"The First Amendment secured that those wealthy enough to have a press shall be free to use it," Klipowicz said. "The advent of digital media births a revision to that right: freedom from the press."

Many K-State students and professors have recorded segments for The Radio Project. Among them is Jake Acosta, sophomore in English.

Acosta said he has participated in many episodes of The Radio Project. He has helped write and perform radio dramas and has presented reviews of lesser- known musical artists and played their music to introduce listeners to new music.

Acosta said he also has written and recorded music over which he would read his original poems and stories. He said he has enjoyed working in an unfamiliar medium.

"The visual medium is something that everyone knows and is familiar with," he said. "It was fun and exciting to try and mess around with an audio medium."

Acosta said he thinks The Radio Project is an important program on The Wildcat 91.9.

"(The Radio Project) is good because every other show is a conservative talk show or a DJ playing music," Acosta said.

Lisa Scruggs, senior in fine arts, is another student who has contributed to the radio shows.

She said she has participated in recording old-fashioned radio skits, similar to those aired before television became the primary source of entertainment in homes. In addition, she said she has read her original poetry and told stories.

"I try to contribute my voice and my wit," Scruggs said.

She said she also feels very strongly about the importance of The Radio Project.

"It provides such a different statement than what we normally hear on the college station," Scruggs said.

The Radio Project airs Wednesday night at 12 a.m. on KSDB-FM Wildcat 91.9. The podcast can be accessed online at www.theradioproject.com.

Country rockers No Justice to play singles from 1st, 2nd albums

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Red-dirt country rockers No Justice will perform at 10 tonight at Longhorns Saloon, 1115 Moro St.

The band recently released its self-titled sophomore album. The single "Red dress" has remained in the Texas Country Chart Top 10 for 12 consecutive weeks.

With Steve Rice on acoustic guitar and lead vocals, Brandon Jackson on vocals and rhythm guitar, Jerry Payne on lead guitar, Tony Payne on bass and Armando Lopez on drums, this band has made quite a name for itself on the Texas-Oklahoma border, according the band's Web site.

From Stillwater, Okla., where country greats like Garth Brooks were found, No Justice has formed a growing fan base.

"We've been a band for three and a half years. We were all doing our own things, and we decided to bring our country and rock roots together," Rice said.

"The best general description of their music is a mixture of country and rock," said Bob Mitchell vice president for promotion of Smith Music group, No Justice's record label.

No Justice is known for it's high energy and fun live shows, said Liz McComb, publicist for No Justice.

"They have an unbelievable live show – and I am not just saying that because I'm their publicist – they are young and cool," McComb said.

At the show No Justice will perform singles off of their first album, "Far from everything," and self-titled sophomore album. It also will play cover songs, McComb said.

"Anyone who loves country or rock will love the show," lead singer Rice said.

Red-dirt country music is becoming more and more popular and No Justice is adding to the popularity, according to the band's Web site www.nojustice.com.

Political satire sends post-9/11 message

Donald Sutherland has played plenty of bad guys in his time and in his new film "Land of the Blind" he gets to explore the roots of evil and how the victim can become the tyrant and torturer.

Sutherland

The political satire, which had its premiere at the Tribeca Film Festival this week, stars Sutherland as an imprisoned playwright who convinces a soldier, played by Ralph Fiennes, to help assassinate a tyrannical dictator.

Sutherland, who is first seen in the film battered in a prison cell with slogans smeared in excrement on the walls, said it was important to ask what drives people to evil, and to realize that perceptions of evil vary.

Fiennes said "Land of the Blind" was the latest in a string of political films directly related to current crises.

Film piracy costs Hollywood $6.1 billion

Hollywood's major movie studios lost $6.1 billion in revenues in 2005 to illegal videos, DVDs and Internet downloads, which is about 75 percent higher than previous estimates, the studios' representative said.

In a study released late on Tuesday, the Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA), which represents the major studios in government affairs, said the study is the first to measure losses from Web downloading.

The study showed piracy in Asia is less a problem than in North America and Europe.

It also showed that losses stemmed not only from fewer ticket sales but also from fewer DVD sales which has been one of the growing business arenas in recent years.

MBA group helps promote insect zoo

By Kerry Fischer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Three K-State students are in business, in the bug business that is.

The College of Business Administration offers a masters of business administration practicum option to all of its graduate students as a way to gain real world experience.

"It's the last course in a student's program of study," David Vruwink, assistant dean of accounting, said. "Second-year MBA students take it, and it's their first exposure to real world problems at a management level."

The students are placed into a team by the graduate program director, said Jeff Katz, professor in management.

"Once they're assigned to a team, they have to make it work," Vruwink said.

There are seven projects in the works this semester.

"I like to meet on a weekly basis to get an update on the status of the project, and periodically I check in with the client to see if they're communicating," Vruwink said. "I do that with all seven projects."

Katz said the most important concept he conveys to his MBA group is identifying the nature of the project.

"I think it's important that when they first start, there are a series of interviews with the client to understand the scope, or what the client really wants to have done by the team," he said.

Katz advises the group working with the K-State insect zoo, which opened to the public in 1999, and he said the group spent several hours meeting with the zoo manager to understand the basic ideas.

"The first meeting was over an hour, just seeing the insect zoo and visiting with the manager and seeing how it was structured," he said.

Kiffnie Holt, outreach coordinator for the insect zoo, met with the MBA team at the beginning of the semester to discuss what the zoo expected from the students.

"Our old department head set aside operating funds for us, so we have five years' worth of funds to run things at the current level we do now, and after five years, things are very uncertain. We may just have to shut it down," she said.

The MBA group looked at where the zoo spent its money, from where is receives funding and how it streamlines so it can be self-sufficient, Holt said.

Leaf-cutter ants cut a piece of a leaf to take back to their nest at the K-State Insect Zoo. The zoo acquired the colony on May 1. Leaf-cutter ants grow fungus on the leaves and then eat the fungus.

Katz said the team did a benchmark study to talk to insect zoo directors across the United States to see how they run their zoos and to examine similarities to the K-State zoo.

Holt said one of the key issues with the insect zoo is that people think it is supported by the university.

"We get money from (the university) once in a while, but we really aren't supported all that well," she said.

She said the grant money the former head of the Department of Entomology brought in keeps the zoo in operating.

Holt said the zoo is a really popular place for kids. She also said the zoo has numerous repeat visitors from the community and countless school field trips that visit each year.

The zoo houses many different bugs, from tarantulas to scorpions and millipedes to leaf-cutter ants, she said. The tarantulas and leaf-cutter ants are some of the most popular exhibits at the zoo.

"Most of (the bugs) are from other countries," she said. "We have some cockroaches that we find just in the buildings, but a lot of the animals we trade with other zoos."

Brian Rempe, an MBA student working on the insect zoo project, said the zoo was started for two reasons: "to display the entomology department to the public and secondly as a way to educate kids about entomology and insects. They really never thought about it as a business," he said.

Rempe said he hopes the project will help the zoo think about the business side of operations more than they have in the past.

"They do have a great zoo," said Brad Waller, another MBA student involved with the project. "They are one of the top insect zoos in the nation."

Waller and Rempe said the project has allowed the three students involved to put their talents together.

"We've all kind of complimented each other from the beginning," Rempe said, "but we all separated out and each of us took our own parts."

The group has worked well together during the project.

"We can learn from each other," said Petra Sedlmajerová, the third MBA student on the project. "It's something that can be used."

Rempe said his favorite part of the project hasn't happened yet.

"My favorite part would be two years down the road, I go into the insect zoo and they are using some of the things we talked about and hopefully succeeding," he said.

All three students would do the project again even though it was a lot of work, they said.

"It all fell together and it wasn't overwhelming," Waller said.

Katz said the students have done a great job with their project.

"They are terrific students and I've enjoyed working with them," he said. "They're extremely bright and capable students."

School nurses cope with staff shortage

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cheryl Wiegert, one of the five full-time school nurses for Manhattan-Ogden USD 383, balances her time between three elementary schools and is responsible for the health of about 950 students.

This number has fluctuated throughout the year, and the Fort Riley growth has contributed to an increased number of students, Wiegert said.

The state recommendation is one student nurse cater to 750 regular education students, which means the district is not in compliance with state regulations, Wiegert said.

The district does not have a nursing shortage, but rather has not hired enough nurses, said Michele Jones, coordinator of communications and public relations for the district.

Wiegert, who is the certified school nurse for Marlatt, Woodrow Wilson and Lee elementary schools, said while she tries to establish a weekly schedule, her location depends on the needs of each school.

"It's kind of hard to understand, but we place assignments according to the needs of the building," Wiegert said. "So some nurses will have an assignment that's smaller in numbers but has a lot of needs – for example, a high poverty level or a high number of special aid students or special programs in the building."

The district also has several health aides, who can perform some duties of a school nurse but are not licensed nurses. While these individuals are trained in first aid and CPR, they are expected to call the school nurse if an emergency arises, Wiegert said.

The district has hired one additional school nurse this year, who is filling a vacated health aide position at Marlatt Elementary and also goes wherever she is needed, Wiegert said.

However, even with the addition of a new certified nurse, the district is still not in compliance with state guidelines and additional help might be needed, Wiegert said.

"We've been put on hold with that depending on enrollment and how it changes with Fort Riley expansion," she said. "Our director would like to hire another nurse, but we'll have to see if the numbers continue to incline."

Substitute nurses also can be used, and anyone who is a certified nurse can apply through the education center to be a substitute school nurse, Wiegert said.

Jill Schultz is USD 383 nurse in a similar situation. She said she balances her time between Ogden Grade School, Amanda Arnold Elementary School and Roosevelt School.

Overall, she is responsible for the care of more than 824 students, Schultz said.

Schultz has one health aide at each of her schools and balances time between nursing and teaching, she said.

At the beginning of the school year, school nurses complete vision screening and look through student health forms for any chronic illnesses of which they should be aware, Schultz said.

Some of the chronic illnesses most often seen in schools are allergies, asthma and diabetes, Schultz said.

"It's a wide variety of things," she said. "I have noticed in my schools that I've had some newly diagnosed diabetics."

These students check their blood sugar about three times each day, Schultz said.

"It can be pretty demanding," she said.

Despite the challenges, Schultz said that she loves her job as a school nurse.

"I love working with kids, and I love that it's something different every day – you never know how your day is going to go," Schultz said.

Earthquake off Pacific island nation generates small tsunami

By Pesi Fonua
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NUKU'ALOFA, Tonga – A powerful earthquake struck near the South Pacific nation of Tonga early Thursday, triggering tsunami warnings for as far away as Fiji and New Zealand. But word of the imminent danger never reached the tiny country closest to the epicenter.

There were no reports of injuries from the magnitude-7.9 temblor, about 95 miles south of Neiafu, Tonga, and 1,340 miles north-northeast of Auckland, New Zealand. Authorities lifted the warnings within two hours, after recording a wave of less than two feet.

But nearly 18 months after an earthquake-driven tsunami in the Indian Ocean left at least 216,000 people dead or missing, sparking international calls for a better warning system, Pacific islanders received little or no notice of Thursday's threat.

A warning issued by the Honolulu-based Pacific Tsunami Warning Center first went out 16 minutes after the 4:26 a.m. earthquake, which occurred 34 miles below sea level.

"We usually send it through e-mails, faxes, we make phone calls to the places nearest to the epicenter to make sure people are warned," said Victor Sardina, a geophysicist at the center.

Tonga did not receive the alert because of a power failure there, said the center's acting director, Gerard Fryer.

"There was problem in Tonga where there was a power outage and they didn't get our initial message," Fryer said, adding that the center needs to work with Tonga to correct the problem. He said he did not know whether the power failure was caused by the earthquake.

Mali'u Takai, deputy director of the Tonga's National Disaster Office, told The Associated Press in a telephone interview that no warning was received.

"Nobody got a warning through the emergency satellite system in our meteorological office," Takai said. "Judging by the location of the epicenter, we would have been caught out without any warning at all because of the system's malfunction."

However, any warning probably would have been too late for Tongans if a major tsunami had come, because the epicenter was so close.

The Honolulu-based center's warning said it was possible a tsunami could strike Fiji within two hours of the quake and then, an hour later, New Zealand.

In Fiji, a tsunami warning alarm sounded in the capital, Suva. But authorities apparently failed to inform citizens, many on remote islands with poor communications.

At the Wakaya Club, a private luxury Fijian island resort where recent guests have included Rolling Stone guitarist Keith Richards, staff were alerted to the danger through satellite television news.

But the danger passed without the need to alert the guests or evacuate them to the island's high point, a resort employee said on condition of anonymity because she was not authorized to make press statements.

A spokesman for New Zealand's National Crisis Management Center, Allen Walley, said authorities did not issue a national civil defense warning.

"The Ministry of Civil Defense and Emergency Management was in contact with the Pacific Tsunami Warning Center throughout the process and was alerted to a possible tsunami," he said. "Overseas media reports had incorrectly suggested a threat and the need for evacuations."

New Zealand coastal resident Philip Payne, manager of the Ocean Beach Motor Lodge, said he did not know about the threat until it had passed.

But the lack of contact from Civil Defense has him worried because it would have been a major exercise to evacuate his 60 guests, along with his own family.

"We had no awareness whatsoever," Payne said. "I'm concerned. We certainly would have needed to be contacted by Civil Defense and told of where we could have evacuated our guests if necessary."

Authorities along New Zealand's east coast had been on full alert and ready to evacuate people in low-lying areas prone to wave damage, officials said.

Barbara Callender in Gisborne said the false alarm was a wake-up call for residents.

"I think it was great because at least it is making us very aware that this could be quite serious, and think about the things that we seriously needed to take with us," she said.

Kansas House rejects sex offender bill

By Carl Manning
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – A compromise version of a politically popular measure to strengthen penalties for child molesters and other sex offenders was shot down Wednesday by House members who disapproved of it being tied to a proposal to allow private prisons in Kansas.

The 74-49 vote sent the measure back to House-Senate negotiators with an eye toward dividing the two issues so they can be voted on separately. The Senate approved the bundled bill Tuesday by a 33-7 margin.

As a compromise bill, each chamber had to accept or reject it without making changes.

Senators previously approved a private prison bill but later insisted it be bundled with the tougher penalties for child molesters, known as "Jessica's Law." The House last year refused to debate the issue of private prisons and did not take it up this year.

"We'll go back to conference and ask them to strip private prisons out," said Rep. Mike O'Neal, his chamber's lead negotiator.

Senate Majority Leader Derek Schmidt said his chamber stands firm.

"The Senate position is they need to be a packaged deal," Schmidt, R-Independence, said.

As for private prisons dooming Jessica's Law, Schmidt said, "That would be a terrible outcome. That's why we need to reach agreement on enacting both pieces."

Senators argue the two should be tied because Jessica's Law will result in more people imprisoned and private prisons will be an option the state could consider rather than building its own facilities.

"You can pass the policy but not build the beds, which would be irresponsible," O'Neal, R-Hutchinson, said.

Leading the opposition was Rep. Kenny Wilk, R-Lansing, who said, "They're trying to force-feed us. The House wants a clean vote on Jessica's Law."

Later, Wilk said in an interview a "strong possibility" is to take Jessica's Law and put it into a another bill and send it to the Senate.

"It could be a Plan B. We will exhaust all opportunities to pass Jessica's Law," Wilk said.

Speaker Doug Mays said he was confident Jessica's Law would pass. He said the opposition was more about private prisons than bundling bills.

"This is nothing new. We've done it ourselves," Mays, R-Topeka said. "I bet within 24 hours we'll do Jessica's Law."

Others worried senators won't blink, and the session will end with Jessica's Law on the trash heap.

"They are willing to go home without Jessica's Law," said Rep. Eric Carter, R-Overland Park. "It would be a travesty to go home without Jessica's Law."

Britain, France introduce U.N. resolution demanding end to Iran's uranium enrichment

By Nick Wadhams
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS – Britain and France introduced a U.N. Security Council resolution Wednesday demanding that Iran abandon its uranium enrichment program, possibly setting the stage for sanctions if Tehran does not comply.

Several ambassadors said they hoped the resolution, backed by the United States, will be adopted before a meeting of foreign ministers in New York next Monday. Yet other diplomats questioned whether negotiations could wrap up that quickly.

The draft could lead to a showdown with Russia, which has arms and technology deals with Iran, as well as China. Both nations have said they adamantly oppose tough council action, and the two could use their veto-power on the council to spike it.

"I don't think this draft as it stands now will produce good results," China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya said after he emerged from the Security Council meeting where the draft was introduced. "I think it's tougher than expected."

The resolution mandates that Iran suspend enrichment and warns that the council would "consider such further measures as may be necessary to ensure compliance" language that could be seen as opening the door to sanctions.

Iran had no immediate reaction to the draft, but it remained defiant to earlier U.N. demands that it suspend enrichment.

The resolution is the latest move in weeks of negotiation over how to confront suspicions about Iran's nuclear program, which Tehran insists is for peaceful purposes. The United States and France accuse the country of secretly trying to build nuclear weapons.

Last month, the Security Council issued a nonbinding statement that Iran comply with previous demands to abandon enrichment. That statement asked for a report from the director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Mohamed ElBaradei, in 30 days on Iran's compliance. The IAEA is the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog.

ElBaradei issued a report Friday saying Iran had not complied, laying the groundwork for Wednesday's resolution.

The new document calls on Iran to stop construction of a heavy-water reactor and demands that nations "exercise vigilance" in blocking the transfer of goods and technology that could help Iran's uranium reprocessing and missile programs.

Mexican president backs off drug decriminalization

By Mark Stevenson
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MEXICO CITY – Mexican President Vicente Fox refused to sign a drug decriminalization bill Wednesday, hours after U.S. officials warned the plan could encourage "drug tourism."

Fox sent the measure back to Congress for changes, but his office did not mention the U.S. criticism.

Fox will ask "Congress to make the needed corrections to make it absolutely clear, in our country, the possession of drugs and their consumption are, and will continue to be, a criminal offense," according to a statement from the president's office.

On Tuesday, Fox's spokesman had called the bill "an advance" and pledged the president would sign it. But the measure, passed Friday by Congress, drew a storm of criticism because it eliminates criminal penalties possession of small amounts of heroin, methamphetamines and PCP, as well as marijuana and cocaine.

Earlier in the day, the U.S. government expressed a rare public objection to an internal Mexican political development, saying anyone caught with illegal drugs in Mexico should be prosecuted or given mandatory drug treatment.

"U.S. officials ... urged Mexican representatives to review the legislation urgently, to avoid the perception that drug use would be tolerated in Mexico, and to prevent drug tourism," U.S. Embassy spokeswoman Judith Bryan said.

There are concerns the measure could increase drug use by border visitors and U.S. students who flock to Mexico on vacation.

Bryan said the U.S. government wants Mexico "to ensure that all persons found in possession of any quantity of illegal drugs be prosecuted or be sent into mandatory drug treatment programs."

The legislature has adjourned for the summer, and when it comes back, it will have an entirely new lower house and one-third new Senate members following the July 2 elections, which will also make the outgoing Fox a lame duck.

However, Sen. Jorge Zermeno, of Fox's conservative National Action Party – a supporter of the bill – said he thought Congress would be open to changing the legislation to delete a clause that extends to all "consumers" the exemption from prosecution that was originally meant to cover only recognized drug addicts.

"The word 'consumer' can be eliminated so that the only exemption clause would be for drug addicts," Zermeno told The Associated Press. "There's still time to get this through."

The bill contained many points that experts said were positive: it empowered state and local police – not just federal officers – to go after drug dealers, stiffened some penalties and closed loopholes that dealers had long used to escape prosecution.

But the broad decriminalization clause was what soured many – both in Mexico and abroad – to the proposal.

Mexico's top police official, Eduardo Medina Mora, acknowledged on Tuesday that the U.S. anti-drug agency has expressed concern about the law. Some senators and community leaders in Mexico also objected to the bill. But even if it had passed, he noted that Mexican cities have the power to impose fines and overnight jail detentions for those caught with drugs in public.

Current Mexican law allows judges latitude to drop charges if suspects can prove they are addicts and the quantity they were caught with is small enough to be considered "for personal use," or if they are first-time offenders.

The new bill would have made the decriminalization automatic, allowed "consumers" as well as addicts to have drugs, and delineated specific allowable quantities, which do not appear in the current law.

Under the law, consumers could have legally possessed up to 25 milligrams of heroin, a half a gram of cocaine and about one-fifth of an ounce of marijuana.

WOODS | Athlete faced discrimination in sports downtown, and they had to sit in certain sections of movie theaters. But despite the limitations, prejudice in Manhattan was not particularly brutal, said Don Slater, Earl's childhood neighbor.

"People got a misconception. Prejudice was alive and well in beautiful Manhattan, but on a one-on-one basis, it wasn't there," said Slater, who still resides in Manhattan. "It wasn't as bad as it could've been."

He was raised the youngest of four, with three older sisters – Hattie Belle, Lillian Carter and Mabel Lee – by a mother who was a 1920 graduate of K-State and a firm believer in education and a father who loved baseball.

As a child, Earl would tag along with his father, who was a scorekeeper for baseball games at nearby Griffith Park, to retrieve balls and pick up bats. Miles – who had a passion for baseball – believed Earl was a talented catcher, and coached Earl in baseball and encouraged him in that direction until his death on August 28, 1943.

"He had one single obsession, and that was for me to be a professional baseball player," Earl said in "The Wicked Game – Arnold Palmer, Jack Nicklaus, Tiger Woods and The Story of Modern Golf by Howard Sounes."

Earl came close to professional baseball but was confronted with a few obstacles along the way. His mother died shortly after his father, in November 1947, when Earl was 15, forcing Hattie Belle, the oldest of the four children, to be the leader of the household.

"She was the ruler of the roost," Slater said. "Hattie raised Earl for the next seven years, and she was tough. She made him get his education."

Earl attended Manhattan High School, where he played football, basketball and American Legion baseball, and he excelled in all three, said Slater.

"I enjoyed watching him play sports. He was an excellent football, basketball, baseball and track athlete," he said. "I've always admired him because he was a tough bird, intelligent and disciplined. I see that instilled in Tiger."

As good as he was in team-oriented sports, it was difficult to get close to Earl, Slater said.

"There wasn't such thing as a friend to Earl," he said. "As far as one-on-one, nobody really knew Earl. All I remember him saying was, 'Get away from me Don Slater, you little brat.' You'd think I'd asked him for $5 or $10."

After graduating from high school in 1949, K-State offered Earl a scholarship to play baseball, establishing Earl as the first black baseball player at K-State and the Big Seven Conference League of the Midwest.

Because freshmen could not play varsity, Earl did not officially see playing time until his sophomore year in 1951. He played until he graduated from K-State in 1953, and it was during this period that he learned the harsh realities of discrimination and segregation. Earl often was forced to sleep and eat separate from his team on the road, and opponents could simply refuse to play the Wildcats because Earl was black.

"Earl's still bitter about when he was playing baseball," he said. "He didn't look at it as an achievement. He was a forerunner, but he only looked at the fact that he was discriminated against."

It is Ray Wauthier, K-State's baseball coach in 1951-1964, who truly deserves admiration for taking a chance on Earl when many were opposed to black athletes, Slater said.

"Ray let Earl join the team, and Ray got a lot of heck about that because certain schools didn't want blacks on the team," he said. "Earl lived with Ray for a while after the '51 flood. He was sort of a patron for Earl."

While he was playing ball at K-State, Earl received an offer to play professionally for the Kansas City Monarchs, and he wanted to accept, but Hattie Belle said finishing college was more important, Slater said.

Although it's been more than 50 years since Earl roamed Manhattan, the baseball field and campus, President Jon Wefald said Earl will always be remembered at K-State.

"I am very saddened to hear about the passing of Earl Woods," he said. "He certainly was a legend here at K-State."

EXPANSION | Donors anxious for more suites

He said there are some plans in the works for expansion of the stadium and coliseum, but the focus is on premium seating and suites, and especially in Bramlage.

The Vanier Complex is already being renovated, along with the north section of the stadium. The renovation will replace the videoboard at the north end and install a new, larger one on the south end.

McGuffin said the athletics department is expecting to hear from architects in three to four months about where to put those suites and how to get them there. He said a likely location is at the top ring around the stadium, with the entrances to the suites on the concourse.

It's only speculation now, McGuffin said, but the basketball suites would be partially enclosed, with amenities like refrigerators inside, while the seats would be out in the arena. He said the athletics department might have to take out the outermost few rows of seats to fit the suites, which could remove 1,000 seats from the coliseum.

McGuffin was confident he could fill the suites if they get built.

"If you gave me a list of my donors, I think I could probably make 12 phone calls and get 12 people to order suites right now," he said.

Charlie Thomas, director of the coliseum, said he'd like to see more space for concessions and handrails installed in the arena's aisles because the only way out is up.

Athletics Director Tim Weiser said he sees room for concessions and other services in an addition to the coliseum's west side. He said the pie-shaped area surrounding the statue of Ernie Barrett could house ticketing operations, concessions, an auditorium for the athletics department and other features.

Weiser said it would be an improvement because customers no longer would have to hike up the hill to get to the office now located at the coliseum's south end.

The addition would fit in with the athletics department's desire to renovate the west side of the stadium, which Weiser said is not up to par with the rest of the facility.

"The west side is really what I consider to be the front door of our football stadium," he said, "and we have needs to dress up the entrance and make it a more welcoming front door to our football stadium."

Such a plan, Weiser said, could include more suites and seating for the stadium. He said there are two basic options.

First, the athletics department could make additions to the sides and on top of the Dev Nelson Press Box.

Second, the entire press box could be bulldozed and a new addition put in that would mirror the east side.

McGuffin said there is a 12-person-long waiting list for suites in the stadium, and he expects demand for premium seats to grow steadily.

As for additional public seating, there is some chance for an increase in the next decade, but athletics department administrators said it's slim. Several said maybe in a decade, but only after several seasons with sell-out after sell-out.

"I'd like to think in 10 years that we'll have that demand," Weiser said, "and we'll have to put that north bowl of the stadium the way a lot of people talk, but that's not something we're planning for today."

SALARIES | Pay considered when accepting jobs

to the handout.

The fact that K-State is behind other universities in terms of professor salaries could make it difficult for K-State to attract and maintain high-quality professionals, said Thomas Herald, president of Faculty Senate.

"There's no question when the salary at a particular university or industry job is lower, you've got to think twice before you take it," said Herald, professor of animal sciences and industry.

While there are other factors to consider, like the environment, location, cost of living and whether the work will be stimulating, salary is undeniably a main factor, Herald said.

"Piled into that mix would be your salary and whether you can even afford to maintain a home and raise kids on that salary," Herald said.

When a new professional is hired, it takes time to reach the rank of professor.

He or she begins at the level of assistant professor and will be promoted to associate professor before reaching the rank of professor, Herald said.

In order to attract new individuals to K-State, the salaries offered to assistant and associate professors must be competitive, and in some cases, an associate professor makes more money than a professor, Herald said.

"Over time, the state is unable to keep base with inflation and market value, so unfortunately, the people who have been here the longest and contribute the most become penalized," Herald said. "It's tough for individuals."

Over the years, Faculty Senate, administrative officials and the Kansas Board of Regents have taken action regarding this problem, but it is ultimately the Kansas Legislature that controls university funding, Herald said.

An alternate solution to the problem is increasing tuition, which already has been done many times in the past several years, Herald said.

"It's one big, vicious cycle," Herald said. "At one time people used to go to college without even thinking about it and now they have to wonder if they can even afford it."

Legislators begin to negotiate school finance plan after rejection

By John Milburn
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – Legislators started negotiations Wednesday over school finance issues after the House rejected a three-year, $532.7 million plan assembled a day earlier.

Finding a compromise plan that will satisfy a Kansas Supreme Court mandate to increase spending on schools has fallen to three senators and three House members.

Negotiators reviewed the contents of a plan the Senate passed last week and one the House plan passed in March. No action was taken, and another round of talks was set for Thursday morning. Negotiators expected it to take a while to merge the Senate's spending with numerous House policies.

"We have a Chevy and a Cadillac. I'm not going to say which is which," said Rep. Kathe Decker, R-Clay Center, lead House negotiator.

The House plan, defeated 69-55, had the backing of Speaker Doug Mays, R-Topeka, and other GOP leaders. He said there will be no more attempts to draft a new House plan to take into negotiations with senators.

"We will get something eventually," Mays said.

The Senate approved a plan last week to phase in a $541 million increase in spending on public schools over three years. In March, a coalition of Democrats and moderate Republicans forced a three-year, $633 million plan through the House.

Presidential visit, 2 new coaches make 2005-06 school year unforgettable

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This school year is one that won't easily be forgotten.

"I don't think any university has had the success we had this year," K-State President Jon Wefald said.

A visit from President George W. Bush, a new football coach and a new basketball coach are just a few of the things that made this school year successful, and they gave the university national attention, Wefald said.

"When the president was here it made the front page in papers across the nation," he said.

National recognition like that is something Wefald said he hopes continues into the next school year.

"Students always like it if their university is excellent," Wefald said.

"They like to go to a school that is known from coast to coast. They love it when we have athletic and academic success."

Reputation receives the largest benefit from national recognition, said Charles Reagan, associate to the president and chair of the Landon Lecture series.

"Students send their résumés off to Boston, and they open it up and say, 'Yeah, K-State. I've heard about them,'" Reagan said.

LANDON LECTURES

President Bush wasn't the only big-name speaker who was featured in the Landon Lecture Series this school year.

Other big names include Ryozo Kato, Japanese ambassador to the United States; Mikhail Gorbachev, former president of the former Soviet Union; Ted Turner, co-founder of CNN and other major network channels; and Lech Walesa, trade union activist and former president of Poland.

Wefald said this year has been the most noteworthy for the Landon Lecture series, which will celebrate its 40th anniversary next fall.

"I don't think we've ever had a year more prestigious than this year," he said.

Although this year has been exceptional for the lecture series, that level of success can't be expected every year, Reagan said.

"It's got to come full circle," Reagan said. "You just cannot expect to go undefeated year after year. It's just not going to happen."

There are no confirmed speakers for next year yet, but Reagan said he has a few people in mind he would like to have come, like NBC's Today Show anchor Katie Couric.

After a story on the Today Show comparing Manhattan, Kan., to Manhattan, N.Y., Reagan said Couric remarked how she would like to visit Manhattan, Kan.

"We saw that, and we sent her an invitation to come do a Landon Lecture," he said.

Reagan also is trying to get some political leaders.

"I'm working on getting the Costa Rica president," he said.

Students can find stress relief during finals week

By Kelsey Noel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

To help students combat stress during finals week, locations on campus have organized useful methods of assistance.

Tara Coleman, science librarian at Hale Library, said beginning Sunday at 1 p.m., the library will be open 24 hours a day throughout finals week.

Coleman said many actions are taken to ensure the availability of quiet study areas.

"We will offer more quiet areas during finals week," she said. "The only louder, group areas will be the second floor and the 24-hour study."

Although many areas are reserved for quiet study, Coleman said students should not expect total silence.

"We still have services offered at the service and reference desks," she said. "There may still be just a little noise."

Beginning Sunday at 10 p.m., Coleman said students can get free coffee and tea at the library. The service will be offered through Tuesday night.

"We'll have caffeine for students until supplies run out," Coleman said. "We're asking that you bring your own mug, but we'll be providing styrofoam cups as well."

Sarah Decke, leadership development coordinator for the Department of Housing and Dining and Association of Residence Halls adviser, said the ARH will sponsor a late night breakfast for students living on campus.

The breakfast, which takes place at the end of every semester, will occur Sunday from 9:30-11 p.m. at the Kramer Dining Center, Decke said.

"Students won't be charged for the meal," she said. "It's a free breakfast, so it's kind of fun."

James Tobin, graduate student in computer science development, said the hall is providing treats for its residents next week.

"We are providing snacks for little stress breaks from studying next week," Tobin said.

Students forced to cope with rising gas prices

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tuition is going up, parking passes, as well as gas prices, have gone up, too. With this trend in place, students need to conserve gas because they cannot make it themselves.

"All students can do is try to do as much as they can to conserve gas," Michael Babcock, professor of economics, said.

Gas has never been so expensive, and students should be aware of how to cope with the high prices, Babcock said.

Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., said he is not too worried about the gas prices and is very confident in the American economy.

"Although rising gas and energy prices and one of the worst natural disasters in American history have tested the resilience of our economy, America's economy continues to expand," Brownback said.

Manhattan's average price of gas per gallon is $2.89, according to www.kansasgasprices.com.

Many have different views on whether gas prices will increase or decrease this summer.

Jerry Fenske, owner of BP, 1701 Anderson Ave., said he doesn't see gas prices increasing too much because they are already high.

"I am expecting the gas prices to go up to anywhere from $3 to $3.50, this summer," Lance Bachmeier, professor of economics, said.

Bachmeier said there is a lot of debate on gas prices lately, but he thinks businesses like Wal-Mart and Target will suffer the most.

He also said people are spending more money on gas than they ever have before, therefore they are spending less money on everyday household items at retail stores, because they are not necessary.

Professors in economy give their advice to students on what they should do to conserve gas.

"Students should get rid of all non-essential driving," Babcock said.

Babcock also said students might want to reconsider trips this summer that are far in distance.

"Plane tickets are going up just as much as automobile gas is going up," Babcock said.

Students are also trying to find ways to conserve gas by walking, parking and purchasing bicycles.

"I walk and I bought a bike," Dominick James, junior in kinesiology, said. "It takes me $50 to fill my tank up."

Most students that live in the dorms park their car on campus and ride with each other when they need to go off campus.

"I save gas by leaving my car in the residence parking lot," said Miles Mentzer, sophomore in agricultural business.

Hale Library offers quiet place for those looking to study in peace

By Scott Girard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students looking for peaceful study time during finals week should be able to find exactly that at Hale Library.

The Library is offering a place for studying and quietness beginning at 1 p.m. Sunday and continuing through Friday, May 12 at 5 p.m. The library will be open 24 hours every day and certain areas in the library will be zoned off for different study areas.

Laurel Littrell, head of general information services at Hale, said signs will be posted throughout the library instructing students where to go and how quiet they should be.

The second floor study area is for group study, while the rest of the library will be for quiet studying time.

"Some students need to study in groups, and some need to study alone, so dividing the library into zones will help students know where they should be for silence or quiet conversation with study partners," Littrell said.

The library staff also will brew hot coffee and tea for any students who need a boost of energy.

Sara Kearns, instruction librarian at Hale, said the library encourages students to bring their own mugs, but foam cups also will be available. The coffee and tea will be served around 10 p.m. from Sunday until Tuesday as long as supplies last, she said.

"Librarians are fairly altruistic by nature, and we all remember the stress of finals," Kearns said. "We're just trying to lessen some of the stress felt by K-State students."

Extra measures will be taken to ensure that students receive the appropriate amount of time and quietness to study at Hale, Tara Coleman, science librarian at Hale, said.

She said librarians will be monitoring the quiet zones, but students also will need to watch themselves.

"Besides designating signs for quiet and group study areas, we ask students to self-police each other when it comes to noise," she said. "Most times people do not realize they are too loud, but usually an angry glare or shushing will quiet them down."

The same opportunity was available last semester, and many students utilized the opportunity, Littrell said. She said they received several ideas from students' questions at Hale and on the Web site, including the implementation of the quiet zones.

"Sometimes the smallest things are the most welcome and the most needed for someone working as hard as our students work," she said. "We want to provide those things."

The librarians said they will be available to answer questions and assist the students, along with doing their normal jobs.

"We hope to supply students with the type of environment that is comfortable and conducive to study," Coleman said. "We want students to know we are here to help, be that a comfy couch, hot coffee or getting the right research article for a last-minute paper."

For more information, contact the reception desk at Hale Library at 532-3014.

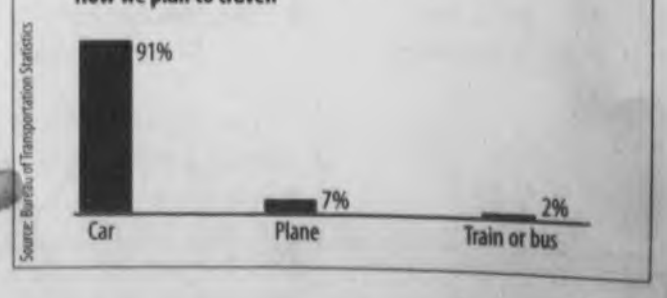
DUI checkpoint

The Riley County Police Department will conduct a sobriety checkpoint in northeast Manhattan on Saturday morning from approximately 12:30 to 2:30 a.m., a RCPD press release said. This will be the second checkpoint in a series of three that will be conducted in 2006. Efforts will be made to not severely disrupt traffic flow, but many drivers will be stopped briefly.

Marriage age bill



TOPEKA (AP) — Legislators sent Gov. Kathleen Sebelius a bill that prohibits anyone under age 15 from getting married in Kansas. The House's 119-0 vote Thursday followed Senate approval of the measure a day earlier, 36-4. The legislation, requested by Sebelius, allows somebody who is 15 to marry if a district court judge decides it's in the person's best interest.

Bishops excommunicated

VATICAN CITY (AP) — The Vatican declared Thursday that two bishops ordained by China's state-controlled church without papal consent were excommunicated, escalating tensions as the two sides explored preliminary moves toward improving ties. The Vatican also excommunicated the two bishops who ordained them.

PILLSBURY CROSSING

What better way to beat the summer heat than to spend your days lazing around at Pillsbury Crossing?

At this spot, Deep Creek flows over a limestone ledge and forms a waterfall with a drop of about 4 feet. Just upstream, the road crosses the ledge and vehicles travel through several inches of water. Many students choose to park their vehicles here and spend a day swimming, fishing, floating or just hanging out.

This is the perfect picnic spot, and you can enjoy wading in the rock-bottomed creek.

You also might choose to use a canoe, kayak or other small boat and go as far as one-half mile upstream.

COUNTRY STAMPEDE

Thousands of country music fans descend on Tuttle Creek State Park for one of the nation's largest country music festivals

Take a camper out to one of the 1,800 campsites and spend the four days cavorting with friends and listening to some of the biggest names in country music.

The 2006 Country Stampede will take place June 22-25, and features such artists as Gretchen Wilson, Joe Nichols, Toby Keith, Sara Evans, Brad Paisley, Chris Cagle and Terri Clark.

CALL HALL ICE CREAM

Another way to cool down this summer is to stop by Call Hall for a scoop or two of ice cream, made with milk from the K-State dairy farm.

Don't miss out on other items such as cheese, milk and yogurt.

The dairy bar is open Monday through Thursday from 9:30 a.m. to 5:15 p.m., and Friday from 9:30 a.m. to 6 p.m.

RILEY COUNTY FAIR

At the Riley County Fair, attendees can participate in activities such as the pedal tractor pull or turtle races, eat fair food or ride the attractions at the carnival. There also is live entertainment, a barbeque, a parade and the Kaw Valley Rodeo.

The fair will take place July 27-31.

Alpha Chi Omega sorority sponsors afternoon fundraiser for sister chapter at University of Iowa

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Members of the Alpha Chi Omega sorority got a little messy Thursday afternoon to benefit a sister chapter affected by a recent tornado.

The "Pie an Alpha Chi" event took place from 9:30 a.m. until 4:30 p.m. in the Bosco Student Plaza. Volunteers from the sorority sat at a table and allowed passers-by to pie the member of their choice for a $1 donation.

Cat Hinds, junior in elementary education and coordinator of the event, said the pie-throwing fundraiser was organized after she and her sorority sisters heard about a sister chapter at the University of Iowa whose house was destroyed during a tornado a few weeks ago.

"We heard the news from our chapter adviser," Hinds said. "They have a wish list of needed items, but we thought the best way to help them would be to send money."

Students' initial reluctance to actually throw the pies surprised Alpha Chi member Lisa Beck, sophomore in architectural engineering, who volunteered to be pied.

"I'm calling the donations pity money," she said an hour after the event began, "because people are like 'I'll give you a dollar, but I don't want to pie you.' I've been pied three or four times so far, but I really had to work to get it."

Beck said it was hard to describe what it felt like to have a whipped cream pie smeared in one's face.

"It's definitely an interesting feeling – it starts out really cold," she said.

Riley Anderson, junior in landscape architecture, said she made a spur of the moment decision to participate in the Alpha Chi Omega fundraiser after an invitation from Beck.

Not only did the pie-throwing benefit a good cause, Anderson said, it was a new and unusual way to raise money.

"I don't think I would have ever thought of it," he said. "It's pretty creative, compared to a lot of the other events out there."

At the end of the day, Jessie Connell, junior in psychology and chapter president, said "Pie an Alpha Chi" raised about $200 for the Iowa chapter.

"I thought it went great," she said. "Everybody did a great job."

Mall to feature Mother's Day

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan Town Center will have a variety of activities available Saturday in the Center Court for Mother's Day.

Sara Van Allen, marketing manager for the mall, said Town Center is working in conjunction with KACZ-FM 96.3 for the event.

Van Allen said KACZ-FM will cover the event live from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m., but the event will last until 3 p.m.

She said all ages can participate in the activities.

"The events are for anyone interested," she said. "Whether it be for a last minute Mother's Day gift or just an activity to do with their mom."

This is the first year the mall has done the activities for Mother's Day, Van Allen said.

"We were looking to do something different this year," Van Allen said.

She said after working with Z96.3 for the I Z Wed event, they brainstormed and came up with the Mother's Day activities.

Van Allen said the activities of the day include different ways to register and win prizes, as well as the activities at the booths of the different local and mall vendors.

Merle Norman, a cosmetics store at the mall, will offer complimentary makeovers for moms during the event, said Tasha Staab, beauty consultant at Merle Norman and sophomore in elementary education.

"We'll be using our most popular colors, including our summer collection of 2006," Staab said.

She said the store will have two girls giving makeovers at the booth, but if it gets busy, more can have their makeup done in the actual store.

"We want to try to fit in as many people as possible," Staab said.

Staab said there also will be a drawing for a gift certificate.

Michelle Klentz, owner of Ceramic Canvas, said the store will have booths set up for people to do different crafts.

Klentz said an activity people can do is paint items such as plates and flower pots.

She said some of the items will need to be fired in the kiln since they use glaze, and people can pick up their items May 9 at Ceramic Canvas in the Westloop Shopping Center, 1344 Westloop Place.

"If people can't come to the store later, I will bring acrylic paint to use on some items," Klentz said.

Klentz said the activities will cost somewhere from $10 to $20, depending on the activity.

Students choosing summer classes

By Christina Hansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A growing number of K-State students are choosing to continue their education over the summer months by taking classes or traveling abroad.

The number of students traveling abroad this summer has grown by more than 50 students since last summer, said Jenifer Chambers, director of the Study Abroad Program. Chambers said 215 students are enrolled to take group trips this summer, and 59 students were participating in exchange programs or individual trips.

The variety of courses and trips offered, and positive word of mouth might be responsible for the increase in enrollment, Chambers said.

"There are some new courses every year, and some that are recurring. As more people go abroad and talk about it to their friends, interest in the program grows."

Chambers said summer travel programs allow more students to take advantage of the Study Abroad experience.

"Some people just can't get away during the semester," she said. "The summer is a good time for people who want some international experience who can't go during the school year for academic or personal reasons."

The number of students taking summer and intercession courses is also likely to remain high this summer.

Gunile DeVault, associate registrar, said although it was hard to estimate how many students are enrolled in courses until the summer ends, she expected numbers similar to those of 2005.

"Summer enrollment is a little bit different than fall and spring because a lot of those enrolling aren't K-State students," DeVault said. "These people don't have the opportunity to pre-enroll like students can."

DeVault said that 6,425 students took summer courses, including online courses, during the summer 2005.

Jancis Klenda, senior in life science and pre-nursing, will spend five weeks in Spain this summer as part of a group.

Klenda said she made the decision to travel to Spain last fall because she always had wanted to study abroad.

"I just want the experience of living in another country," she said. "I would like to learn some Spanish, and also just see what it's like living out of my comfort zone, and learn to relate to lots of different people."

Shallow sightings
People obsess too much with celebrity glamour

The other day I was sitting alone in a booth at McDonald's, enjoying a scrumptious quarter-pounder with cheese, when out of nowhere a big blob of ketchup landed squarely on my white shirt.

MEGAN MOLITOR

Before I had time to pretend I had an itch and sneakily remove it, 20 men armed with cameras appeared and snapped shots so quickly it nearly blinded me. In a near panic, I fumbled for my keys and felt my way out the door. I jumped in my car and peeled out of the parking lot. Beads of sweat dripped down my forehead, and the ketchup blob slowly smeared its way down my shirt.

Suddenly, a black SUV pulled in front of me with a man hanging out the rear window by his shoes screaming, "A little more to the right; smile big." It startled me so much that I jerked the wheel and slammed into a pole.

Yeah, my dad didn't believe it either.

Sound ridiculous?

Of course it is. But while I never have had to deal with this kind of attention, many celebrities have, and in the most mundane aspects of their lives no less; stuffing their faces; kissing their babies; scratching themselves. These things are recorded daily for our viewing pleasure by the paparazzi.

The saddest part of this is many of us actually care. We log on daily to various gossip Web sites to see with whom Lindsay Lohan had a drink last weekend or how awful Sarah Jessica Parker's shoes looked the other day.

Why does it matter? Does it make the slightest difference in our lives?

Are our own lives really so pathetic that we rely on celebrities picking their noses to make us feel we don't suck?

Perhaps living vicariously through the victories of the rich and famous gives us something which to aspire to in our lives.

No, that's too "sun-shiney" for me.

I choose to believe those who obsess about the brain damage of Britney Spears' baby are subconsciously depressed about the lack of excitement in their own lives. So depressed, in fact, that something so trivial as a drunken snapshot of Paris Hilton makes them think, "Hey, at least I don't have pictures that bad of me in People magazine. I think I'll get up for work in the morning."

What it comes down to is this: is it simple American curiosity that drives them to occasionally glance at a picture or two in their spare time, or is it an obsession with anyone not in their circle doing things every normal person does?

I chose the latter.

I'm not pitying celebrities; they chose their fame, and they have to take what comes with it. However, I do pity those with the amount of free time it requires to actually care how many fries Ashlee Simpson ate for lunch.

Get a new hobby.

Megan Molitor is a sophomore in mass communications and is certain her algebra final will eat her soul. Please send your comments to opinion@spub.ksu.edu.

Leadership about betterment, not perfection

A misconception I had about leadership studies before I entered the program was that it would provide guidelines for how to control people.

CODY HOLUB

What I found after completing the minor was something else entirely.

I think I was confusing it with management, where authority is formally bestowed, and actions can be guided by different theories to increase motivation and productivity.

Leadership, however, is not so impersonal and scientific. Neither is it based on hierarchy or status – a person can lead from any position in life.

For the first time in my schooling, the subject is not about what experts have historically thought but about what we think. Scenarios and ideas are presented in the classroom, and the teacher asks students what they think, instead of telling them what to think. This reflective nature of the program provides an environment for critical thinking – something that is indispensable, in leadership and in life.

I see leadership as an initial process of inward influence. Our beliefs and worldview are constantly being prodded and tested by a variety of sources, including people. After these beliefs are thoroughly analyzed, then solidified, external influence is a byproduct of the open communication and implementation of our drives, motivations, passions, and beliefs. So, a leader cannot lead anyone else until he can first sort out himself.

My personal leadership philosophy is simple in its ideal and is based on a single principle: live with a commitment to betterment. An underlying assumption of this maxim is that change is necessary, inevitable and invited. After all, how could an organization or person become better if they are static?

A distinction that I would like to make is that I have a commitment to "betterment," and not "perfection." Striving for perfection leaves no room for learning from mistakes and for the forgiveness of self and others for setbacks and imperfections. Also, the goal of perfection seems so unattainable that it would be a culprit for inaction.

Betterment allows for attainable goals and measurable progress. An analogy I draw is walking up the stairs of a tall building. Progress can be slowly, yet surely seen. Similarly, one should not be frustrated by not being able to jump from the ground to the top of the building – that is unrealistic. Leadership is mostly exercise, not competitive performance.

I have found through my commitment to betterment, one basic universal human principle: we all want to be happy. Recognizing this fact, and acknowledging that no two peoples' path to happiness is the same, a tolerant attitude for others' actions arises. Compassion is a value I am beginning to appreciate.

This column is far from perfect, but it has been made better through critical thought and revision. That is the only reasonable goal. Otherwise, with perfection in mind, I would always be beating myself up for not having produced a perfect past, which would distract me from future goals of betterment.

Concluding metaphorically (which is the only way words can conclude), this column is a photograph of the leadership environment; time will change that environment, as will the perspective change for the photographer as he moves through it.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444 -or- fourum@spub.ksu.edu

The Campus Fourum is the Collegian's anonymous call-in system. The Fourum is edited to eliminate vulgar, racist, obscene and libelous comments. The comments are not the opinion of the Collegian nor are they endorsed by the editorial staff.

If the Kansas State Collegian is free, how can anyone really steal them? It's more or less taking more than your fair share, right?

Just so you know, I would really like my wallet back; I haven't eaten in two days. Please, if you found it, get it back to me.

Thank goodness for that picture of the Collegian heister. We now know it was someone that has hair and wears a hooded sweatshirt.

We all know Great Bend and Hoisington suck, but not as bad as Claflin. Now that's a town you can love to hate.

You need a computer? Go upstairs. I'll get off Facebook when I want to.

We can't stop here; this is liger country. Gosh.

George Lucas finally caved in. And there was much rejoicing.

Lola Shrimplin needs to quit using the paper to tell everyone about her problems. She should take her own advice about rape and apply it to her articles in the paper - keep it to yourself.

To the person in the Union who would rather watch CNN than ESPN: Get a life.

To all you frat-tastic Sigma Chi's: thank you for taking my girlfriend off my hands; she's really annoying. But hey, next semester when you're off campus, I'll be banging yours. Peace.

Hey Sigma Chi, if you really think I give a damn about what you guys think, I'd be more worried if you're going to have a chapter house next year. P.S., I forget that you guys even go here sometimes.

Here's a timely article of the Collegian: Tiger Woods' father dying. Didn't he go to K-State? Isn't he from Manhattan? Wasn't he the first black man to play baseball here? Here's a timely article; write it. P.S., I heart Sigma Chi times 100.

The Fourum needs to go back to the funnier quotes. The rest of you need to stop calling in, and that's like Marlatt guys who just take the time in between Halo games to make a ridiculous stupid remark. Love, the greeks.

Hey Kody Cooper, for your sake, I hope that liberals can understand satire.

Scholarship adviser helps match students, awards

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State ranks in the top 10 of U.S. universities in overall number of Rhodes, Truman, Goldwater, Udall and Marshall scholarships.

Students have been successful, but who has helped them get there?

Enter Jim Hohenbary, scholarship adviser for the College of Arts and Sciences, who helps match students with scholarships that fit them.

Hohenbary said he began his work as an open option adviser, but after the previous scholarship adviser left, he decided to apply.

"Before coming to K-State, I wasn't even aware that kind of position existed," he said.

Hohenbary said he wanted to work with top students from different disciplines.

His goal for students, he said, is to help those competing for scholarships know how to get the most out of K-State.

"I want to meet students early in their college career and begin talking with them about what lies down the road," he said. "It seems to me that knowing what scholarships might be a good fit helps students think a little more consciously about how to get the most out of their college experience."

Hohenbary's work covers a wide base, including meeting with students, organizing scholarship committees and interviews, processing scholarships requiring institutional endorsement and helping students complete essays and prepare for interviews.

"It's definitely a job that reminds me of the saying, 'the devil's in the details,'" he said. "That's the whole idea behind a scholarship application."

Hohenbary said his studies as an English major and his master's work in creative writing trained him to read things closely and talk about writing.

"I have definitely seen my own education come into play as a valuable tool in the job," he said.

An insatiable curiosity is also helpful and motivating.

"I'm curious about a lot of different topics," he said. "It's really fun and interesting to me to learn about what they're concerned about and what their professional goals are, and I feel like the fact that there are so many neat things students are doing across campus keeps me excited about the job."

No special recipe exists for student success in scholarship competition, but Hohenbary said students who know where they want to go might find the process easier.

"Preparation in success in different fields involves different things," he said. "The most general formula in what we're looking for are students that know where they want to go in the future, or at least a broad outline."

Hohenbary said the most rewarding thing about his job is having students find personal success while pursuing scholarship.

"The most rewarding thing is seeing students have a valuable experience competing for the scholarship," he said. "They know how to get from point A to point B. Those sorts of things are great to see."

Larry Rodgers, associate dean in the College of Arts and Sciences, said Hohenbary was an outstanding student while studying at K-State, and Rodgers said he knew Hohenbary would do a good job.

"From the day he was hired here, I knew that K-State had picked the best possible person in the country to do this job," Rodgers said.

Rodgers said Hohenbary has the type of personality to help students find the ability to succeed.

"He is all substance, as opposed to all style," Rodgers said. "Jim is the opposite of flashy and big. He's quite thoughtful, and that allows him to invest in the students' success instead of the students' success being a reflection of his. He is completely selfless."

Hohenbary takes the time to get to know students, Rodgers said, and keeps out of the limelight to help students excel.

"When you meet him, you don't immediately see why he's so amazing, because he's the lest self-promoting person I know," Rodgers said. "He takes the time to allow K-State's very best students to showcase their strengths."

Kourtney Bettinger, senior in modern languages, began meeting with Hohenbary as a freshman and said she found him helpful as she applied for the Truman Scholarship.

"When I was doing the Truman, he was priceless," she said. "He's just amazing and always willing to help. He came in on the weekends and read through essays."

Bettinger said Hohenbary is willing to listen and easy to talk to.

"You can tell he really cares about the students," she said. "He's the right man for the job."

Konza burnings help researchers test effects of fire on land

By Lacey D. Mackey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Flames carry across an open piece of land, burning everything in sight.

It is a fire common to a group of workers and volunteers who spend their spring burning sections of the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area.

Eva Horne, interim director of the Konza Prairie, said controlled burns have happened on the Konza Prairie since the late 1970s to study the long-term effects the process has on the prairie.

When the prairie gets too green, Horne said burning stops because the fire does not carry well.

The various sections are burned in different intervals, including some annually, every four years and every 10 years.

The increase in the frequency of burns decreases woody vegetation, and Horne said research has shown this increases native grass species, and bison and cattle tend to prefer the land which has been burned.

On the day of a burn, the fire chief makes a decision whether or not it will occur. If the chief decides to schedule a burn, a group of about 12 to 15 trained and experienced volunteers meet to start working.

At the site, Horne said four vehicles with water go in two different directions to start the backfire, a fire around the perimeter of the area. The fire is started with a drip torch containing a mixture of gasoline and diesel fuel.

While the burning might seem simple, Horne said a procedure goes into making a successful and safe burn.

"This is not a manual for people to burn their own property," she said. "There's a lot more training involved."

A backfire establishes a border of black around the circumference of the area, and then the show begins.

A fast-moving headfire is then lit, quickly eating up the vegetation in its path. Horne said the sight is something to behold.

"It's awe-inspiring, especially when you light a headfire," she said. "It's a great, huge, roaring flame. It's just very impressive."

This is where the time spent making the border around the area becomes important. Horne said the backfire's perimeter has to be burned thoroughly and wide enough to ensure the headfire does not jump into another area.

Horne said burn volunteers might spend about 10 to 12 days burning during the season, but the time varies from a few hours to a full day of burning.

"It depends on weather and what we're doing," she said.

Gene Towne, Konza Prairie fire chief, said the burnings usually start in March and end during the first week of May.

"Everything is dependent on wind speed and wind direction," said Towne, who also is a K-State research associate in biology. "Everything we do is weather dependent. It's a day to day situation."

This season has been slow, Towne said, with few burns.

"This has not been a good spring," he said. "We have only gotten about one to two burns in a week."

The Konza Prairie is divided into about 50 units. Towne said burns occur annually during the fall and in February, but most of the burns are in the spring.

Towne said the Konza Prairie would turn into a forest if it was not burned.

The controlled burns increase the growth of native tall grasses instead of plants and trees foreign to the prairie.

Valerie Wright, environmental educator and naturalist at the Konza Prairie, has been on burns for several years and said the crew takes their work seriously.

"The burn crews are very professional," she said. "Everybody has a very specific role to play."

Wright said she takes her camera to the burns and spends her time looking at what to capture on film, while enjoying nature in the process.

Burns can be calm for awhile, Wright said, but things can become fast-paced quickly.

"It's very interesting, and it's very quiet until there's a break-up or wind comes up," she said, "and then there's an adrenaline rush."

Wright said watching the fire can be an exciting moment, and people often respond with a mixture of respect and awe.

"There is an absolute interest that humans have in flames," she said. "That might come with siting around the campfire for eons. It's so interesting how it works because it's not how you expect."

Huggins hire tops them all

MARK POTTER

This semester has been one K-State fans will not soon forget.

In the past four months, Wildcat fans probably have experienced every emotion imaginable.

K-State fans were overcome with joy and hope when the men's basketball team finally put an end to its 31-game losing streak against those pesky Kansas Jayhawks with a comeback 59-55 victory on Jan. 14 in Lawrence.

Despite a promising start, however, the men's basketball squad proved to be a disappointment, losing nine of their last 12 games and failing to make the postseason for the seventh-straight season.

As a result, former coach Jim Wooldridge – who was still recovering from surgery on a bulging disk in his neck – lost his job.

But while the K-State men were reeling, the women's basketball team was preparing to make a magical run in the Women's National Invitation Tournament.

After a gutsy, one-point win against Western Kentucky, the Wildcats beat Marquette 77-65 on March 31 for the WNIT championship.

I wasn't at Bramlage Coliseum to witness K-State's WNIT championship, but I wish I had gone. On TV, the environment seemed electric. If I didn't know better, I would have thought coach Deb Patterson's squad was playing for the NCAA Championship.

The women's basketball team's WNIT victory was not K-State's only championship performance this semester.

On the track, Christian Smith was nothing short of amazing.

Five weeks after setting the collegiate record in the 1,000-meter run, Smith won the mile run at the 2006 NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships on March 11.

Not to be outdone, golfer Ben Kern set school and tournament records at the ASU Thunderbird Invitational on April 8-9, shooting 14-under par en route to a three-stroke victory.

There is no doubt Wildcat fans have experienced a number of memorable moments this semester.

But none of them measure up to the media splash created by new men's basketball coach Bob Huggins.

I still have no idea how Director of Athletics Tim Weiser lured coach Huggins to Manhattan – a nice place, but not quite the caviar of college towns.

Huggins had never even set foot in Manhattan before accepting the job.

Regardless, the man who owns a .740 career winning percentage and ranks among the nation's elite Division I coaches now calls the Little Apple home.

From time to time, people ask me what I think about the Huggins hire. My thought is simply this: Huggins will help K-State win a lot of games. And soon.

Two seasons before Huggins arrived at Cincinnati, the Bearcats won only 11 games. By his third season, Cincinnati was playing in the Final Four.

The 52-year-old defensive mastermind would guide the Bearcats to 14-straight NCAA Tournaments (1993-2005). Pretty impressive.

No disrespect to K-State's football program, but if Huggins can continue to sign players like 7-foot-3 center Jason Bennett and 6-foot-2 guard Blake Young, Manhattan will be re-transformed into a basketball town within three years.

Wildcat fans should be excited. After a long hiatus, Huggins has put the K-State men's basketball program back on the map.

SPRING 2006 | HIGHLIGHTS

Firings, hirings, champions and record crowds all part of spring

5 memorable moments

Huggins hired to replace Wooldridge

March 23 was a turning point for K-State basketball.

When Bob Huggins was introduced as Jim Wooldridge's replacement, the K-State basketball program – which, from the 1960s to 80s, was one of the premiere programs in the country – began a rebirth.

Nobody had stepped on the court, not one recruit had been named, Huggins had barely spoken 10 minutes, but everyone knew – Huggie was the man for the job.

Wooldridge could not find a way to win; Huggins finds it difficult to lose. He's been a head coach for 24 years, is the eighth winningest coach in Division I history and has been to the NCAA Tourney 15 times, including three Elite Eight appearances and one Final Four.

Huggins is a magnet for good, even incredible, athletes. Within days, the top recruits in the country – Jason Bennett, Michael Beasley, O.J. Mayo and Herb Pope – were adding "K-State" to their prospect lists, and speculation of Big 12 Conference Championships and future NCAA Championships began swirling through not only Manhattan, but the entire nation.

Huggins spoke of his intentions for the future at his March 23 press conference.

"I am excited about coming here and continuing to build this basketball program, playing in the NCAA Tournament, and doing those things that you are supposed to do," Huggins said. "We will work hard and be committed."

WNIT championship for Cats

This wasn't supposed to happen – not this year.

With the loss of Kendra Wecker, Laurie Koehn and Megan Mahoney, and the integration of four freshmen, the 2005-06 season was rumored to be a rebuilding season by fans and critics alike.

The Wildcats, on the other hand, refused to listen to the chatter.

Instead, the combination of freshmen Shalee Lehning, Marlies Gipson, JoAnn Hamlin and Danielle Zanotti, juniors Twiggy McIntyre and Claire Coggins and senior Jessica McFarland led K-State to the Women's Invitation Tournament title – the first postseason tournament title in K-State history – and a 24-10 season record.

Along the way, they halted the preseason rumors.

"It is huge for us, and the fact everyone kind of underestimated us at the beginning of the season," Lehning said after the WNIT victory. "We proved to ourselves and everyone else we are a team that is going to compete."

Record crowd at spring game

New K-State football coach Ron Prince had high expectations for the 2006 Purple-White Spring Game on April 22.

Soon after he was hired in early December 2005, he made it his goal to bring 20,000 fans to Snyder Family Stadium for his first spring scrimmage as the Wildcat frontman.

"I want to make (the Spring Game) a real event that hopefully a lot of people show up to," Prince said in January. "I hope people will really be mobilized to come and be here in earnest."

K-State fans heard Prince's message and responded in droves.

Attracted to Manhattan to catch their first glimpse of Prince's Wildcats, and by the all-day Spring Game Fan Fest, which included a carnival, a barbeque contest, a baseball game and a battle of the bands, a record 31,875 fans attended the scrimmage, which ranked as the seventh-best attended spring game in the nation.

Smith sets record

Senior Christian Smith will leave K-State this year, but his name in K-State track and field will not be erased, as he made history multiple times in the 2006 indoor track season.

On Feb. 4, Smith smashed the collegiate national record in the men's 1,000-meter run with a time of 2 minutes 19.57 seconds at the Sevigne Husker Invitational in Lincoln, Neb.

But he wasn't finished.

On March 11, Smith won the national title in the men's mile with his 4:12.75 second run at the NCAA Indoor Track & Field Championships also in Lincoln, making him K-State's first national champion since 1993 and only the 11th in school history.

Kern wins tourney

In his senior season, Ben Kern emerged from the background and proved to his teammates and golfers nationwide of what he's capable.

The Tucson, Ariz., native won the Arizona State Thunderbird Invitational with a score of 199 on April 9 in Tempe, Ariz. For his first-place finish, Kern was named Golfweek and GolfWorld Golfer of the Week and Big 12 Conference Golfer of the Month.

His final round of 199 also set a Thunderbird record, marking the first time a player finished below 200, a feat even Tiger Woods and Phil Mickelson couldn't accomplish during their collegiate golf years.

Final thoughts

Staff member: Anthony Mendoza
Student athlete of the semester: Cartier Martin, men's basketball. Fans outside the Big 12 Conference will get a chance to see how talented he is with the national attention the program is about to receive.
Spring surprise: Director of Athletics Tim Weiser hires Bob Huggins to coach the men's basketball team.
Moment of the semester: The men's basketball home loss to Kansas. The hype surrounding the game was incredible. Even though the Wildcats lost at home again to the Jayhawks, I expect the crowds to be similar to that game next year due to the expectations and exposure Huggins brings with him.

Staff member: Matthew Girard
Student athlete of the semester: Shalee Lehning, women's basketball, gave every ounce of herself, every night. Only a freshman, Lehning became the heart and soul of the K-State Wildcats.
Spring surprise: The hiring of Bob Huggins as the 21st K-State men's basketball coach, instantly turns the Wildcats into a NCAA Tournament contender.
Moment of the semester: The K-State women's basketball team's improbable run in the 2006 Women's National Invitation Tournament. Led by youngsters, the Wildcats turned Manhattan into a Mecca for women's basketball. All five home games sent chills down my spine with the Wildcat faithful rocking the rafters.

Staff member: Michael Ashford
Student athlete of the semester: Trackster Christian Smith broke the oldest collegiate record at the time with his 1,000-meter victory on Feb. 4 in a time of 2:19.57. He went on to win the mile at the NCAA Indoor Championships. Smith is not only a great athlete, but a great person and an excellent representative of K-State.
Spring surprise: Nearly 32,000 K-State fans attending the Purple-White Spring Game on April 22, exceeding coach Ron Prince's goal of 20,000.
Moment of the semester: K-State's loss to Texas Tech in the first round of the Big 12 Tournament in Dallas, and Jim Wooldridge's subsequent firing, set in motion the push to hire Bob Huggins.

Staff member: Wendy Haun
Student athlete of the semester: David Hoskins, men's basketball. Hoskins was a transfer this year and became a dominant inside presence. Named the Big 12 Rookie of the Week twice this season, he had double figures in 20 games. I am sure we will see a lot more from him in the future.
Spring surprise: K-State's comeback from a double-digit deficit to surprise KU, winning by four in Lawrence on Jan. 14.
Moment of the semester: The K-State women going through the Women's National Invitation Tournament and eventually winning the championship. Also, Claire Coggins being named tournament MVP was a highlight.

Staff member: Cedrique Flemming
Student athlete of the semester: Ben Kern , men's golf. Not many Wildcat fans know about Kern because golf is not as big as football and basketball here in Manhattan, but he has played extraordinary golf for most of the spring and won the first tournament of his career a month ago.
Spring surprise: New coaches galore: Ron Prince, hired in the fall and Bob Huggins come to Manhattan to try and put K-State sports back on the map.
Moment of the semester: The Wildcat women winning the Women's National Invitation Tournament championship, giving K-State its first postseason tournament championship ever.

Staff member: Angie Hanson
Student athlete of the semester: Curtis Allen, men's basketball. He was pretty quiet on the team this year, but I think if given the chance, he could be explosive on the offensive and defensive side of the ball. And he's not bad looking, either.
Spring surprise: Two words: Bob Huggins. Enough said.
Moment of the semester: Seeing Huggins and his coaching staff at Little Grill on Wednesday night. I'm jealous that I'm not going to be around next year to witness the excitement and continue following them around Manhattan.

Staff member: Matt Gorney
Student athlete of the semester: Shalee Lehning, women's basketball. A triple-double in a national tournament championship and only a freshman — need more be said?
Spring surprise: The amazing turnout by the K-State fans during the spring game and the hordes of people that rushed the field for autographs.
Moment of the semester: The complete destruction of KU at Allen Fieldhouse by the women's basketball team as the final game of the regular season followed by another K-State victory over KU in Dallas at the Big 12 Conference Women's Basketball Tournament.

BEST BETS | SUMMER RECOMMENDATIONS

TO DO LIST

Collegian Edge staff compiles a list of movies, music, fun for those sticking around Manhattan

MUSIC

So far this summer is looking like a great one for music lovers. Here is a list of some albums for which to look while you enjoy your months without school.

Art Brut, "Bang Bang Rock and Roll"

The debut of this rollicking, sarcastic British punk band finally hits U.S. shores on May 23

Sonic Youth, "Rather Ripped"

After nearly 20 years of recording, Sonic Youth is still releasing albums just as essential as their ground-breaking earlier work. June 13

Johnny Cash, "American V: A Hundred Highways"

This is the posthumous release of the fifth in the series of Cash's excellent American recordings. July 4

Ludacris, "Release Therapy"

This infamous Dirty South rapper returns with another album of dirty double-entendres and crunk club bangers. Summer 2006

MF Doom & Ghostface Killah, "Swift & Changeable"

New York rapper Ghostface Killah pairs with underground rap legend MF Doom for their sure-to-be-brilliant first collaborative effort. Summer 2006

OutKast, "Idlewild"

This is the soundtrack to this Atlanta duo's first feature-length film about a gifted pianist working at a speakeasy in the Prohibition-era South. July/August 2006

Troy Gentry and Eddie Montgomery, the country music duo, Montgomery Gentry, entertain the crowd at last summer's Country Stampede. This summer's headline acts include Toby Keith and Gretchen Wilson.

ENTERTAINMENT

There is a concert for every music lover happening this summer, and most are within a two-hour drive of Manhattan.

The Wakarusa Music and Camping Festival will return to Lawrence on June 8–11. The festival featured more than 70 bands and several activities including a parade, disc golf course and a drum circle. According to Wakarusa's Web site, The Flaming Lips are just one of the recent additions to the artist line.

Loco Macheen and The DeWayn Brothers Bluegrass Band, a Manhattan-based band, won the chance to play in Wakarusa in January. They competed in Battlerusa at Auntie Mae's Parlor against other locals Audio Spaghetti, Storytyme, 13th Step, and The Mathematics.

Another local music event this summer is Country Stampede, which takes place at Tuttle Creek state lake. The four-day country music event, starting June 22-June 25, will feature several country superstars including Gretchen Wilson, Toby Keith, Sara Evans and Brad Paisley.

Tickets for Country Stampede are available online at www.countrystampede.com and start at $60.

There are also several regional concerts to attend this summer. Dave Matthews Band will be performing at the Verizon Wireless Amphitheater in Kansas City, Kan. Other events happening at the amphitheater this summer include Vans Warped Tour, Lynyrd Skynyrd, Ozzfest and Kelly Clarkson.

A full listing of dates, times and event is available at www.sandstonekc.com.

Lauren Sinnott, junior in human development at Cloud County Community College, Sheila Driver, freshman in nursing at Cloud County Community College and Elaine Cobb, senior in secondary education cheer in the crowd during Country Stampede.

The Cotillion in Wichita will also host several bands this summer. Staind with Three Days Grace will perform at 8 p.m. on June 11.

Tickets will go on sale May 20 for Better Than Ezra and Sister Hazel. They will be making a stop at the Cotillion on July 13.

MOVIES

Summer is the time to relax and take a break from school. This summer will have some blockbusters soon for your viewing pleasure.

"The Da Vinci Code"

Professor Robert Langdon (Tom Hanks) is summoned to The Louvre. He attempts to uncover the greatest mystery of all time. May 19

"The Break Up"

After Brooke (Jennifer Aniston) calls it quits with Gary (Vince Vaughn), neither person is willing to move out. They engage in mental warfare to force the other person out. June 2

"Nacho Libre"

Nacho (Jack Black) is a young man who was raised in a Mexican monastery and tries to rescue it from financial ruin by joining a local Lucha Libre tournament. June 16

"Superman Returns"

While an old enemy plots to render Superman powerless, he faces the realization that the woman he loves, Lois Lane, has moved on. June 30

"Pirates of the Caribbean: Dead Man's Chest"

Captain Jack Sparrow's life is in debt to Davey Jones . Facing damnation, Jack must save himself, which only complicates the marriage of Will and Elizabeth, who must help him. July 7

"Talladega Nights: The Ballad of Ricky Bobby"

NASCAR stock car racing sensation Ricky Bobby (Will Ferrell) is a national hero because of his "win at all costs" approach. When flamboyant French Formula One driver Jean Girard (Sacha Baron Cohen) challenges "Shake" and "Bake" for the supremacy of NASCAR, Ricky Bobby must face his own demons and fight Girard for the right to be known as racing's top driver. "United 93" like watching reality TV on big screen

"United 93"
★★★☆☆
Movie review by Alex Peak

"United 93" explains, as best it can, what happened on that particular flight on Sept. 11, 2001.

It's not an overly dramatic movie with famous names, or even much of a soundtrack. It's comparable to watching reality television, although, believe it or not, it actually comes off seemingly less scripted.

This isn't a film that pays homage to heroes of 9/11, and it doesn't follow any one character's point of view or voice. There is no narrator to carry the viewer through.

The director didn't have to introduce and develop characters to make the audience grow attached. The film is very subjective – the writer and director aren't pushing the idea that Americans are great and Middle Easterners are bad. Although no one living truly knows the exact details of what took place on the flight, the movie portrayed what happened to the best of anyone's knowledge.

Many audience members might leave the theater with a sense of closure and have a better understanding of what happened that September morning almost five years ago.

But other viewers might have an unsettling feeling after the movie. Was it too soon after the tragedy to make such a film? Seeing as though the Zacarias Moussaoui trial just ended a couple of days ago, it could have been too early for a film about the event. However, perhaps family and friends of those who lost their lives because of the attacks feel otherwise.

Either way, "United 93" is alarming on several levels. It's a reminder of the terrifying and mind-blowing attacks on the United States a few years ago. It refreshes Americans' memories that no one is truly safe. We are not invincible.

The film also depicts the disconcerting lack of communication between air traffic control, the military's Northwest Air Defense Sector and the president. As stated in the movie, the above agencies didn't know what had happened until nearly two hours after the attack. Keep in mind that the first World Trade Center tower was struck at about 8:30 a.m.

It might, and probably should, worry viewers to know that our government and military – who are supposed to protect us and be in the know – are actually two hours behind what's really going on.

Consider the following disclaimer: don't go see this movie for solely entertainment reasons, but rather as a possible explanation of a heinous crime.

This certainly is not a feel-good movie. This is Hollywood's interpretation and capitalization of a national tragedy.

Alcohol can cause conflict

By Jessi Hernandez

Christopher Hanewinckel | COLLEGIAN

Apart from the wedding ceremony, the wedding reception requires the most planning on the part of future bride, groom and their families.

Location, the number of guests, what food to serve and how to serve it, and whether or not there will be dancing are some factors to take into consideration when planning one's reception. Something else to take into consideration is whether or not to serve alcohol at the reception.

According to theknot.com, setting up a bar or other way of serving alcoholic beverages, takes planning. The site lists three options for serving alcohol at a reception – through an open bar, a limited bar or a cash bar. Couples with more low-key receptions could choose to have alcohol on hand for guests to serve themselves, using something like a punch bowl, or even a keg.

The open bar is the nicest way to go, according to the site. Guests are free to choose whatever suits them and having an open bar follows good etiquette for hosting a formal event. The open bar, however, also is the most expensive option, as guests can order whatever they want without limit.

When considering an open bar, the site says one should keep in ones budget in mind, how many guests are attending and whether heavy drinkers will attend.

The next option the site lists is a limited bar, which it says is the most popular option.

With a limited bar, one purchases a selection of drinks, such as beer, soda, wine, and maybe some liquors to make a mixed drink, the site said. Then have the drinks available only at specific times, such as when the toasts are given or an hour after dinner.

The other option is to have a cash bar, which, according to the site, is the worst option because, "when you have a wedding, you're inviting people to a party, and they shouldn't have to pay for anything while they're there." The site says you should only consider a cash bar if you have a good reason.

Erica Hutfless, senior in microbiology, said the groom's parents traditionally take care of the bar, but for her reception, they will have a mix between a limited bar and a cash bar.

"I know I want to have alcohol served there," she said. "I would like to have some free liquor provided, like a bottle of champagne at each table, and then have other things available at the bar that (guests) can pay for. That way it's not as expensive, and people can still have something pretty traditional. 'Cause I know if we had a free-for-all, I'd be picking relatives up off of the floor."

For those who don't drink alcohol, or many of their family members and guests don't drink, another option the site lists is to have a dry reception. If only the couple doesn't drink, they could consider having champagne available for the toasts, so guests can take part in that wedding tradition.

Britta Pederson, sophomore in animal science and industry, said she and her fiancee decided to have a dry reception.

"We decided that because we're having our wedding at the Methodist church, and the reception is included, and it works out better for us to have a dry reception," she said.

Pederson said she knew of a couple who had an open bar at their wedding, and the groom ended up getting drunk and ruining the night. She said she wouldn't want her wedding to end up like that.

One concern Pederson said she had before deciding upon a dry reception was that their friends and family would think it was strange, but after talking to some friends about it, she was no longer concerned.

"(My fiancé) asked one of our friends if he thought it would be weird to have a dry reception, and his friend said 'half the world has dry receptions,'" she said.

No matter what you choose when deciding how you want to serve alcohol at your wedding reception, the most important factors to consider are what you and your future spouse would like the most, and secondly, how much of a budget is available.

Themes, colors important choices for wedding day

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some have had envisions of their wedding day since they were children, but there are many things people might want to consider before making the style decisions.

While an actual theme for a wedding isn't common, like those most often used for high school proms, other themes are important.

Teresa Purvis, director of marketing and programming at the Manhattan Arts Center, has been a wedding planner and still is on a limited basis.

Purvis said the word theme is tough to define with weddings, but the most common style decisions concern the location of the wedding, indoor or outdoor, and whether it will be formal or semi-formal.

"Everyone has a theme," Purvis said. "Whether or not they define it, they still have something that fits their personality."

When deciding to have an indoor or outdoor wedding, the defining factor is how flexible the couple is, Purvis said.

If the choice is an outdoor wedding, there must be a backup plan in case of bad weather, she said.

Another thing to consider is the use of decorations; if the wedding is held outside, fewer decorations may be needed, Purvis said.

She gave an example of having a wedding in a rose garden, where the roses would be the main decoration already in place.

Purvis said there are many factors involved when deciding to have a formal or semi-formal wedding.

Items such as the time of day of the wedding, the length of the bride's and bridesmaids' dresses, and the type of tuxedo or suit worn by the groom depend upon the formality, Purvis said.

She said the semi-formal wedding style is popular right now, with the bridesmaids wearing knee-length, 50s style dresses.

"There typically isn't a style of wedding that is most commonly chosen by a certain age group," Purvis said. "However, it used to be common to have a very formal wedding for younger couples who had the idea of a fairy tale wedding."

She said the younger couples, often aged 21 to 26, chose the fairy tale idea because they thought that's what they had to have; now, it is common for people to choose a wedding style with which they are most comfortable with.

Colors also are important when making decisions for a wedding, Purvis said.

"Don't just pick your favorite color," Purvis said.

She said it's important to look at the surroundings of the wedding, as well as what looks best on all of the bridesmaids when choosing the color.

Purvis said brown and pink seem to be a popular color, as well as a turquoise-aqua.

Sarah Boggs, manager of Celebrations of the Heart, said a popular color she has seen being used is fleurette, a medium-red apple color.

"The color is popular not only with the spring season and bright flowers, but also with the fall flowers," Boggs said.

She said traditionally there is one main color used for the bridesmaids' dresses, and then an accent color used in ribbons and napkins.

Some brides are choosing to have the main color in their gown in the embroidery work, she said.

Boggs said color is a personal choice, and there doesn't seem to be a dominant choice for college students.

However, she said right now bright colors are often used, such as fuchsias, oranges and sea-foam greens.

Brandi Lundgren, senior in elementary education, said her wedding last summer was a cute and fun theme.

She said the colors used were pink and yellow, with pink as the dominate color.

"I chose the colors because I wanted a certain rose that was yellow with bright pink tips," Lundgren said.

She said she used the colors for different decorations and the cake, as well as for the bridesmaids' dresses which were bright pink.

Couples juggle nuptials, tuition debt

By Sarah Burford and Danielle English
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As the end of their college careers draw near, many couples are planning for their new lives as husbands and wives.

This includes financing and planning the wedding, dealing with issues through premarital counseling, altering individual plans for the future and on top of it all, trying to finish school.

Despite this load, these engaged couples said they wouldn't trade any of it for a less hectic schedule.

PLANS AND FINANCES

Terri Zey, junior in public health nutrition, said she always imagined marrying right after college, getting a job and starting a new life together with her husband. But plans change, and she said it is fine with how they ended up.

Zey and her fiancé, Austin Delimont, senior in accounting, are getting married at the end of the summer and still will have one year of college to finish.

Delimont said he didn't have to alter much in his future to make room for the marriage.

"I didn't have too many plans other than getting a job, and maybe somebody would be there with me," Delimont said. "It just got bumped up a little bit."

Zey said she believes getting married after college, once each person has gotten used to his or her own lifestyle and career, would be difficult.

"[We'll] learn to live together, be independent of parents," Zey said. "Starting together may be easier."

Although Zey and Delimont said they believe they will survive just fine as a married couple out of college, Delimont's parents were a bit skeptical at first. Their main concern was whether the newlyweds could support themselves.

"My mom said, 'You'll have no money for curtains!'" Delimont said.

Delimont's parents married after college so money was not as much of an issue, he said. Zey's parents, on the other hand, married during college, and they turned out fine.

"They're not worried about money," Zey said. "They've been there."

Among the most pressing costs for Zey and Delimont right now, they said, have to do with the wedding.

"Wedding stuff is too expensive," Zey said.

To save money, Zey and Delimont said they decided to make their own wedding invitations instead of buying them for $1,300.

Despite the difficulty of concentrating and financing a wedding and school at the same time, Zey and Delimont said they wouldn't change a thing about the whole marriage process.

"If you're in love, go for it," Zey said. "I know that God will provide, so I've never worried much about money."

MARRIAGE AND A NEW LIFE

Planning for the wedding and dealing with money is just the first step. Couples might have to learn how to share their lives together.

Cory Ozbun, senior in psychology, and Suzanne Steffens, senior in physical sciences, have been engaged for 10 months and are planning a wedding for June 10.

For them, the wedding planning has been relatively stress-free, they said, but not without its issues.

Steffens said premarital counseling has raised the their awareness of issues they might face while married.

But both Ozbun and Steffens said being honest and open with each other prior to counseling did not leave them with much to discuss.

"I do think that counseling is an amazing thing for all couples, but some couples need it more than others," Ozbun said.

The Rev. Keith Weber, of St. Isidore Catholic Student Center, said that counseling is extremely important.

During counseling sessions, couples cover topics they have probably already talked about, he said. With outside input, however, they realize those issues were bigger than they thought, he added.

"They have unreal expectations about the amount of problems they are going to have in the marriage," Weber said.

To keep communication strong, couples must face all problems, he said, even if they seem small at first.

His main advice is, "Don't let problems get overwhelming."

Learning from one another

Marriage is all about learning.

Every day brings new challenges, and you learn something new about your mate almost every day.

MATTHEW GIRARD

One area where my wife (of almost two years) and I have learned from each other and, in turn, are able to understand each other better is our work language.

Other than the fact my wife and I are married, our lives beyond the comforts of home are very different. Jennifer is a nail technician for a local beauty salon, and I am a sports writer who has been a college student our entire relationship.

As you can probably imagine, when we talk about work, there is not a lot of common ground between our two chosen professions.

Although I would never claim to know how to do her job or even want to do her job, I have noticed she has taught me a thing or two about women's beauty needs. For instance, when I am sitting around, pretending to work, I will occasionally overhear the female-folk talking about hair, nails and other beauty things. As frightening as it is, I normally have a general understanding of what they are talking about and could probably jump into the conversation.

On the other hand, Jennifer gets asked the obvious sports questions by her clients and from time-to-time has told me that she surprises herself with her abilities to talk sports with people.

When I went to Texas to meet the coaches, athletic directors and other sports-related people for my new job last week, my wife eagerly came along to meet the people with whom I will be working.

In learning each other's work language, we are both able to understand what kind of people, stresses and general crap with which we each have to deal. So, when we do talk about work, we can help each other get through tough days or celebrate when something good happens.

On a more serious note, I would like to use my final words as a Collegianite and a K-State student to say thank you to my wonderful wife. She has been there through it all and is the most caring, understanding and loving person that I know.

It's been a crazy ride so far, and its about to get crazier.

Thanks babe, and I love you.

Matthew Girard will be an official alumnus of Kansas State University as of May 13. You can e-mail him at collegian@spub.ksu.edu.

Grant to help RCPD curb area underage drinking

By Holly Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department received a grant earlier this year to help curb underage drinking.

The $8,044 grant, which was allocated by the Kansas Department of Traffic Safety Bureau, has allowed for increased patrols in three out of the four weekends in March, April and May.

RCPD Sgt. Steve Boyda said the grant covers two officers coming in for six hours each Friday and Saturday night and said the increased patrols have more than quadrupled the amount of alcohol-related citations.

Boyda said there were a total of 94 alcohol-related violations in March and 103 violations in April.

"Forty-eight of those violations in March and 48 of those violations in April were for minors in possession of alcohol," he said. "We knew there was a problem with alcohol-related incidences but because we haven't had the person power to focus on that, with this grant we have really been able to be more pro-active in that area."

Boyda said those cited with an MIP will lose their license for 30 days. He said while the police department's main focus is ticketing for MIPs, they also are addressing the possession of open containers by persons older than 21.

"When students see people carrying beers around town that sends a message that it is OK to do, and we are trying to change that," he said.

Boyda said the increased patrols are focused on the area north of Aggieville and some of the large apartment complexes in town.

"We try to focus on areas of town where we receive the most complaints," he said. "We don't waste our time going to areas where we haven't gotten complaints."

Liz Norman, court clerk for the Manhattan Municipal Court, said each person who is charged with an MIP must attend a court hearing.

Norman said the court costs are generally $116 and the overall fine varies by case. First-time offenders are generally eligible for a diversion, which costs $416, she said.

The Department of Traffic Safety focuses on educating Kansans year-round about the importance of drinking responsibly, said Robert Eichkorn, program consultant for Kansas Department of Transportation's department of traffic safety.

"What we have to understand is underage drinking leads to a great deal of chaos on Kansas roadways," he said.

Pete Bodyk, KDOT Bureau Chief of traffic safety, said the Office of Juvenile and Delinquency Prevention supplied the grant, and KDOT was in charge of distributing it to individual agencies.

Bodyk said a grant was given to RCPD because they felt it was an area that could greatly benefit from the money.

"We looked at college towns where sometimes there is a large underage drinking issue," he said.

Students plan to take classes, work during summer months

By Kelsey Childress
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There are many choices for students to choose from during the summer.

Some study abroad, others go home to catch up with family, and some stay in Manhattan to work and catch up on earning class credits.

"Summer classes are not as formal and seem to go by a lot faster," Ryan Birchell, senior in accounting, said. "Truly, I don't think you have to do as much work for them, but you do have to do the work in a lot shorter period of time."

Most summer classes are from June 1 to July 28 and meet Monday through Friday. There are, however, a few classes that are only a month long, but meet for longer periods of time every day.

Online classes also are popular among students, because they don't have to go to a classroom.

"I have never taken summer classes before, but this year I am taking an independent study class through KU," Morgan Dietz, junior in secondary education, said. "I will hopefully like it, because I will never have to be in a classroom, and I can work at my own pace."

For those studying abroad, there were several options for students through the Office of International Programs, who offered a three-week trip around Europe.

For students staying in Manhattan, many like the atmosphere of the city because most of the college population has left until fall semester.

"I am planning on staying in Manhattan this summer to take a couple classes and maintain my job," Megan Jill Amos, sophomore in pre-occupational therapy, said. "(Manhattan) seems a lot more laid back. I actually enjoy living here more in the summer than during the main school year."

Several students stay in Manhattan not only to keep their jobs, but because they have year-long leases and do not want to find a sub-leaser for the summer term.

Many students have said they believe Manhattan is fun if they still have their roommates or friends in town to keep them company.

Birchell, who is doing an internship for the summer in Hutchinson, Kan., maintains that staying in Manhattan is a good idea.

"As long as you have a friend or two that are also in town for the summer it can be just as fun as during the school year," he said. "Campus is beautiful during the summer and less crowded."

Overall, after the rigorous school year, relaxing seems to be the number one priority in many students' minds.

"(Summers) have been a much-needed break," Dietz said. "By the end of May I am always worn out and ready to have some time for myself. For me, summer is always a time for working, drinking, Country Stampede and having some fun."

A different Moussaoui appears at his sentencing to life in prison

By Michael J. Sniffen
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ALEXANDRIA, Va. – An unrepentant yet very different Zacarias Moussaoui showed up to speak when he was sentenced Thursday to life in prison.

For a few minutes on the witness stand, he put aside the venom, the stilted abusive epithets and even the witticisms that have characterized his often-turbulent and sometimes shocking court appearances for more than four years.

The 37-year-old Frenchman, whose words got him in more trouble than his deeds, put aside his prepared remarks and spoke soberly and quietly to three relatives of 9/11 victims in the courtroom. He acknowledged rather than relished their pain and tried to explain the anger that he and other al-Qaida terrorists feel toward Americans.

Moments earlier, these three relatives stood in court, faced Moussaoui and described loved ones lost when al-Qaida hijackers crashed four jetliners into the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and a Pennsylvania field on Sept. 11, 2001.

Rosemary Dillard, whose lost her husband, Eddie, at the Pentagon told Moussaoui: "You wrecked my life. You wrecked my career. You took the most important person in my life from me. I live alone. I think of that man every day."

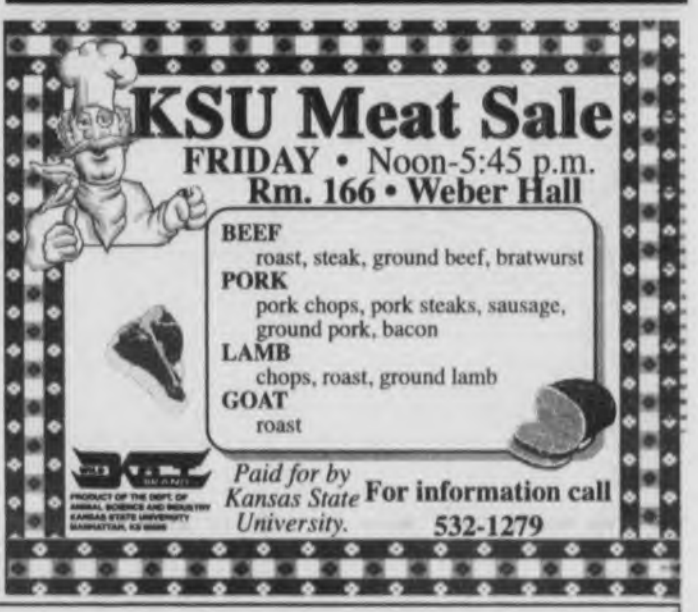
Moussaoui sat in his chair staring at Dillard and the other family witnesses, Abraham Scott and Lisa Dolan, betraying no emotion as they spoke. Then he took the stand.

"She said I destroyed her life and she lost her husband," Moussaoui said of Dillard. "Maybe one day she can think about how many people the CIA has destroyed. ... You have an amount of hypocrisy which is beyond any belief. Your humanity is a very selective humanity. Only you suffer; only you feel."

Prosecutor Rob Spencer objected Moussaoui was giving a political speech. Brinkema agreed and told him to discuss the sentence.

"You have branded me as a terrorist or criminal," Moussaoui continued. "You should look about yourself first. I fight for my belief." Then he wrapped up: "You don't want to hear the truth."

He called the trial "a wasted opportunity for this country to understand ... why people like me, like (hijacker) Mohamed Atta and the rest have so much hatred for you."



"As long as you don't want to hear, you will feel, America," he said. "If you don't want to hear, you will feel" pain.

"God curse America and save Osama bin Laden. You will never get him."

Twice in this trial Moussaoui himself passed up opportunities to deliver this message. Once he took the stand to recant four-year-long claim that he had nothing to do with 9/11 and assert he was to hijack a fifth jetliner that day and fly into the White House. His own defense attorneys, the prosecutors and even the judge have since questioned the truth of part or all of that testimony.

Walk aids polio research

By Kristin Hodges
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Flint Hills March of Dimes WalkAmerica is having a three-mile walk Saturday starting and ending at the Bosco Student Plaza.

Sarah Meyer, special events coordinator for March of Dimes, said the walk's route will be around campus, and anyone can participate.

She said it is the 36th year for the March of Dimes WalkAmerica, and a walk has taken place at K-State for about 30 years.

Meyer said March of Dimes was originally founded by President Franklin D. Roosevelt to help find a cure for polio, and the organization was successful.

Instead of closing down the organization after finding a cure, the organization decided to help babies and focus on things such as birth defects and folic acid awareness, she said.

Meyer said one focus of the organization is helping premature babies, since one in eight babies are born prematurely in America.

"A mother can do everything right and still have a premature baby," Meyer said. "Unfortunately, a premature birth can cause the baby lifelong problems, and in some cases, the babies die."

Premature babies also are a burden on health care costs, Meyer said.

The fundraising event takes place in nearly 1,100 communities in all 50 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico, according to the WalkAmerica Web site.

Since its beginning in 1970, WalkAmerica has raised more than $1.5 billion, according to its Web site.

Meyer said money raised from Saturday's walk supports mothers and babies in the local community. It will go to different hospitals and organizations for mothers for items that include diapers, car seats and information, she said.

Participants for the Flint Hills March of Dimes WalkAmerica can be individuals or teams, Meyer said.

She said before the race, participants are asked to raise as much money as possible, and those who decide to do the event on Saturday are asked to try to make at least a $25 donation.

About 70 teams participate in the walk each year, and about 500 walkers are expected to participate, Meyer said.

Meyer said breakfast will be served before the race to all participants, and lunch also will be served after the walk.

She said many volunteers helped plan the event, including students and faculty from K-State and local community members.

Lafene Health Center is sponsoring the event, said Dianna Schalles, health educator at Lafene.

"Lafene has been heavily involved in past years," Schalles said.

In the past, Lafene has helped raise money for the event by different activities including selling Beanie Babies.

Entertainment and activities also will be at the event, including free back massages and games for children, Meyer said.

"It will be a really good time for everybody," Meyer said. "It will be a festive and fun atmosphere."

Connie Kipp, executive assistant at Briggs Auto Group, said Russell Briggs, the owner of the auto group, is the chairperson for the event this year.

"He feels like the community has given to him," Kipp said. "And he likes to give back."

Kipp said Briggs Auto Group has a team this year and one of the ways its members have raised money is through an employee chili feed.

They also had blue-jeans-for-baby day, where employees wore blue jeans to work by paying $5 to Janet Vance, the team's captain, Kipp said.

Krista Caffey, owner of Hey Baby!, said the store is hosting the children's activities at the event that March of Dimes is coordinating.

Caffey said the store carries primary baby items and baby furniture and bedding, but the store also has specialty items for premature babies.

"WalkAmerica is definitely a fundraising event that we strongly support for its worthy cause," Caffey said.

Government awards $1 billion for speedier vaccine preparation

By Kevin Freking
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. – The government on Thursday awarded more than $1 billion to five drug manufacturers that are developing technology for speedier mass production of vaccines in case of a pandemic.

The money comes from the $3.8 billion that Congress approved last year. The goal is to be able to distribute vaccine to every American within six months of a pandemic striking.

Currently, flu vaccines are produced in specialized chicken eggs, but that technique does not allow for speedy mass vaccination.

"The hard truth is that, at this moment, the capacity simply does not exist in the United States to produce vaccines with sufficient speed and quantity to reach everyone out there. That's true of countries all over the world, but that's about to change," said Mike Leavitt, secretary for the Department of Health and Human Services, before signing the contracts

The companies are GlaxoSmithKline, $274.8 million; MedImmune Inc., $169.5 million; Novartis Vaccines and Diagnostics, $220.5 million; DynPort Vaccine Co., $41 million; and Solvay Pharmaceuticals Inc., $298.6 million. The contracts cover a five-year period.

Leavitt said vaccines are America's best line of defense if there is a pandemic.

Such an outbreak can occur when people have little immunity to a particular strain of flu that spreads across the globe. Leavitt often refers to the pandemic of 1918 as an example of a worst-case scenario that he says could kill up to 2 million Americans.

"There is no reason to believe the 21st century will be different than centuries past," Leavitt said. Health officials are concerned that a form of influenza now spreading in birds could eventually mutate and spread from person to person.

Leavitt said the contracts would help the government meet other goals, including the diversification of a domestic supply of vaccines so that the United States would not have to rely on foreign production during a pandemic. He also said the technology could help the country build up its stock of seasonal flu vaccines as well.

Leavitt noted that the government is also stockpiling masks, gloves and other equipment that could be used in a pandemic and it has contracted with drug manufacturers to provide for 4 million treatment courses of a vaccine against the current H5N1 virus. He said that researchers are also working on the development of a new generation of vaccines that would be broadly protective of a wide range of influenza viruses.

"The challenges are substantial, but if we can get there, it would take the threat of a pandemic right off the table," Leavitt said.

David Stout, president of pharmaceutical operations at GlaxoSmithKline, said that vaccine manufacturers are about three to five years away from growing flu vaccines in large laboratory vats rather than in individual eggs. The $274.5 million his company gets will primarily go to research and clinical trials.

"What this funding does is accelerate the speed in which we can do the work," Stout said.

Leavitt could not say how much of their own money the drug companies would be investing in cell-based technology, but he said the government's funding would leverage a significant investment.

"They're not just simply taking our money and doing research," he said. "They are making substantial commitments of their own in terms of people, capital and resources."

Manhattan man charged with indecent liberties

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bradley Norris, 2008 Gladiola Court, was charged with four felony counts relating to an incident with a minor, Lt. Tim Hegarty of the Riley County Police Department said.

Norris was charged with aggravated indecent liberties with a child and criminal sodomy, resulting from offenses which occurred over a period of two years in northeast Manhattan, Hegarty said.

"The victim was 14 years old at the time," Hegarty said.

The alleged incidents occurred between September 2004 and May 2006, he said.

In a separate incident, Norris was arrested in City Park at approximately 8 a.m., Wednesday on charges of criminal threat and criminal restraint.

The incident involved a 16-year-old female.

"The suspect attempted to force the victim into his car and also threatened her life," Hegarty said.

Bond was set at $25,000.

Norris' first court appearance is May 17 at 9:30 a.m., Hegarty said.

"I don't do it all alone," he said. "We have a lot of very capable people here. We like to empower people."

TWO COACH HIRES

The retirement of former football coach Bill Snyder and the dismissal of basketball coach Jim Wooldridge marked the first time at K-State both a men's basketball and a football coach were hired in the same year, Wefald said.

"We got really good national publicity with both of these hires," Wefald said.

Results of the spike in publicity will probably carry over into more nationally broadcast football and basketball games next year, Wefald said.

This year was not only monumental for K-State, it set a precedent in the Big 12 Conference.

"When you look at it collectively, I can't think of anything with any of the Big 12 schools that would rival it," Jim Epps, senior associate athletic director, said.

Epps said the excitement level is very high for the next school year.

"I think it was manifested by the 31,000 plus people we had at the Spring Game this year," he said.

Ticket sales are reflecting the excitement, Bob Cavello, associate athletic director, said.

"People are putting down a $100 deposit for basketball season tickets without knowing the ticket cost," he said.

Epps said he thinks some of the games will be sold out for football and basketball.

"Fans anticipate excitement and wins," he said. "We're going to be a greater presence to a wider audience."

Oklahoma State House wants national anthem sung in English

By Tim Talley
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OKLAHOMA CITY – When Oklahomans belt out "The Star-Spangled Banner," they should do it in English and not some other language native to a growing number of immigrants in the state, the Oklahoma House decided Thursday.

On the eve of the Mexican holiday Cinco de Mayo, the state House joined the national debate over the nation's national anthem in a nonbinding resolution encouraging it to be sung in English "to unify the nation and empower the country as a whole."

The resolution also encourages immigrants to learn the anthem in English "so that they may be unified with the country to which they have chosen to pledge their allegiance."

A Spanish-language version of the national anthem, called "Nuestro Himno," which means "Our Anthem," debuted last week. It features several Latino artists and has stirred controversy because it rewrites some of the English version.

President Bush has said he believes people who want to be U.S. citizens should learn to sing the national anthem in English.

The House resolution, which passed 71-13, stirred debate among opponents who said it was a political stunt by its Republican author, Rep. Thad Balkman of Norman, that struck a blow against diversity.

"It's just an extension of a particular philosophical charge to delete diversity in our great state," said Rep. Ray McCarter, D-Marlow.

Lawmakers linked the resolution to attempts by some GOP lawmakers to pass anti-immigration legislation. A measure to require public employees to report suspected illegal aliens passed the House but died in the Senate.

"This has nothing to do with immigration reform," McCarter said of the resolution. "It has to do with dividing one group of people from another.

"Shame on you for not realizing there are different people among us who are just like us," McCarter said.

Rep. Ray Miller, D-Quinton, bemoaned having to deal with the resolution when lawmakers have not reached budget agreements for state prisons, schools and roads and bridges.

"We ought to be ashamed of us for wasting time," Miller said.

Balkman said there was nothing political about the measure.

"It's unfortunate that the motives have been impugned," he said. "I'm proud of my country.

"If you love our country, if you think we need to be more unified and not less unified, then vote for the resolution," he said.

Pat Fennel of the Latino Community Development Agency said she is not surprised the resolution was adopted. It passed one day before the Cinco de Mayo holiday, which celebrates Mexican troops' defeat of a French army on May 5, 1862.

"There are folks in the community who choose to fuel negative sentiment," Fennel said. "Immigrants can do nothing right right now."

Fennel said it is ironic that lawmakers would take a position when singing the national anthem in a language other than English is not an issue in the state.

"I think it's laughable when that has not occurred in Oklahoma," Fennel said. She said Latinos are patriotic people who revere the national anthem out of respect for the thousands of Latinos who are serving with the nation's armed forces in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"We are not going to be disrespecting our own people who are in the military," Fennel said.

Senate advances bill tying machinery break to tax credit

By John Hanna
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA, Kan. – The Senate on Thursday tied a new investment tax credit for hundreds of businesses to Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' proposal to phase out property taxes on business machinery and equipment.

Senators gave their package first-round approval on a voice vote, with final action expected Friday. The House passed a machinery tax bill in February and has endorsed several other tax breaks. The two chambers plan to negotiate the final contents of tax legislation.

The Senate's package represents an attempt to stimulate the economy, and the total breaks for businesses could exceed $740 million over the next six years. Cities and counties would shoulder the bulk of the burden.

But backers believe the tax breaks will encourage firms to buy new equipment, make other investments and create jobs so the economic activity would generate enough revenues to overcome what the state, cities and counties would otherwise lose.

"If we reduce the burden on businesses, they're able to increase investments," said Sen. Phil Journey, R-Haysville. "We increase the tax base. We have more people employed, and they're better jobs."

The biggest break in the bill would grant an exemption from property taxes to businesses for the new machinery and equipment they buy, starting July 1. The exemption would apply not only to heavy industrial machinery but also to office fixtures such as chairs, desks and computers.

Eventually, when all machinery and equipment purchased before July 1 was replaced, businesses would pay no property taxes on those items. The bill mirrors Sebelius' plan, except that she proposed applying the exemption starting on Jan. 1, 2007.

Cities and counties would lose an estimated $628 million over six years. However, the bill promises $199 million in state aid to lessen the shock should economic activity not generate enough new revenues.

The proposal drew some criticism because the change could cost cities and counties far more than it would cost the state.

"Why don't we at least give away our own money?" said Sen. Pete Brungardt, R-Salina.

Senators voted 39-1 to expand a program that gives about 40 businesses a 10 percent credit against their income taxes for investments in new property, including real estate. Manufacturing, transportation and telecommunications firms now qualify if they invest more than $50,000 and pay wages that are better than their industry's average.

Construction to expand Call Hall's sales area

By Christina Hansen
K-STATE COLLEGIAN

Call Hall has been a teaching tool for K-State students and a tasty destination for ice cream lovers for decades.

A new construction project will begin at Call Hall this month to expand the sales area and create more seating for customers.

Jack Riley, professor of Animal Sciences and Industry, said an atrium dining room, where customers could sit to eat ice cream, will be added directly south of the existing sales counter.

"The addition will make the store far more attractive to alumni and friends of the university," he said. "It will be more of an ice cream parlor type of environment."

Riley also said the removal of an interior wall will expand cheese and milk sales and also allow the transfer of the university's meat sales from Weber Hall to Call Hall.

"This project will help us accommodate our wide range of clientele, and it may help us to expand our hours to weekends, which we have never done before," he said.

Interim animal sciences and industry department head Janice Swanson said along with updated facilities and increased customer convenience, education was another important goal of the renovation.

"The project would also include a new information kiosk to let the public know where our dairy products come from," she said. "This will make a trip to Call Hall an educational opportunity."

Since the university's dairy processing plant was moved there in 1964, the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry has used the Call Hall facilities for teaching and research, and as a venue to sell dairy and meat products to the K-State and Manhattan communities.

Karen Schmidt, professor of Animal Sciences and Industry and faculty supervisor of the dairy processing plant, said the relocation project was born out of convenience.

"Call Hall was built because the dairy science faculty wanted everything together – they wanted the plant to be near the rest of the

K-State tuition increase

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This year's tuition increase has the potential to be the second largest increase in K-State history. It could be as high as 12.7 percent.

Bruce Shubert, associate vice president for the administration and finance department, said tuition increase is consistent with K-State's five-year plan. However, he mentioned a couple factors that would make the increase higher than initially planned.

"There are two additional components that would make the percentage bigger," Shubert said. "There will be a $1.50 surcharge per credit hour for the free replacement."

This cost will cover the elimination of fees for transcripts, commencement and career placement.

The other factor that would increase tuition is a $2 surcharge per credit hour for extraordinary maintenance bills, he said.

"The surcharge will help with things that have been extremely high recently, like natural gas prices for examples," Shubert said. "When the prices go back down, the surcharge will too."

Other than the two extra components that might raise tuition higher than usual, Shubert said, tuition increase is part of K-State's five-year

Basketball roster faces changes

By Ben Fallin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It might be the off-season for the K-State men's basketball team, but there has been a whirlwind of activity going on at Bramlage Coliseum the past few weeks.

SUSPENSION, DISMISSAL

Senior small-forward Cartier Martin has been suspended indefinately. Martin, selected on an All-Big 12 second team this past season, was suspended for violating unspecified conduct violations, enforced by K-State basketball coach Bob Huggins.

"(Cartier) hasn't been kicked off the team," said Tim Fitzgerald, editor of Gopowercat.com and Powercat Illustrated. "It has something to do with the infamous 'violation of team rules and policies' is all I can say."

If Martin were to be dismissed from the team, it would leave a hole in K-State's lineup. Last season, Martin led the Wildcats in games started, minutes played, 3-point field goals, 3-point field goal percentage, free-throw percentage, rebounds per game and average points per game.

Mario Taybron, a senior guard, was dismissed from the team for violating the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics' substance-abuse policy.

"We have high expectations of our student-athletes on and off the court," K-State Athletic Director Tim Weiser said in a press release. "When they fail to meet those expectations, there are consequences."

Ron Prince speaks at Good Morning Manhattan

By Mary Bershenyi
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Interest in Good Morning Manhattan grew when K-State football coach Ron Prince announced he would speak at Monday's meeting.

Prince shook hands and spoke with members of the Chamber of Commerce on Monday in a ballroom at the Holiday Inn Holidome, 530 Richards Drive, before giving a speech about the future of the football program during the quarterly Good Morning Manhattan.

Prince focused on the changing face of college football, how significant Manhattan is for the program and what it will take to return K-State to its previous success.

The changing of college football and the attention it is receiving was a reason Prince chose to come to events like Good Morning Manhattan.

"I really believe that you have to deliver your own message," Prince said. "I'm amazed how much interest has gone into sports. It changes how television portrays the college phenomenon."

The Chamber of Commerce was excited about Prince's willingness to be involved in the community, Beverly Orr, membership program manager, said.

"We typically have four speakers who speak for five minutes each," Orr said. "But, with Prince, we gave him the whole time. It is definitely a benefit for our members, it is an opportunity to network and be part of the community."

Returning to his home state from his previous coaching job in Virginia was a big draw for Prince.

"It's a place I'm showing off to people," Prince said. "It is really unique here. College towns are hot – people are retiring to them. We live in an area that cannot be a bigger asset to us growing."

Manhattan and the surrounding community played a chief role in recruiting players, Prince said.

"I'm here to thank you for creating such a wonderful environment for recruiting," he said. "The one common thread was that (the recruits) loved this town."

K-State's Head Football Coach Ron Prince speaks about the future of the football program to attendees of Good Morning Manhattan on Monday morning at the Holiday Inn Holidome's ballroom.

Steven Doll
COLLEGIAN

Though many criticized Manhattan as being far away from a major large city, Prince said it was not an issue because of modern technology.

"This is a global environment," he said. "If you have a teenager, you've seen your text messaging bill."

Prince said he was excited about the future of the program.

"We're building a fast, strong, tough team," he said. "We're interested in building a complete person."

The program depends on community investing and believing in the future of the team, Prince said.

"It is the best way to not just win today," he said. "We have to reinvest daily to ensure our share of the market."

School finance issues
Some Legislators hope that Kansas can afford the three-year school finance plan they approved after state revenues reached almost $46 million more than expected. The newest revenue figures, which were released Tuesday, lessened worries about the state's financial future.

Avoiding the 6th
Superstitious mothers-to-be made sure their babies were not born on the most bedeviling of dates, 6-6-6. In Wichita, Kan., a woman suddenly realized her delivery date was June 6 and asked her doctor to delay the birth, said Dr. James Whiddon of a Wichita clinic.

Sexual equality
With a number of gay rights issues emerging from various states, about four out of 10 Americans believe in some rights for sexual minorities.

Arts in the Park to entertain this summer

Country music singer Julie Roberts headlined this summer's first Arts in the Park event last weekend.

The annual summer-long Arts in the Park event, sponsored by several local businesses and the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department, will be every Friday and Saturday night through Aug. 12 at the Larry Norvell Band Shell, 1101 Fremont Street, in City Park. The shows are free and begin at 8.

"We try to get a good variety of music," Kathy Swan, Arts in the Park coordinator, said. "This year we're going to have some oldies, country, bluegrass, jazz, Caribbean and a salsa band."

The SalsaNoche.com Dancers, a group of salsa dancers from Kansas City, Mo., will perform Saturday, along with the Miguel "Mambo" DeLeon Orchestra.

"We will be doing 'casino rueda,'" Howard Carney, SalsaNoche.com founder, said. "It's kind of like Cuban square dancing, where dancers trade partners. We might also teach a short lesson, too."

Carney said this is the first time the group has performed in Manhattan.

"We hope to expose people to salsa and get them addicted like we are," he said.

Swan said about 2,000 to 5,000 people attend each performance. She said performances generally last two hours.

There are benches and bleachers available for seating, but Swan said many people choose to bring lawn chairs and blankets. Swan encourages audience members to bring drinks and snacks as well.

Arts in the Park is designed to be a family-type event, Swan said. "It's one of our biggest priorities to make this family oriented, or at least all-ages appropriate," she said.

ARTS IN THE PARK

Commission passes mandate

By Logan C. Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan City Commission passed an ordinance Tuesday night that will set in motion condemnation proceedings for two pieces of land in the downtown redevelopment project.

This was the commission's second hearing on the subject; the first was in April. Mayor Bruce Snead said the use of eminent domain is needed because of the property owners' refusal to reach a deal with Dial Realty, the company orchestrating the project, is holding up the entire project.

"It was a last resort, but a necessary one," Snead said.

All other property owners affected by the project have made agreements with Dial except Penny Ferlemann Sizemore and Marlene Ferlemann. They own property at 517 N. Third St. and 521 N. Third St., respectively.

Dial representatives said they had offered the owners much more than the properties' appraised values, but they still refused it. The owners were not at the meeting.

City Manager Ron Fehr said the condemnation case should be filed in two weeks. He said there are several steps to the process including the appointment of three uninvolved appraisers to determine the property's value.

Fehr said the whole process should take several months.

The commission also appropriated $3,500 to an effort to make a large part of Manhattan's downtown along Poyntz Avenue into a National Register District. The process requires a nomination to the National Register of Historical Places by the Kansas State Historical Society.

"$3,500 is to me a small investment," Commissioner Jayme Morris-Hardeman said.

Jim Sherow of Downtown Manhattan Inc. told the commission that it would make it easier for owners of qualifying buildings in the district to apply for state tax credits for minor renovation and restoration projects.

The commission also approved a purchase of 2.67 acres of land for a new fire station in Grand Mere Village.

Jerry Snyder, director of fire services, said the location will help Manhattan's firefighters meet national standards for response times. He said the goal is to arrive at any emergency within four minutes.

The cost to the city will be $1 per acre, making the price $117,000. Snyder said the rate is considerably less than what Grand Mere Development could charge for the land.

"They really do want us there," he said. "It gives them great fire coverage."

After class or leaving work, the last thing people want to see is a golden parking ticket on their car.

"Since we don't have the volume and we have a lot of work going on, we want to make it convenient for people to park," Darwin Abbott, director of parking services, said in a previous Collegian article.

Summer parking rules and regulations are slightly different from fall and spring semesters.

"During the summer, we allow each group to park in any lot, as long as they observe reserved stalls and handicap stalls regulations," said Gary Leitnaker, Assistant Vice President of the Division of Human Resources.

Students who still have permits from the past academic year may continue to use those permits to park on campus until the beginning of the first day of class of the fall semester, according to the 2006-07 Parking Services guidelines.

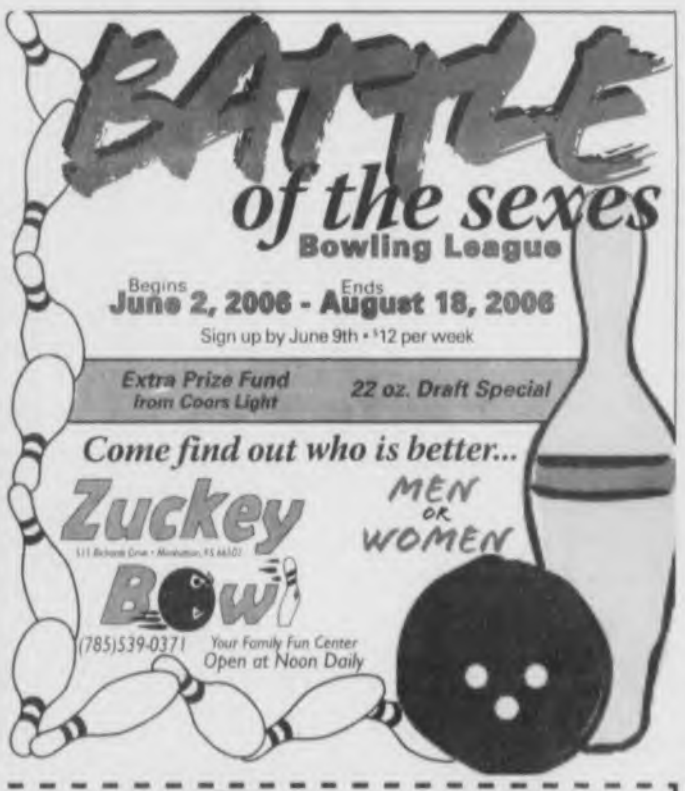
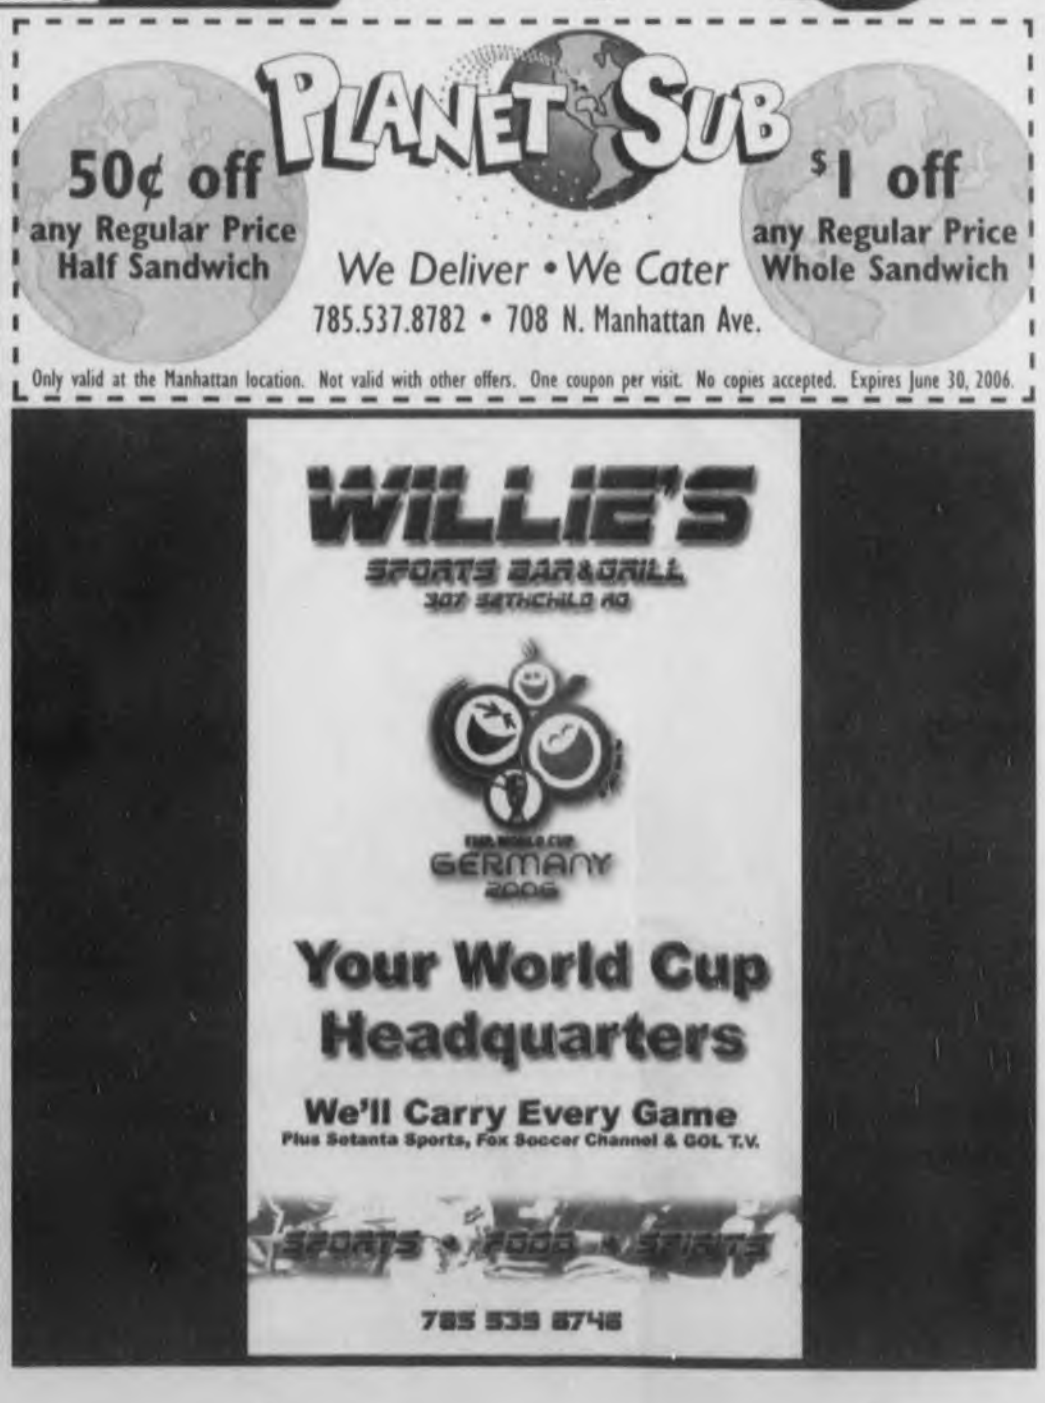
After 5 p.m. and before 7 a.m., students are not required to have permits to park in O, W, T or Z lots Monday through Friday.

Residence hall lots, fire lanes and handicap-accessible parking stalls are patrolled 24 hours a day throughout the year. Drivers must have the appropriate parking permits for these areas.



Those who park in metered stalls, however, do not need a parking permit. Instead, those who use metered parking are required to pay 75 cents per hour.

On weekends, permits and meter payments aren't required. However, handicap-accessible parking stalls and reserved 24-hour stalls are still enforced, Leitnaker said.



According to the Parking Services handbook for university holidays specifically, "Parking permits are not required on university holidays. All other regulations will be enforced."

TO THE POINT

Leadership should transfer off-court

Within the past few weeks, it seems like K-State basketball has become a game of musical chairs.

Probably the most shocking event was the suspension of Cartier Martin, K-State's leading returning scorer.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Why couldn't Martin continue his leadership off the court? People look up to athletes. By becoming a part of the public eye, they have an obligation to conduct themselves in a manner suitable for the public.

Only Martin, the athletic department and a few select others know exactly what he did to get suspended.

But it doesn't matter.

And when people who children regard as role models go against a rule, it makes children think it's OK to break the rules too.

While the rule could have been a new one set up by Coach Huggins, the players still have obligations to follow those rules.

Martin was suspended and Mario Taybron was dismissed. How many more returners will K-State lose before the players realize that their actions do, in fact, have consequences?

Freedom of speech

Catholic group works to silence any opposing voice

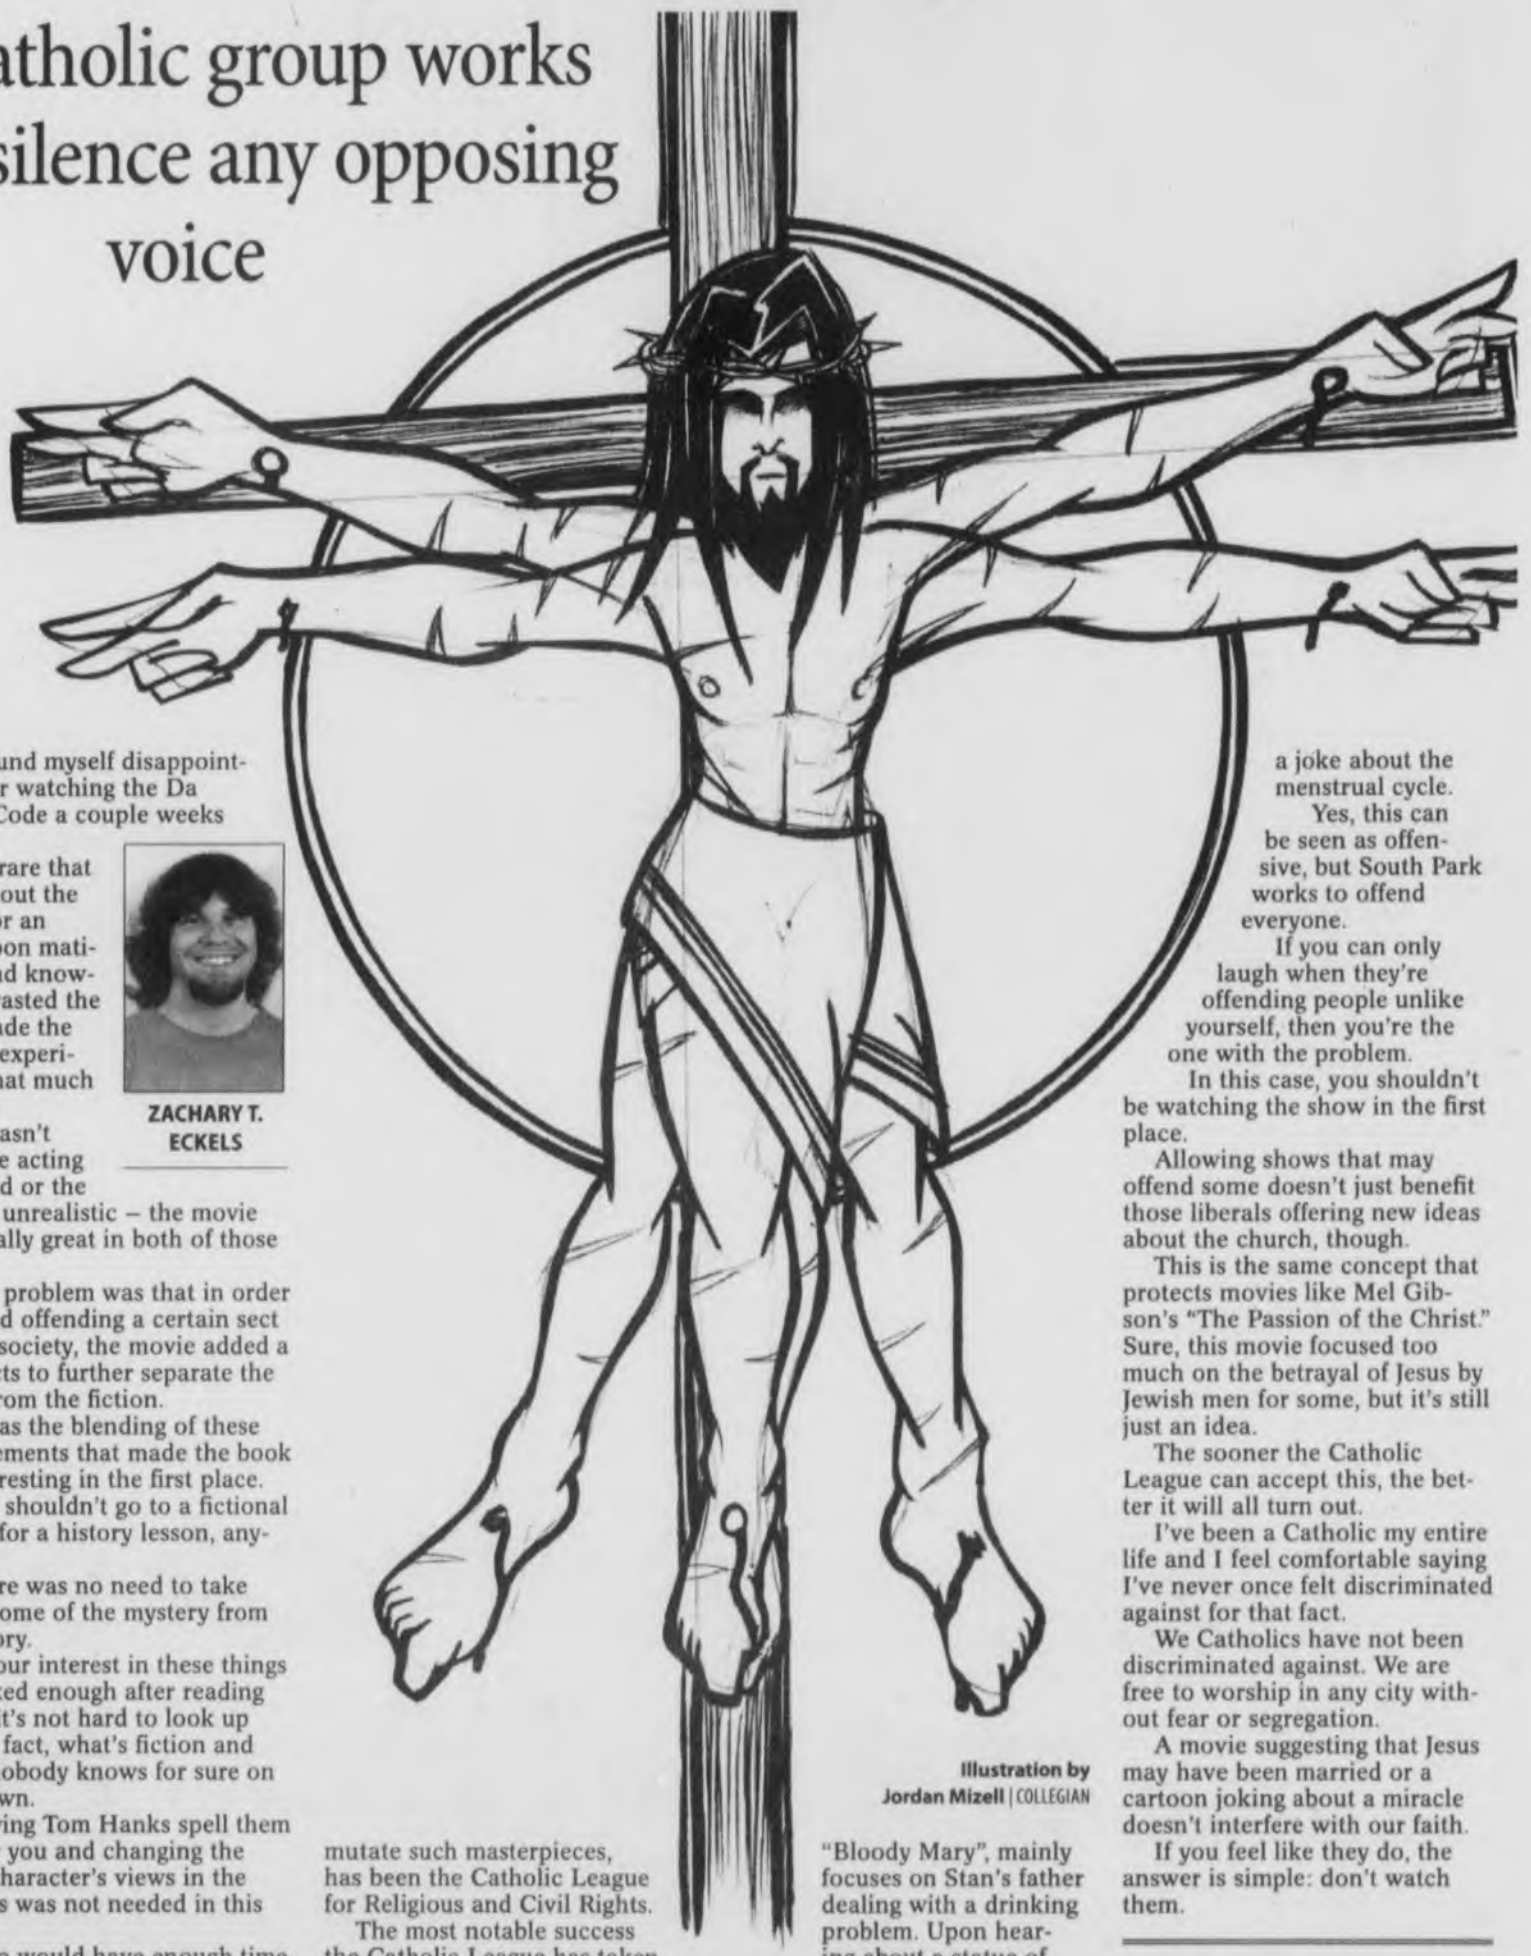

Illustration by Jordan Mizell | COLLEGIAN

ZACHARY T. ECKELS

I found myself disappointed after watching the Da Vinci Code a couple weeks ago.

It's rare that I shell out the cash for an afternoon matinee, and knowing I wasted the trip made the whole experience that much worse.

It wasn't that the acting was bad or the scenes unrealistic – the movie was really great in both of those areas.

The problem was that in order to avoid offending a certain sect of our society, the movie added a few facts to further separate the truth from the fiction.

It was the blending of these two elements that made the book so interesting in the first place.

You shouldn't go to a fictional movie for a history lesson, anyway.

There was no need to take away some of the mystery from this story.

If your interest in these things is peaked enough after reading them, it's not hard to look up what's fact, what's fiction and what nobody knows for sure on your own.

Having Tom Hanks spell them out for you and changing the main character's views in the process was not needed in this film.

Who would have enough time to waste on such things?

The main group going through the troubles to silence, or at least mutate such masterpieces, has been the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights.

The most notable success the Catholic League has taken part in was convincing Comedy Central to pull an episode of South Park. The episode, entitled "Bloody Mary", mainly focuses on Stan's father dealing with a drinking problem. Upon hearing about a statue of Mary bleeding unexplainably, they make a trip to see the miracle – only to be greeted with a joke about the menstrual cycle.

Yes, this can be seen as offensive, but South Park works to offend everyone.

If you can only laugh when they're offending people unlike yourself, then you're the one with the problem.

In this case, you shouldn't be watching the show in the first place.

Allowing shows that may offend some doesn't just benefit those liberals offering new ideas about the church, though.

This is the same concept that protects movies like Mel Gibson's "The Passion of the Christ." Sure, this movie focused too much on the betrayal of Jesus by Jewish men for some, but it's still just an idea.

The sooner the Catholic League can accept this, the better it will all turn out.

I've been a Catholic my entire life and I feel comfortable saying I've never once felt discriminated against for that fact.

We Catholics have not been discriminated against. We are free to worship in any city without fear or segregation.

A movie suggesting that Jesus may have been married or a cartoon joking about a miracle doesn't interfere with our faith.

If you feel like they do, the answer is simple: don't watch them.

National anti-immigration trend is un-American

LOLA SHRIMPLIN

The world's largest unprotected border lies between the United States and Canada, yet President Bush plans to send up to 6,000 National Guard troops to the border between the United States and Mexico.

Aren't there poor people in Canada who are desperate to come here to make a living? So desperate they would allow themselves to be put in trucks and shipped like cattle?

The Associated Press reports that the Bush administration is open to putting troops on the border of Canada now, too.

From 1910-18, Henry Ford, known mostly for automobiles, became increasingly anti-semitic and anti-immigration.

He bought a newspaper called the Dearborn Independent, and a columnist he'd chosen wrote a series of articles titled "The International Jew: The World's Problem."

Ford read a propaganda piece called "The Protocols of the Elders of Zion," which was put out by people trying to overthrow the tsar of Russia. It stated that Jews were trying to overthrow European governments. He later blamed World War II on Jewish bankers.

During World War II, ships came from Europe to the United States, bringing Jews hoping to escape the Holocaust.

We sent them back. Congress at that time was anti-immigration, anti-Jewish and our government was practicing non-intervention in the war.

We didn't offer asylum to those people who needed it most.

Why this cycle of anti-immigration? And does it apply to everyone, or just those with skin colors other than white, and religions other than Christianity?

People from Mexico and Latin America aren't coming here on a whim. People in China don't decide to move here just for the heck of it.

They don't decide one day to leave all they have ever known and move to a country that doesn't speak their language.

They don't leave all of their friends and family, get packed into crates on a ship or cross a desert where they have a good chance of dying.

When I was in Europe, I went from Switzerland to France without a passport. I had one with me, but no one checked - until I got back here.

My brother went to Canada to visit and got harassed by border patrol on the way back. They were rude and didn't believe he was from the United States.

What's the big deal? Being American isn't a single identity. It includes people from every country around the world. We have people from everywhere. That's American.

Why not open the borders and create an entire continent of people who can work and travel?

Kind of like the European Union, without the political mess.

We could still retain our status as citizens of the United States, and also as residents of the American Union or whatever. Jobs would increase, because people need doctors, lawyers, construction workers and other services.

Instead of worrying about keeping people out, maybe we could start worrying about actually taking care of everyone.

Warming up to K-State

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Matt Coleman, junior in chemistry, Anthony Carter, junior in secondary education and Amanda Barrett, senior in human ecology and mass communications, talk in a small group during training for counselors Monday afternoon in the K-State Student Union for Wildcat Warm-up.

Incoming freshmen begin orientation process

By Mary Bershenyi
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Beginning Friday, 225 new students will start a three-day intensive orientation process.

Wildcat Warm-up gives incoming freshmen the knowledge they need to be successful and comfortable when they begin their college careers.

Members of the freshman class were invited to register for the program, but space was limited by financial and time restraints, said Amanda Barrett, student director for counselor selection and training and senior in human ecology and mass communications.

Last summer, Wildcat Warm-up was expanded to two weekends in an effort to give more students the opportunity to take part, but organizers found it was better suited to the original, one-weekend plan, Barrett said.

"We took a look at the end of the year at our budget and we felt we weren't where we needed to be to be good stewards of the money we have been allocated," Emily Lehning, assistant dean of student life, said. "I wasn't sure it was a good move for us to have the second weekend end on Father's Day. We thought that might have been a hindrance."

Organized by the Office of New Student Services, the program received allocations from the Student Governing Association and got donations from area businesses to finance the weekend to keep fees low. The weekend cost $125 and scholarships were available.

Included in the weekend were programs that Lehning and the five student directors believed were important for incoming freshmen, including a ropes course to build relationships among the participants, a pep rally, simulation of the Up 'Til Dawn culmination event, speakers about diversity and sexual assault prevention and presentations about the university's history, honor code and study tips.

"I like seeing the participants by the end of the weekend making connections with the community," said Shea Larson, student director of recruitment and senior in communication sciences and disorders. "The pep rally is a really fun event and we have an involvement luncheon where students get to talk to leaders in the organizations they're interested in."

New this year was the addition of a fifth director. Previously, the program only had four student directors and 20 counselors. The addition of a fifth leader gave the program better organization.

"Having a fifth director really helped to balance out the programming and has helped to simplify that for the directors," Barrett said. "We are really starting to reap the benefits as staff. As directors we've had the chance to go back and evaluate what our participants have suggested."

FROM THE EDITOR

New editor in chief open to reader feedback; changes in Collegian include online features

ANNETTE LAWLESS

Two-and-a-half years ago I hated the Kansas State Collegian.

That's right. I was like many of you who read our newspaper. I hoped to see my Fourum comment on the Opinion page, and if anything, to read something moderately entertaining to distract me from a boring class.

Times, however, have changed. And whether you love or hate the campus newspaper, this summer, we hope to entertain you with more than news stories.

Welcome to the Collegian: summer 2006 edition.

Like many things that change in Manhattan during the summer, our newspaper has changed, too.

Every Wednesday, we will do our best to provide you with an intelligent, accurate and objective source for the news that affects K-State and Manhattan, as well as state, national and international news.

Or, if anything, we hope to make your experiences a little bit more bearable with something to distract you from summer class and work.

Though we typically don't have the same format as the rest of the year, we try our best to cover a wide range of topics, even without pages dedicated to sections like sports.

As a result of our different format during the summer, our summer staff has several plans to keep you up-to-date on the latest campus news, fashion trends and sports information.

Additional features of our summer newspaper will be on our Electronic Collegian Web site, www.kstatecollegian.com. This summer, we plan to design our site so you can immediately access our critic's movie reviews and catch photos from large events like Country Stampede.

We also will feature photo galleries, audio and video news on the eCollegian. And of course, whatever does not make the Fourum in our printed edition will be accessible on the site as well.

Above all the changes we do at the Collegian, we truly value you, the readers. If you dislike something columnists wrote or if you have a suggestion on how we can improve, feel free to contact me.

It's not too difficult to get in touch with me. Call the Collegian newsroom at 532-6556, e-mail me at collegian@spub.ksu.edu or come by our publication office in Kedzie 116.

I hope that in my effort to respect you, the readers, by being open to comments and criticism, that I will in turn be given respect from you. After all, it is our duty at the Collegian to serve the readers.

Remember, I too, once disliked the Collegian. But after working with these staff members, I realize what amazing things this student-operated organization does.

And despite all the changes we plan for the summer, and for many years to come, our biggest goal is to serve you.

Construction to continue into fall

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Construction on Manhattan roadways this summer might force some drivers to take a detour.

The construction sites include Anderson Avenue from 17th Street to Denison Avenue and between Connecticut and Seth Child Road, Denison from Kimball Avenue to Anderson, and the interchange at Fort Riley Boulevard and Seth Child.

"Claflin has an increase in traffic because of the Anderson traffic trying to avoid that Anderson corridor," Ott said.

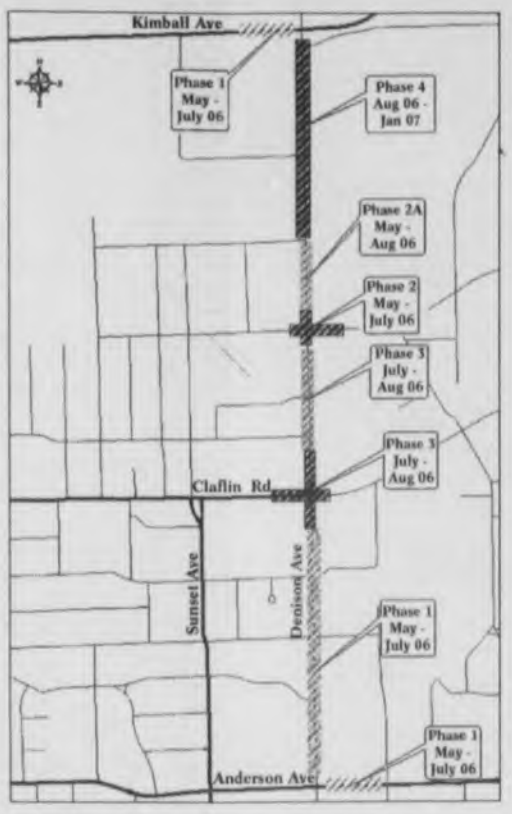
The Anderson Avenue project includes the creation of a center turning lane from the Seth Child interchange to Connecticut. When the project began in late March, it was estimated to take nine months to a year to complete.

The Denison Project is a year-long project that began in May and will include panel replacement on Denison between Claflin and Anderson, construction of a right turn lane on Anderson between 17th Street and Denison, construction of a turn lane on Kimball at the Denison intersection and reconstruction of the intersection at Jardine Drive and Denison.

Ott said the construction phase at Jardine Drive should be completed by the end of July and the intersection at Claflin and Denison will be closed until early August.

"The intent is to have Claflin open before the students come back, and right now it is on schedule," Ott said.

At the interchange of Fort Riley and Seth Child , the Kansas Department of Transportation is changing the entrance and exit to Fort Riley to be four ramps and a stoplight, KDOT area engineer Kevin Schorzman said. Construction is slated to be completed in October and he said it is on schedule



In the meantime, Schorzman said the intersection can be confusing for motorists, so they should pay extra attention.

"Motorists need to know that for now, there is not a stop sign for traffic going from Seth Child to Fort Riley at the Allison Avenue intersection, but there is a stop sign for Allison Avenue traffic," he said.

Construction on major roadways in Manhattan mostly affects traffic during peak times, like mornings and evenings, said Capt. Brad Schoen with the Riley County Police Department patrol division.

"People are moving along on a relatively high speed roadway like Fort Riley and what you see is rear end type accidents," Schoen said. "With only one lane running in each direction when you have an accident it blocks it up."

Schoen said drivers should be aware of their surroundings and their speed in construction areas.

"Pay attention," he said. "Traffic is going to be concentrated into one lane and it is going to be slow. Obviously, if you have a choice, don't drive through a construction area."

Adults receive prizes for summer reading

By Abby Brownback
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Summer reading isn't just for children.

Adults enrolled in the free library program fill out slips for each book they read, and weekly drawings award prizes from about 15 local businesses, said Rhonna Hargett, Manhattan Public Library reference librarian. Also, after the first book is read, each adult receives a small prize.

"We wanted something fun for adults to encourage them to read," she said.

"We found that adults have a good time with it, and they really enjoy the prizes."

The program has been going for three or four years, Hargett said, and more than 200 adults participated last summer.

The children's program, with more than 1,600 participants last year, offers a few more options than the adult program – summer reading, storytimes and clubs.

The children's summer reading program has three tracks based on age groups. Pre-readers have a goal of listening to books read aloud or reading with assistance for 10 hours total, Jennifer Adams, Children's Services manager, said.

Children who will enter sixth grade in the fall and younger students record the number of books or the number of pages they read to reach the goal of 20 books or 2,000 pages, Adams said.

The "Teen Readers" track is for students entering seventh grade through their senior year in high school. Their goal is to read 2,000 pages, Adams said.

Children record their reading on charts and receive prizes when they are halfway to the goal and when they reach the goal for their age group, Adams said. The Manhattan Library Association will give children who meet the goal a free book.

The summer storytimes and clubs, which meet 20-60 minutes weekly from June 6 to July 15, are divided by age and grade level.

Adams said up to 400 children participate each week.

"The goal of the summer reading program is to motivate kids to keep reading over the summer," Adams said. "If kids stop reading at the end of May until school starts again in August, they've lost a lot of ground."

The summer programs also meet the library's goal of promoting literacy and making books fun, Adams said.

Golf tourney benefits veterinary medicine college

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As an aid to the College of Veterinary Medicine's general scholarship fund, the 12th annual benefit golf tournament was Monday at Colbert Hills Golf Course.

More than 60 practitioners, corporate partners, alumni and faculty participated in this year's tournament. Proceeds went directly to the students to help with the high cost of veterinary medicine education.

Ali Eitzmann, junior in veterinary medicine, said the students are heavily involved in the tournament's organization.

"Every year, the responsibility of organizing fundraisers falls to the sophomore class," she said. "The golf tournament is just one of the several fundraisers we orchestrate each year."

Last year's tournament raised more than $6,000. This year was expected to be no different.

Chris Gruber, director of development for the department of Veterinary Medicine at the KSU Foundation, also helped organize this year's event.

"Golf is something enjoyed by many of our alumni and the tournament is organized as a day of fun during our June Veterinarians Conference," he said.

Gruber also said the tournament's popularity has continued to grow steadily over the years.

"Last year was the centennial of the college, and we had our highest turnout with over 70 golfers, a long way from the tournament's early days," he said.

As a part of its "Changing Lives" fundraising campaign, the college of Veterinary Medicine has raised nearly $35 million to benefit all aspects of the college.

department," she said.

The Call Hall plant and sales counter offer students invaluable hands-on experience in the manufacturing and marketing of dairy products, Schmidt said.

"We hire students for a variety of work opportunities at the dairy plant, many that could mimic what they'd be doing in the dairy processing industry," she said.

A variety of products are processed and sold at Call Hall, including salted and unsalted butter, a selection of cheeses, milk and 30 flavors of ice cream.

Swanson said all the milk used to manufacture these products comes from the K-State dairy farm.

"Because we do, in fact, have a working dairy farm and a very active food science program, students have the opportunity to see the whole cycle of production," she said. "It goes from the cow being milked, to being processed and finally marketed at the sales counter."

Despite the seasonal decline in the student population, business remains steady at the Call Hall dairy bar.

Schmidt said the summer heat makes the ice cream counter an ideal destination for many alumni.

"You'll see parents, people who have gone to K-State and want to taste the ice cream again and share it with their kids," she said.

"The five-year plan works to maintain and improve the quality of a K-State degree," Shubert said.

Some of the principles and goals of the plan were to increase faculty salary, award more Targeted Excellence programs, increase funding for need-based student financial aid and library acquisition and an increase in instructional technology in the classroom, Shubert said.

Overall, the plan worked and most of the goals were accomplished, he said.

"In general, goals were met and the improvements were made. We were able to maintain and improve the quality of a K-State degree."

Larry Mowder, assistant vice president for Student Financial Assistance, said the increase in tuition will likely allow students to be able to qualify for more financial aid.

"I don't think there will be an increase in the number of students receiving aid," he said. "About 70 percent of students receive some type of aid like grants, scholarships, work programs or loans."

The number of students receiving aid tends to remain constant, no matter the increase in tuition, Mowder said.

However, Mowder said he thinks the amount of assistance students are eligible for will increase.

"We look at cost that they (students) have, including room and board, transportation and personal, and books and tuition," he said.

He said they take into consideration the increasing costs when determining a student's eligibility.

Sara DeHaven, senior in industrial engineering from Springfield, Mo., is qualified for the Midwest Student Exchange Program because of her major. The program allows her to pay 1.5 times what an in-state student, would pay.

"Without the help of the exchange program, I probably would have had to stay in-state for school," she said.

Although DeHaven said her parents pay most of her tuition, it is still a concern when planning each semester.

"My friends and I are very glad we're close to being done," she said. "We want to graduate before another big tuition increase comes."

Exhibit features minimalist artists

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An exhibit at the Strecker-Nelson Art Gallery featuring minimalist artwork by Lisa Grossman and Tal Streeter will end Saturday.

Owner Jay Nelson chose to show Grossman's paintings and Streeter's sculptures together because he said their styles compliment each other's work.

Grossman's paintings feature the Flint Hills, where she paints plain air, or on location.

Originally from Pennsylvania, Grossman said she was enthralled at the flint hills when she first saw them.

"It kind of felt like a seemingly endless horizon," she said. "I've never been in that kind of space that went on and on. It was overwhelming and exhilarating at the same time."

Grossman now lives in Lawrence and said each time she visits the Flint Hills to paint, it is a different experience.

"It is very challenging painting this way because there is always something to struggle against, like wind, heat, bugs, rain and lightening," she said.

Spareness is what Grossman thinks of when she is painting.

"It's trying to say a lot with very little information," she said. "I am really interested in subtle variations in color, very simple brush work and almost no detail. I try to create an emotional response to how it feels to me in paint."

Although Streeter's sculptures are also minimalist, Nelson said Streeter's inspiration is not an experience like Grossman's.

"His pieces are quite intellectual and I think they are intellectual in the nature of their inspiration," he said. "They are an idea rather than an experience. It's his imagination of this line moving through space and its angle."

Nelson said Streeter was part of the minimalist sculpture movement back in the 1970s and he graduated from Manhattan High School. He said Streeter is a very famous artist and has a piece in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York.

BASKETBALL | Many factors influencing K-State's roster for next season

Details of the suspension and the dismissal are not being released.

RECRUIT BACKS OUT

Stefhon Hannah, a three-star-rated point guard from Chipola (Fla.) College, visited K-State on May 11 and stated his intent to sign with K-State. Hannah did end up signing with the Wildcats, but will be playing his college basketball at Missouri instead.

"Hannah faxed a signed letter of intent to his mother for Kansas State," said Brian Gates, recruiting editor for Gopowercat.com and Powercat Illustrated. "His mom then sent him a letter signed for Missouri. All things were equal between Missouri and K-State. It came down to where his mom felt most comfortable, which happened to be Missouri."

LEGAL BATTLES

K-State fans later found out through the national media that their home team was recruiting a man who is on trial for rape.

Tyree Evans, a member of the class of 2005 and the Virginia player of the year that same year, has gone to trial for statutory rape, indecent assault and battery on a child. In March, he plead not guilty. Evans' last court date was May 30, where he received a continuance in the case. His pretrial was rescheduled for June 29.

Evans, a four-star-rated prospect, was committed to Huggins' team while he was at Cincinnati. He couldn't enroll, however, because of his academic standing.

POTENTIAL RECRUITS

Next fall might bring even more exciting recruiting news to Manhattan, as OJ Mayo and teammate Bill Walker, might sign for K-State. Both men are ranked the first and second best players in the nation, according to www.rivals.com.

The Wildcats also got a soft-verbal commitment from the fourth-best player, Michael Beasley.

Herb Pope, who is ranked 10th on Rivals.com's top-150 high school players in America for next season, also has K-State high on his list of possible schools.

Gates said out of the four, Walker and Beasley are the most likely to end up at K-State. However, he wouldn't be surprised to see all of them play their college careers in Manhattan. "If O.J. Mayo does play college ball it will probably be at K-State," Gates said.

"Walker and Mayo want to play in college together if at all possible and they both have K-State very high on their lists."

Rockin' summer bods

How to get in shape for the pool

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As temperatures rise, students begin to shed their clothes, revealing the out-of-shape bodies hidden all winter.

It's not too late to get those bodies tone, said Amber Long, assistant director of recreational services at the Peters Recreational Complex.

"Students can really get a lot done in an hour," she said.

While working out for an hour, Long said students should focus on cardiovascular and strength training.

"They are both important to building muscles and burning calories," she said.

Bailey Embry, senior in kinesiology, said he's been working out more lately to get his body in shape for the summer.

"I have more time now that I don't have as many classes," Embry said.

Embry said his motivation to get a tone body is knowing he will be showing his abs in public.

"If I have to take my shirt off, I want to make sure everything looks good," Embry said.

While most trainers suggest cardiovascular work for weight loss, any exercise that increases a person's heart rate can help, said Jason Brungardt, junior in kinesiology and a personal trainer at the Rec Complex.

"If I was training someone who wanted to get in shape for the summer, I would suggest weight lifting and cardio," Brungardt said.

Losing body fat is important, and some people think they can lose weight just by a simple cardiovascular workout. Brugardt said they need a little more.

"You must build muscles first to get rid of fat," Brungardt said. In order to do that, you can't skip out on weights."

While exercising, students should focus on their backs and abdominal areas equally. They should, however, mix up their exercise routines. If they do the same thing consistently, their body will get used to it, and it won't be a challenge, Long said. Change also helps reduce injury.

"Variety is the key. Mix it up," Long said. "You won't get injuries if you jog one day, then work on cardio the next."

Other students consume dietary supplements to lose weight instead of exercising, but Long said the supplements aren't as effective for weight loss.

"All of these supplements aren't very effective in my opinion," Long said. "There is really no quick fix to get in shape."

Although these pills promise weight loss in short amount of times, the pounds usually come back quickly, Long said.

Safely and effectively, a person should be able to lose one or two pounds a week. Any more than that would just be water weight, Long said.

"The only way to lose weight and tone muscles is to eat healthy and work out," Long said.

Here are some tips to tone abs:

- First get the layer of fat off to reveal muscles. Experts recommend focusing on cardiovascular workouts to help lose the first layers of fat.
- Ab flexion is important, which means people should focus on crunches and sit-ups.
- Do rotation exercises like bicycle crunches, use of rotary torso machine and working with a medicine ball.
- Do stabilization exercises. One example is laying on the floor in a push-up position that stretches the ab muscles.
- Finally, do spinal-extension exercises. People must work out their abs and back evenly.

The Da Vinci Code merges benefits of book, film

"The Da Vinci Code"
Grade: B-

Movie review by Amy Bolton

One of the most anticipated movies of the season arrived in theaters May 19 and opened to sold-out crowds and widespread criticism.

"The Da Vinci Code," based on the best-selling book by author Dan Brown, sticks close to the book's plot without spending too much time trying to include every intimate detail.

Two-time Oscar-winning actor Tom Hanks pairs up yet again with director Ron Howard to bring Brown's story of the search for the Holy Grail to life on the big screen. Hanks plays Harvard symbologist Robert Langdon, who is called to the Louvre Museum in Paris to help police decode a murder.

Before dying, the curator of the Louvre, Jacques Saunière, leaves clues for Langdon around the museum to pass along a 2,000-year-old secret. Langdon teams up with Saunière's estranged granddaughter, Sophie Neveu (Audrey Tautou), who helps him use Leonardo Da Vinci's paintings to decipher the clues.

When it becomes apparent that Langdon is a suspect in Saunière's murder, Neveu helps him escape and they spend the night outrunning the police while attempting to solve Saunière's riddles and clues.

As their night progresses, they decode the clues and uncover the secret Saunière died to keep. The Opus Dei monk Silas, played by Paul Bettany, is so desperate to keep the secret that he will kill whomever gets in his way.

Bettany's portrayal of the albino killer is a standout, and by far the best performance in the movie.

Howard did a good job of including all the important scenes from the book while still knowing what to cut. At two-and-a-half-hours long, the movie keeps the essence of the book.

Fans of the story and those new to the tale will all enjoy watching the story unfold, but while the movie characters try to bring the story to life, the adventure the readers get to experience far outshines the movie.

Isobel Campbell & Mark Lanegan, "Ballad of the Broken Seas"

On paper, the combination of an ex-Belle and Sebastian vocalist (Campbell) and former Screaming Trees front man and Queens of the Stone Age collaborator (Lanegan) would seem to mix like oil and water. However, Campbell's sweet alto perfectly compliments Lanegan's gruff baritone to create an album of beautifully plaintive melodies and somber moods. It is the perfect late-night album to be played on static-filled, second-hand speakers in a smoky, rural bar littered with patrons drowning their woes with alcohol.

Red Hot Chili Peppers, "Stadium Arcadium"

This California rock-funk outfit indulges itself in a lengthy, 28-track, double album that transverses everything from spacey pop to sad-eyed ballads to rollicking funk exercises. Lead single "Dani California" is amazingly catchy. However, Rick Rubin's lifeless production quickly leads to things sounding monotonous. Besides, two-and-a-half hours of music are far too much Chili Peppers to handle in one sitting.
Grade: (C)

Tool, "10,000 Days"

On the first Tool album in five years, and only the fourth in the band's 16-year career, Maynard James Keenan and Co. manage to deliver half of a great album. Tracks such as the powerful lead-single "Vicarious" and the passionate "Wings for Marie, Pt.1" are among the band's best. However, around the halfway point, the album loses focus and Tool plunges into self-indulgent genre exercises and a baffling sound.

Understanding nature

Photos by Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Alexandria Ring, 6, lets a king snake crawl across her arm while examining the creature after The Unhuggables event Saturday afternoon at the Manhattan Public Library. The event featured several animals with bad stereotypes.

Pat Silovsky, director of the Milford Nature Center, tells attendees about turkey vultures and why they are important in nature.

Manhattan children learn good qualities of 'Unhuggable' animals

By Ben Fallin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The rain couldn't keep the children away from the Manhattan Public Library last Saturday.

Throughout the summer, the library will put on a series of events targeted to help educate children. Saturday's event, The Unhuggables, was aimed to teach children about animals with bad stereotypes.

Pat Silovsky, the director of the Milford Nature Center in Junction City, taught children that animals sometimes get a bad reputation because they aren't cuddly and soft. She wanted to be sure children understood that the unhuggables have their place in nature as well.

"Our work is to introduce kids to animals with a bad reputation and to teach them that they aren't as bad as they are made out to be," Silovsky said. "Nothing is bad or good. Everything has its place in this world. We try to focus on the animals and to help the children learn about them."

Silovsky taught about opossums, turkey vulchers, bats and the king snake. She brought one example of each from the Milford Nature Center with her. Many of the kids wanted to hold or touch the animals, but Silovsky couldn't allow them to touch most for safety.

"My favorite thing today was seeing the vulcher open its wings," said Sterling Edgar, a third-grader at Frank V. Bergman Elementary School.

Although the turkey vulcher got a loud reaction from the crowd of around 75 when it spread its wings, the snake was the animal that impressed the children the most.

"I liked touching the snake," said Elizabeth Webster, a pre-school student at a local early education center. "I also liked the opossum. I thought the baby opossum was cute."

Parents of the children involved in the summer activities at the library said it's a good substitute to going to the pool or other summer activities.

RCPD completes theft case

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department has completed its investigation of possible thefts from the Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation.

Four suspects were identified in the reported thefts from parks and recreation, and three possible suspects were identified in thefts from the YES! fund, which raises money for after-school programs, RCPD Director Mike Watson said in a press conference Tuesday.

All of the alleged suspects are residents of the Manhattan area.

The suspects allegedly stole money from registration fees and ticket sales for parks and recreation events, Watson said.

Initially, the RCPD thought there might be a connection between gambling around Manhattan and the thefts, but Watson said it was not the case.

There are people who were involved in the gambling and not the theft, Watson said.

RCPD interviewed at least 100 people in the investigation and forwarded a large amount of information to the Riley County district attorney's office.

One of the problems was discovering the amount of money lost. The amount lost depends on who the investigators talked to, Watson said.

"We did go out. We did talk to people and try to get some estimates," Watson said.

Watson did say the loss was in the thousands of dollars.

No arrests will be made until the county attorney's office decides whether to press charges, Watson said.

Barry Wilkerson, Riley County Attorney, said charges against the suspects depended on whether the alleged crimes were felonies, which would require the theft of $1,000 or more.

Fraternity becomes dry, aims to begin trend of houses without alcohol

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When school begins in August, one more K-State fraternity will have banned alcohol in the house.

On May 14, Pi Kappa Phi became the eighth dry fraternity on campus. By becoming a dry house, no member of the fraternity may store or serve alcohol in or around the fraternity house. All sororities at K-State are dry.

"It was just something that we felt was necessary to help us become the best fraternity on campus," Tyler Price, Pi Kappa Phi president, said. "We thought this was one step to help us reach our goal, which is to be men of class."

The decision to make the fraternity a dry house was made during the first week of May.

"The alumni brought it up in a meeting, which was a couple of months ago," Price said. "We looked at the advantages and disadvantages and realized there were more advantages."

An advantage to being a dry house is recruiting. As a dry house, Pi Kappa Phi will appeal to those who want to be a part of the brotherhood, Price said.

"I think this will allow us to get some of the best students on campus," Price said. "We want to put drinking on a backburner."

Becoming a dry house also will decrease the fraternity's insurance costs.

"One thing that there's a difference in is insurance costs," Scott Jones, director of greek affairs, said. "Those costs are usually significant in the chapter."

There are special occasions where alcohol may be served. Members of the fraternity may have alcohol from third-party vendors and at some date parties.

Jones said he expects the number of dry houses on campus to grow, but they're not directly pushing for it.

"Chapters are undertaking these initiatives," he said. "We certainly support it, but we're not driving for it."

Many students prefer dry houses to those that serve alcohol, Jones said.

"It increases the likelihood that students can focus their time on educational pursuits, and I've heard that often times students feel their properties are cleaner and more maintained," he said. "There's also an increased level of respectful behavior."

Jones said he is proud of Pi Kappa Phi and other fraternities for choosing to become dry.

"I'm really excited about the leadership that our chapters who have gone dry have displayed," Jones said. "It's a trend of the future. Chapters who take the opportunity to change now are having a positive experience."

Price said he hopes other fraternities will consider banning alcohol.

"Hopefully they will lean towards becoming dry," he said. "It's something a lot of the houses might think about."

Global drought decreases quantity of wheat produced in Kansas

Low quantities, high demands have led to inflation

By Jamie Smidt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Global drought has influenced wheat yields from Australia to Argentina, and the Midwest is no exception.

This year, Texas and Oklahoma produced only one-third and one-half, respectively, of their normal amounts, according to an Associated Press report.

Kansas harvest, now in full swing, began last week – a full 10 days to two weeks earlier than last year.

Following the trends of our southern neighbors, early reports from across the state show a similar decrease in quantity.

While supply is significantly lower this year, demand remains high, causing inflation in prices worldwide.

Although prices dropped slightly last week, they are still $2 per bushel higher than they were last year, said Mike Woolverton, a visiting professor in the Department of Agriculture Economics at K-State.

Ken Wood, co-owner of Riverside Stock Farms Inc. of Chapman, Kan., said he appreciates the higher selling prices.

"Having a higher price takes fewer bushels to make a profit," Wood said.

Although there are farm programs to protect farmers from very low selling prices, they are able to benefit from the high prices.

In Kansas, the nation's top wheat producer, profit is crucial to the farmers.

"Half of our income rides on this wheat crop," Wood said.

Even as the quantity is at an all-time low, quality remains excellent.

"Wet conditions tend to produce more wheat of a lesser quality, while dry conditions produce less wheat of a greater quality," Woolverton said.

Quality is determined by weight per bushel – the heavier the bushel, the better.

As for quantity, the next few weeks will be an important indication as to just how high wheat prices will rise this season.

The price of wheat might rise because of a global drought, which has caused lower quantities of wheat production in the Midwest and around the world.

Mosquito control
To help control the local mosquito population, the City of Manhattan has initiated a mosquito-control plan. The plan, which will limit the amount of open water outside homes, might also help reduce the risk of the West Nile Virus.

Summer job opportunities still available

By Amy Bolton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Lacey Cossman, junior in elementary education, controls swimmers' use of the water slide while working as a lifeguard Tuesday afternoon at City Park Swimming Pool. With the start of summer, K-State students might be searching for employment.

K-State students looking for a last-minute summer job still have a chance to find one.

Businesses in Manhattan have opportunities for part-time employment for students. Jobs are available both on and off campus.

One place to look for jobs is through K-State's Career and Employment Services.

"CES has a part-time job listing," said Jennifer Brantley, Assistant Director of Experiential Learning at CES. "The job listings consist of on-campus jobs, jobs in the Manhattan area, and seasonal/out of area jobs."

If students can't find a job they are interested in on the CES database, Brantley suggested contacting the place where they want to work.

"We hire checkers and carry-outs and, if they're over 18, we hire people for departments like deli, produce and bakery," said Rich Lehrmen, assistant manager at Dillons, 1000 Westloop Place.

There are employment opportunities through the Manhattan Town Center, said Sara Van Allen, marketing manager for Manhattan Town Center, Third Street and Poyntz Avenue.

"We have over 70 merchants here at Manhattan Town Center, and they all hire part-time help,," Van Allen said.

There is a binder at the mall's customer service with applications to stores that are hiring.

"It doesn't have all the merchants, so if a student is interested in working for one particular store, its best that they check with them directly," Van Allen said.

She said good traits to have are flexibility, a good appearance and a polite attitude.

"Most often the person giving you the application is the person who will hire you, so a first impression is everything," Van Allen said.

Brantley advised students to look for jobs early, be professional, have flexibility and have resumes and references with them.

Getting a job in the summer also offers yearly benefits.

"By landing a job in the summer, it's a great way for those students to be ahead of the game for fall employment," Brantley said.

Students can see they are interested in that field.

"It provides the employer the opportunity to offer a glimpse to a college student, especially if its the industry they're interested in," Van Allen said.

Hiring college students is also a benefit for employers.

"Students that work and go to school often exhibit a high level of responsibility, and thats exactly what an employer is looking for," Van Allen said.

She said mall stores are still hiring.

The binder at the customer service desk still had applications from Aeropostale, Maurice's, Hibbett Sports, Foot Locker and Chili's, Van Allen said.

Brantley said having a job provides students with valuable skills they will use in the future.

"It's important for students to develop transferable skills, such as customer service skills, communication skills and teamwork skills," Brantley said. "If they have those skills, they will be more marketable when they graduate and are looking for full time jobs."

Clayton suspended for opener

Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

CLAYTON

K-State's leading rusher, Thomas Clayton, has been suspended from the season opener against Illinois State on Sept. 2, Coach Ron Prince announced Monday morning.

He was convicted Friday of misdemeanor battery after an incident in a K-State parking lot where he almost struck a university parking services employee with his car on Sept. 16, 2005, according to the Associated Press.

According to a K-State police report, while a university parking official attempted to put a lock on Clayton's vehicle because of several unpaid parking tickets, Clayton "nearly struck" the parking employee with his vehicle.

"I'd just like to say on my behalf, that there was obviously a mistake, and I do know that in the process, as far as in the legal system, it's being taken care of," Clayton said at a weekly press conference after the incident.

Clayton could be sentenced to six months in jail and fined $1,000.

He is scheduled to be sentenced July 10.

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Air conditioners, water activities a way to beat heat

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

From pontoon boats at Tuttle Creek State Park to swimming at one of the many pools in Manhattan, there are numerous ways to beat the heat.

IN YOUR HOME

To help stay cool at home, Larry Menard, owner of Manhattan Heating and Air-conditioning, suggests people run their air conditioning at about 75 degrees.

"The air conditioning won't be able to reach low temperatures in the 60s," Menard said. "It will just keep running but not reach the temperature."

If residents leave the temperature at about 75, the air conditioning can cycle and keep the air cool more efficiently, he said.

Ceiling fans should be set to turn counterclockwise so that the air will blow down and help keep rooms cool, Menard said. There should be a switch on the unit which will change the direction of the blades.

For those living without central air or a window unit, he advised using lots of space and window fans to help circulate the air.

SWIMMING POOL

Manhattan offers several public swimming pools to help residents cool off during the summer months. The pool locations are City Park, 1220 Poyntz Ave., CiCo Park, 3309 Robinson Drive, and Northview, 510 Griffith Drive.

Jerry Carpenter, assistant manager at the City Park Pool, said he sees a lot of families and college students at the pool each day.

"We see a lot of college students roll in later in the day, after work or school gets out," he said.

Daily admission for the pools is $1.50 for children younger than 13, $2 for youth ages 13-18, $2.50 for adults and $1.50 for senior citizens 62 and older. Season passes and family packages are available for swimmers of all ages and can be purchased at the Office of Parks and Recreation or at City Hall, 1101 Fremont St or 1101 Poyntz Ave., respectively.

PARKS AND OTHER OUTDOOR ACTIVITIES

Tuttle Creek State Park and the Wildcat Marina both offer outdoor activities that can entertain and help residents stay cool.

Ryan Cooley, an AmeriCorps service worker for Tuttle Creek State Park, said people can rent canoes, paddle boats and kayaks. Rentals are available by the hour or for the entire day.

Cooley said Rocky Ford is popular for fishing and wading in the water or lounging on the beach.

Wildcat Marina co-owner Autumn Wright said their business offers jet skis and pontoon boat rentals.

Wright said Wildcat Marina is open daily and gets busy on the weekends.

"I would advise people reserve boat rentals by Wednesday for the weekend," she said.

Summer job opportunities still available

By Amy Bolton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Lacey Cossman, junior in elementary education, controls swimmers' use of the water slide while working as a lifeguard Tuesday afternoon at City Park Swimming Pool. With the start of summer, K-State students might be searching for employment.

K-State students looking for a last-minute summer job still have a chance to find one.

Businesses in Manhattan have opportunities for part-time employment for students. Jobs are available both on and off campus.

One place to look for jobs is through K-State's Career and Employment Services.

"CES has a part-time job listing," said Jennifer Brantley, Assistant Director of Experiential Learning at CES. "The job listings consist of on-campus jobs, jobs in the Manhattan area, and seasonal/out of area jobs."

If students can't find a job they are interested in on the CES database, Brantley suggested contacting the place where they want to work.

"We hire checkers and carry-outs and, if they're over 18, we hire people for departments like deli, produce and bakery," said Rich Lehrmen, assistant manager at Dillons, 1000 Westloop Place.

There are employment opportunities through the Manhattan Town Center, said Sara Van Allen, marketing manager for Manhattan Town Center, Third Street and Poyntz Avenue.

"We have over 70 merchants here at Manhattan Town Center, and they all hire part-time help," Van Allen said.

There is a binder at the mall's customer service with applications to stores that are hiring.

"It doesn't have all the merchants, so if a student is interested in working for one particular store, its best that they check with them directly," Van Allen said.

She said good traits to have are flexibility, a good appearance and a polite attitude.

"Most often the person giving you the application is the person who will hire you, so a first impression is everything," Van Allen said.

Brantley advised students to look for jobs early, be professional, have flexibility and have resumes and references with them.

Getting a job in the summer also offers yearly benefits.

"By landing a job in the summer, it's a great way for those students to be ahead of the game for fall employment," Brantley said.

Students can see they are interested in that field.

"It provides the employer the opportunity to offer a glimpse to a college student, especially if its the industry they're interested in," Van Allen said.

Hiring college students is also a benefit for employers.

"Students that work and go to school often exhibit a high level of responsibility, and thats exactly what an employer is looking for," Van Allen said.

She said mall stores are still hiring.

The binder at the customer service desk still had applications from Aeropostale, Maurice's, Hibbett Sports, Foot Locker and Chili's, Van Allen said.

Brantley said having a job provides students with valuable skills they will use in the future.

"It's important for students to develop transferable skills, such as customer service skills, communication skills and teamwork skills," Brantley said. "If they have those skills, they will be more marketable when they graduate and are looking for full time jobs."

Clayton suspended for opener

Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

CLAYTON

K-State's leading rusher, Thomas Clayton, has been suspended from the season opener against Illinois State on Sept. 2, Coach Ron Prince announced Monday morning.

He was convicted Friday of misdemeanor battery after an incident in a K-State parking lot where he almost struck a university parking services employee with his car on Sept. 16, 2005, according to the Associated Press.

According to a K-State police report, while a university parking official attempted to put a lock on Clayton's vehicle because of several unpaid parking tickets, Clayton "nearly struck" the parking employee with his vehicle.

"I'd just like to say on my behalf, that there was obviously a mistake, and I do know that in the process, as far as in the legal system, it's being taken care of," Clayton said at a weekly press conference after the incident.

Clayton could be sentenced to six months in jail and fined $1,000.

He is scheduled to be sentenced July 10.

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Air conditioners, water activities a way to beat heat

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

From pontoon boats at Tuttle Creek State Park to swimming at one of the many pools in Manhattan, there are numerous ways to beat the heat.

IN YOUR HOME

To help stay cool at home, Larry Menard, owner of Manhattan Heating and Air-conditioning, suggests people run their air conditioning at about 75 degrees.

"The air conditioning won't be able to reach low temperatures in the 60s," Menard said. "It will just keep running but not reach the temperature."

If residents leave the temperature at about 75, the air conditioning can cycle and keep the air cool more efficiently, he said.

Ceiling fans should be set to turn counterclockwise so that the air will blow down and help keep rooms cool, Menard said. There should be a switch on the unit which will change the direction of the blades.

For those living without central air or a window unit, he advised using lots of space and window fans to help circulate the air.

SWIMMING POOL

Manhattan offers several public swimming pools to help residents cool off during the summer months. The pool locations are City Park, 1220 Poyntz Ave., CiCo Park, 3309 Robinson Drive, and Northview, 510 Griffith Drive.

Jerry Carpenter, assistant manager at the City Park Pool, said he sees a lot of families and college students at the pool each day.

"We see a lot of college students roll in later in the day, after work or school gets out," he said.

Daily admission for the pools is $1.50 for children younger than 13, $2 for youth ages 13-18, $2.50 for adults and $1.50 for senior citizens 62 and older. Season passes and family packages are available for swimmers of all ages and can be purchased at the Office of Parks and Recreation or at City Hall, 1101 Fremont St or 1101 Poyntz Ave., respectively.

PARKS AND OTHER OUTDOOR ACTIVITIES

Tuttle Creek State Park and the Wildcat Marina both offer outdoor activities that can entertain and help residents stay cool.

Ryan Cooley, an AmeriCorps service worker for Tuttle Creek State Park, said people can rent canoes, paddle boats and kayaks. Rentals are available by the hour or for the entire day.

Cooley said Rocky Ford is popular for fishing and wading in the water or lounging on the beach.

Wildcat Marina co-owner Autumn Wright said their business offers jet skis and pontoon boat rentals.

Wright said Wildcat Marina is open daily and gets busy on the weekends.

"I would advise people reserve boat rentals by Wednesday for the weekend," she said.

TO THE POINT

More greek houses could follow suit, dry out

While we commend Pi Kappa Phi for their recent decision to become the eighth dry fraternity, we wonder why so few have made the transition.

To the point is selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

The difference between a dry house and a wet house is evident to any guest who walks through the door. Dry houses lack the pungent odor of stale beer that lingers in the halls. The building and grounds stay cleaner, and the furniture is less likely to be thrown through a window in a alcohol-induced fit of redecorating.

In addition to avoiding replacement fees, dry houses save money on insurance and liability costs. A dry house also reduces the unfortunate possibility of hazing and all the legal repercussions it involves.

The wet houses are seen as being single-mindedly focused on drinking, parties and the resulting hook-ups.

Because the members of dry houses still have alternate drinking options, the decision to remain wet is not only irresponsible, it's unnecessary.

If the benefit of being wet is just easy access to a beer, maybe the priorities need to be re-evaluated.

Study Abroad enlightens

Columnist reflects on her living dream

MEGAN CRANE

I have lived in Europe. Being able to someday tell my grandkids about this experience is just one of the advantages I found in my semester of studying abroad.

For four months I was a resident of Spain. I attended a university, attempted to speak the Spanish language and dress in a similar manner. I adjusted to their culture.

Ever since I was a small child, I wanted to be fluent in as many languages as possible. In high school, I decided to focus on Spanish.

K-State is currently pushing for more students to study abroad. My guess is many of you have been visited in at least one class by somebody encouraging you to study abroad. I have to agree with them. It will change you as a person, and possibly increase your appeal to future employers.

In Spain, I made a few decisions that I believe made my experience such a successful one. I decided to stay with a host family who only spoke Spanish, and that alone greatly increased the amount of Spanish I was forced to use. I also chose to take all classes in Spanish. As a result, my understanding of spoken Spanish skyrocketed.

Regardless of how you do it, immerse yourself in the culture. The cultural experience is one of the main reasons you should be there.

I experienced many cultural differences, and contrary to what I expected, I felt a sense of culture shock. In retrospect, it was a good thing because it reminded me I was doing something out of the ordinary and kept me focused.

I traveled around Europe on a couple breaks, but also took the time to learn my country. The majority of my travels were in Spain. Slightly disappointing is that now the European Union countries don't always stamp passports. How sad.

Regardless, I still did as the Romans do. I stared at the Sistine Chapel and ate true Italian pizza and pasta.

I watched an amazing sunrise on a Portugal beach, and I found the Eiffel Tower. I walked the Charles Bridge and saw the world-famous Astronomical Clock. Maybe more importantly, I made life-long friends. How do I know we'll remain friends? Our six-month reunion is already planned. We're meeting in the Los Remedios of the United States, right here in Manhattan.

I miss Spain, but one of the biggest changes I saw in myself is my outlook on the United States. Before I left, the stereotypical American often annoyed me. We're loud, rude, egocentric, filthy rich and rarely take advantage of the gifts we're given. After being away from the United States for four months I have a greater appreciation for my home country.

If you're even considering studying abroad, do it. It's expensive, true, but there are scholarships specifically for study-abroad students. There are also student loans. My semester in Spain will always be one of the highlights of my life. And it was an investment that I will never regret.

Characters in flick should be played by same race

Call me humorless, but the new film "Nacho Libre" is one I plan to miss.

LOLA SHRIMPLIN

Not because of the premise of the movie, where Jack Black plays a priest who is trying to raise money for an orphanage by competing in wrestling matches, or the lack of acting skills.

I won't go see it for the same reason I didn't go see "Memoirs of a Geisha."

I'm sure everyone remembers that movie. The one where Chinese actors played Japanese characters.

"Memoirs of a Geisha" was an opportune moment for Japanese actors and actresses to star in a Hollywood movie, yet it was cast with Chinese characters.

I suppose there was a lack of Japanese actors and actresses available to play the parts.

Anyone who knows Hollywood knows that they have long used actors and actresses who were not the race or heritage of the people they played on screen.

My Japanese friends were horrified to see the movies made during World War II. I have a Chinese relative who was angered by the movie "Mulan."

"U-571" was about the British, yet it was turned into a movie about American soldiers during World War II.

In the 1940s, it was common for white actors to play in blackface because the African-American actors weren't hired.

When African-Americans were finally allowed on screen, they played demeneaning roles such as nannies and butlers.

That is why I won't go see "Nacho Libre."

Lucha Libre, which means "free fight" in English, is a tradition in Mexican culture, and the wrestlers would rather be seen dead than without their masks.

If Jack Black is Mexican, I am a Martian.

Sure, make a joke out of another country's traditions, mock the way they dress.

That's Hollywood, which apparently hasn't gotten out of the stone age as far as roles for Hispanic, Latino and African American actors goes.

How many Mexican film roles can people actually name? Zorro? Frida Khalo?

I honestly thought we were past that. I honestly thought we had moved on.

Yet mocking other cultures seems to be a standby in Hollywood.

Why Jack Black, of all people? And the fake Mexican accent is awful. He sounds like Zorro with a cold.

Its time we as a nation respected other cultures instead of mocking them, while trying to disguise it as an uplifting tale targeted to children.

NEWS BRIEFS

ACROSS THE COUNTRY

SOURCES: THE ASSOCIATED PRESS, UNITED PRESS INTERNATIONAL

HOUSE APPROVES $94.5 BILLION FOR WAR, HURRICANE RELIEF

Washington, D.C. – The House has passed a $94.5 billion bill to pay for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, hurricane relief, bird flu preparations and border security.

The bill carries $66 billion for the two wars. That drives the price tag on the Iraq war to about $320 billion. The Congressional Research Service puts the Afghanistan war cost at about $89 billion.

The bill provides nearly $20 billion to help the Gulf Coast recover from last year's hurricane damage.

TROPICAL STORM HITS FLORIDA

The first tropical storm of the hurricane season was less than advertised Tuesday, bringing rain, gusty winds and some thigh-high street flooding to Florida's Gulf Coast without blowing up into the hurricane forecasters feared.

There were no reports of any serious injuries or deaths, though thousands are instructed to leave the state.

POLICE OFFICERS RUN OVER, KILL WOMAN WITH SUV

Oxnard, Calif. – A 49-year-old Iowa woman sunbathing at an Oxnard, Calif., beach was killed when a police SUV drove over her head and continued on.

The two police officers had stopped atop a sand berm to check on a swimmer, and once satisfied, drove down the berm and ran over the victim.

PROFESSOR RECOMMENDED TO BE FIRED FOR INSENSITIVITY TO 9-11 VICTIMS

Denver – A University of Colorado committee said today that Ward Churchill, the professor who called some of the World Trade Center victims "little Eichmanns," should be fired because of deliberate infractions of scholarship rules.

The day after Sept. 11, 2001, Churchill wrote an essay that said the victims of the terrorist attacks weren't innocent bystanders. He compared them to Nazi, Adolf Eichmann, a key figure in carrying out the Holocaust.

PROSECUTORS WANT TO TREAT DEATH ROW INMATE

Austin, Texas – Prosecutors in Texas want a schizophrenic on death row forcibly medicated to make him sane enough to execute.

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that inmates too mentally ill to understand why they are being executed cannot be put to death, and has ruled that inmates can be forced to take medication in certain circumstances.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

COLUMNIST'S PERSPECTIVE DOES NOT REPRESENT CATHOLIC CHURCH

Dear editor,

As a fellow Catholic, I have to disagree with Zach Eckels' commentary (titled) "Catholic group restricting free speech." I'd doubt that the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights had anything to do with how "The Da Vinci Code" played out. After all, the producers of the film said no to Opus Dei's request for a disclaimer at the beginning to let viewers know that the film is fiction.

Furthermore, his contention that viewers can find out what is fiction and what is fact without having the movie do that for them is not so simplistic, especially when considering the polls that have found significant numbers of viewers accepting the fictional accounts in the film as the gospel truth.

As for Eckels' comments regarding "South Park," hopefully I'm wrong to think that he doesn't take his faith seriously so as not to feel offended by the blasphemous put-down of the Virgin Mary. After all, who wouldn't rise to defend his or her mother's honor?

Lastly, defenders of the faith like Catholic League and its president, William A. Donohue, should be commended for their work. I, for one, would put my stock on Dohonue's wise and witty comments than on those by Eckels and others any day.

'DA VINCI CODE' CHALLENGES FUNDAMENTALIST PERSPECTIVE

Dear editor,

"The Da Vinci Code's" premise that Jesus married Mary Magdalene and had children is correct.

Fundamentalists fear "The Da Vinci Code" because the truth of the marriage between Jesus and Mary Magdalene proves that some of their fear-based information about Jesus is incorrect.

Fundamentalist false prophets, like the Pope, Pat Robertson, Ted Haggard, Jerry Falwell, Franklin Graham, Ron Luce, James Kennedy, Billy Graham and their ilk, misuse their power and direct fear-filled followers, (correctly portrayed as sheep), to go berserk with anti-Da Vinci Code rhetoric and religious misinformation.

Tired of economic terrorism, vicious rhetoric and worse, the 99th generation of descendants has decided to confront the multi-billion dollar industry of corporate churches and publicly challenged the fundamentalist false prophets to the ancient method of spiritual debate, called the "Duel of Truths", on the first four chapters of the fundamentalist's own Bible.

However, while the false prophets of corporate churches proclaim to the world that they are knowledgeable religious leaders, not one so-called "religious leader" has had enough spiritual courage to accept the challenge to a proper debate.

The challenge was personally mailed to each false prophet, posted prominently on our Web site and many Internet message boards, as well as being sent directly to churches and media worldwide.

Jesus did all the things attributed to him, and much more. He merely physically ascended into light later in his life, as recorded by our great-great-grandmother, Mary Magdalene.

We understand the fundamentalist's fear, it must be terrifying to be challenged to a debate of their own scriptures.

We can also understand their extreme fear of those armed with only religious dogma attempting to debate spiritual truth in a neutral environment, overseen by an independent panel as described in the challenge.

The challenge and uncensored information, from descendants' family records, can be read on The True Jesus Web site. The uncensored information discusses Jesus' early spiritual training, Mary Magdalene, their three children and the guardians, a group of spiritual adepts who have guarded Jesus' wisdom with their lives for 2,000 years against 1,700 years of work by Rome to silence the truth, including 400 years of their inquisitions.

If you wish to experience for free, while at your computer, precisely where your soul is, and to awaken your soul, merely listen to a 99th generation descendant repeat four words – one, Christ, love and light on the front page of www.TheTrueJesus.org This free four-minute, on-line, state of the art, DNA test activates wondrous spiritual energy in the pineal gland, (called the mind or soul in the West and the 3rd Eye in the East), of other direct descendants of Jesus and Mary Magdalene.

A 99th generation descendant

SEXUAL MINORITIES DESERVE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

Dear editor,

Please do not criminalize the Constitution of the United States.

Our gay-born children have a right to the equal rights of the Constitution. Oppose the federal marriage amendment.

The Constitution of the United States must not be amended to allow discrimination of our gay-born children.

To do this is to criminalize the most beautiful document that our founding fathers created. "Freedom and equality for all citizens of the United States."

We do not know why our children are gay. Whether it is genetic, hormonal or whether something occurs during the critical time of fetal development, we do not know. What we mothers can tell you with absolute certainty is that it is born.

Millions of children were born, are being born, and will be born sexually different.

It can happen in any family and we do not have a choice.

Homosexuals, like all human beings, need companionship. They have the right to marry and live a happy life of equality, respect and love as any other citizen.

If God did not want the existence of homosexuality he would not have created it. The fact is, it is in every sector of society, in all professions and trades. Even in the animal kingdom.

We parents and relatives of our gay children have sat in silence with our hearts bleeding as we see our children being harassed, persecuted, killed, injured, and discriminated because they had the misfortune of being born sexually different.

MANHATTAN SHOULD CONSIDER LOCAL RESTAURANT SMOKING BAN

Dear editor,

I'm writing this letter for people to consider a ban on smoking inside restaurants in Manhattan that will be proposed to the Manhattan City Commission.

This will fix the problem of people's complaints about the issue. The reason for this ban would be to keep our restaurants safer and cleaner by getting rid of smoking in restaurants and make Manhattan a better place to live.

The ban would be pleasing smokers, by allowing them to still smoke at any bar throughout Manhattan.

I would like to see people considering this proposal, by attending the next Manhattan City Commission meeting and to speak out about this issue. Everyone and I want this problem to end.

When this problem is fixed, everyone can finally get on with their lives, by not having to hear something about smoking everyday.

Buddhist priest emphasizes preciousness of life

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Kazunari Tonoya, chief Buddhist priest of the Engaku temple in Kamakura, Japan, speaks to attendees about Zen philosophy Thursday afternoon in Hale Library.

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Japanese media has coined a phrase in response to the recent increase in violent crimes in Japan.

The phrase, "We need to teach the preciousness of life," is easy to say, but the words lack significance, said Kazunari Tonoya, the chief Buddhist priest of the Engaku temple in Kamakura, Japan, in a lecture Thursday at Hale Library.

The statement gains true meaning when people realize the interdependence of life through Zen philosophy and how one affects the other, Tonoya said with Hikaru Peterson, associate professor in agricultural economics, translating.

"It is extremely difficult to describe Zen philosophy in words," he said.

Because of that, Tonoya was unsure of how well his description of the philosophy was translated from Japanese to English.

Siddhartha Gautama, the founder of Buddhism, was given the name Buddha upon being enlightened. He lost his mother when he was very young, and this created a desire in him for what he had lost. At the time, the way to enlightenment was composed of physical challenges, in which a person inflicted self punishment, Tonoya said.

Buddha rebelled against the physical challenges and practiced Zen philosophy, he said.

"True peace of mind rests somewhere in the middle," Tonoya attributed to Buddha.

The image of Buddha as peaceful and surrounded by flowers comes from his being born in a flower garden, finding peace and finally dying under a tree, Tonoya said.

Buddhism began in China between 800 and 1000 A.D., and was widely accepted there. But pressure from the North made it difficult to practice.

From there the religion transferred to Japan, where it began to be popular.

The first temple built had a kitchen as its largest room, Tonoya said.

This struck some as being odd in Buddhism, because the religion avoids the taking of life in any form.

However, the kitchen was important in teaching the use of everything from whatever you were eating, so that it would not be wasted, Tonoya said.

The size of the kitchen is signify appreciation that they are actually taking a part of everything they consume.

This helpes reaffirm the interdependence of lives, he said.

The dependency between Zen religion, Islam and Judeo-Christian religions was also a topic of Tonoya's discussion.

He said the origins of Islam, Judaism and Christianity all go back to ancient India, and Zen preserves the religions in the most intact way.

While Tonoya said he hadn't studied Christianity to the extent he that he had studied Zen, he understood it to be practical advice for day-to-day living, according to the Bible.

Zen promotes self reliance, and doesn't follow what is written, he said.

"You're basically on your own."

Figurative show reveals personal touch

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Strecker-Nelson Gallery will be a host to the "Person to Person: A Group Figurative Exhibit," which will open at 5 p.m. Friday.

The show will feature 30 artists, most of whom are based out of Kansas.

Gallery owner and director Jay Nelson said figurative art refers to art pieces involving people.

Nelson said many of the works will be nude renderings, but not all. There also will be pieces of sculptural ceramics.

Nelson said he has been planning the exhibition for about a year.

"I frequently do group shows," he said. "I represent about 90 artists and doing a group show is a good way to include those artists."

Barbara Waterman-Peters, a painter based out of Topeka and K-State graduate, is one of the artists featured in the show.

The art pieces she will be contributing are works from her women's series, she said.

"In this particular work of art, the people are less (confrontational) and more contemplative than in my regular work," Waterman-Peters said. "The mood is a lot quieter."

She said she has been preparing for the show for several months.

"From inception to the final painting, I work on ideas and concepts for quite a while," she said.

Waterman-Peters said her works usually engage the viewer in some way.

"The paintings don't let the viewer pass by without catching a glimpse," she said. "They engage the audience a little more. They encourage a viewer to get a second look."

Waterman-Peters also said her pieces generally have a narrative, although they are open-ended and unspecific.

She said she is looking forward to the gallery opening to see how the group show is arranged and to see the works of the other artists.

"Art openings are pretty rich experiences," she said. "They are very multi-layered. It's always interesting to see the art and to meet the artist."

The show's opening reception is open to the public and will take place from 5 p.m. to 8 p.m Friday.

The "Person to Person" exhibit will be on display at the gallery through July 29. The Strecker-Nelson Gallery, 406 1/2 Poyntz Ave., is open 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. Monday through Saturday.

MOMS club offers support for stay-at-home mothers

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Giving stay-at-home mothers a place to connect with other mothers, the community and an opportunity for their children to join in play groups are goals of the International MOMS club.

The International MOMS club started in 1983 as a support group for stay-at-home mothers. As of May 18, Manhattan's chapter of the club is back.

Sarah West, the president of Manhattan's branch, was involved in the club in New York before she and her family relocated to Kansas.

West, a stay-at-home mother, part-time worker and part-time student, said it can be hard to juggle everything. With the MOMS club she finds the support she needs.

"I inquired to see if there was a club here and there wasn't, so I decided to start one," West said.

Susie Higgins, vice president, was a part of the club when it was active in Manhattan three years ago. Back then, the group reached about 100 members, and spilt into two groups. They didn't have enough leadership to continue, Higgins said.

She said the club accepts stay-at-home fathers, college students with children, military mothers and single mothers.

"The club is a wonderful resource. The more contacts you have, the more people you know and the more support you have," Higgins said.

Being a stay-at-home mother can be a lonely profession, but the MOMS club is like a group where mothers can talk about their job, she said.

Although the new group is small, the chapter is still recruiting new members. The club meets the third week of each month, West said.

"There are currently four members involved," West said. "But once the ball starts rolling, there will be a lot more going on."

At their monthly business meetings, the moms discuss new ideas, share recipes, vote on service projects and listen to guest speakers.

"We had a doctor come in and talk about pediatrics," West said. "We even had a belly dancer."

Mothers and their children meet with other families during the day because that is usually when they need the most support, West said. The club has play groups that meet twice a week to give children a chance to play with other children.

"We support each other on our decision to be stay-at-home moms," West said. "We think it's just as important or more so than a career."

West said it has been hard for her 4-year-old daughter to grow up as an only child, but the club has let her meet new playmates.

"It's very important to have the opportunity to interact with children to develop pro-social skills,. and in play groups like these children may learn these skills," said Bronwyn Feef, Ph.D., associate professor in family and human services.

Sarah West, president of the International MOMS club, climbs on the playground equipment with her daughter, Morgan, 4, while playing at Marlatt Elementary School.

The club can be found world-wide. There are more than 100,000 members in the United States , according to the club's Web site.

With the international families in Manhattan, the club offers a place for mothers of all ethnic backgrounds, West said.

"We do not discriminate at all. Right now we have one international mom and she is from Japan," West said. "While it is hard to raise children these days, the mothers have found a support group within the club and grow friendships with each other and even meet outside the group to have a get together just for moms."

Weiser receives gift for work on basketball, matches with fund

By Tye Burger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State Athletics Director Tim Weiser has been busy in the past six months, and a group of Wildcat fans has noticed.

After the announcement that veteran coach Bob Huggins would succeed Jim Wooldridge as men's basketball coach, a rancher from Ashland, Kan., decided it was time for fans to thank Weiser for his work.

The rancher, Garth Gardiner, got a group of fans together to donate money to a fund to buy something to reward Weiser. He posted his idea on the GoPowercat.com Web site, and eventually created a PayPal account to raise the money. Gardiner said about 31 people raised a little more than $2,500, which was put toward a Cabela's gift certificate for Weiser, who is an avid outdoorsman.

Gardiner said he was motivated by the criticism Weiser took for hiring Huggins.

"He really stuck his neck out for us," Gardiner said. "He has shown he's serious about getting KSU basketball back on the map in a hurry."

Weiser was initially unsure about accepting the gift.

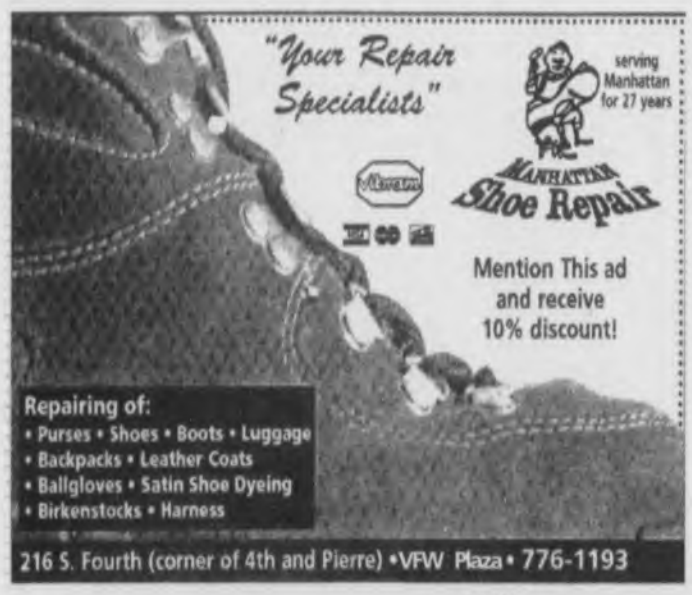
"I spent the first couple days trying to convince them that that's not something they should do, (because) that is my job to hire the best possible people I can for the jobs that we have," Weiser said.

Despite Weiser's initial reluctance, Gardiner and the other fans were determined show him they were serious.

"We wanted him to know that this wasn't lip service, that it wasn't empty praise," Gardiner said. "Tim Weiser took a personal risk for K-State and K-State basketball fans."

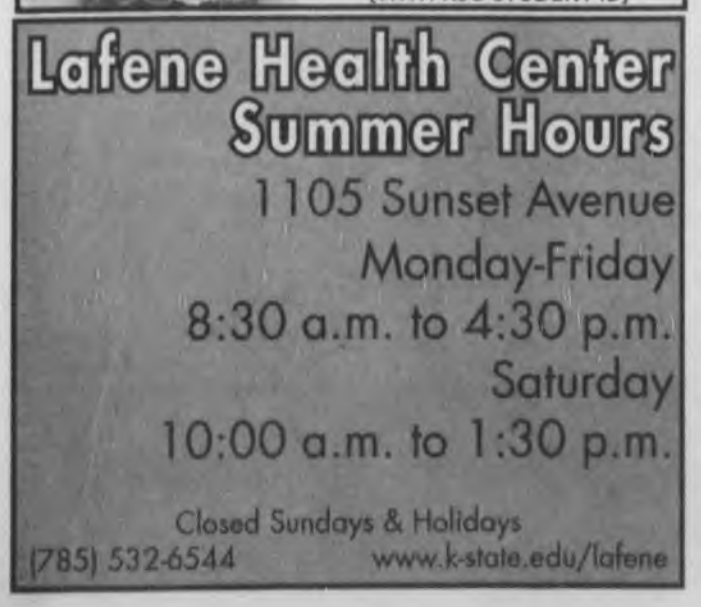
Weiser accepted the gift and made a matching donation to the Ahearn Scholarship Fund.

Gardiner said he grew up a K-State fan, and remembers watching games in Ahearn Field House when K-State was known as a basketball school. When he went to school in Manhattan, he let Wildcat stars Mitch Richmond and Steve Henson cut in line at Kite's Bar and Grill, 615 N. 12th St.



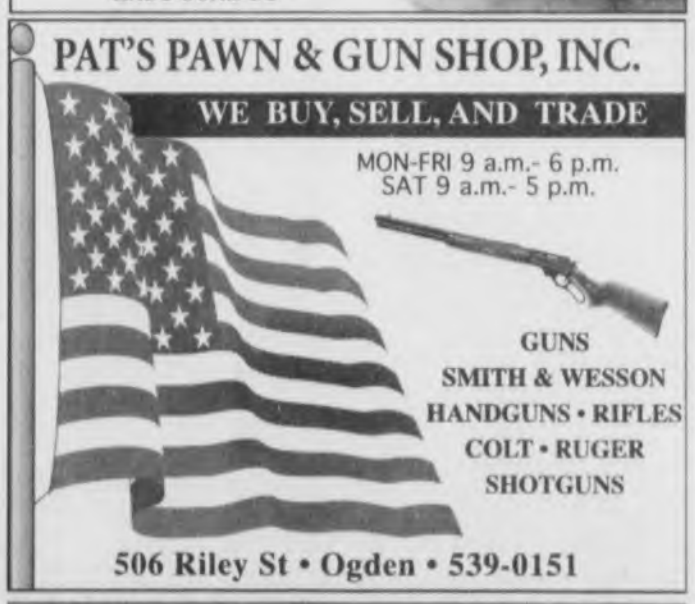
"I love K-State, and I want to see us have success in every extra-curricular activity, whether it's sports or livestock judging," Gardiner said. "But K-State basketball is very special to me."

Part of Gardiner's inspiration was the criticism of Weiser for hiring Huggins. Sports Illustrated's Stewart Mandel and CBS Sportsline's Gregg Doyel, among others, said Weiser and K-State only wanted to win.



"He has taken heat over trivial things that aren't really his fault," Gardiner said, citing the shortage of hot dogs at a basketball game a few years ago as an example. "He's shown a commitment that we haven't seen. He didn't take the safe or easy way out."

Weiser said he was pleased that others knew about the less-pleasant aspects of his job.



"I wouldn't have chosen this profession if I couldn't (take the criticism), but there are things that I can't control and get blamed for and it does wear on you after a while," Weiser said. "When you have a group of people essentially say 'we understand that, and this is our way of saying thank-you,' it makes me feel like this is home, that this is where I belong."

Blood drive success likely

By Mary Bershenyl
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Summer sun usually means fewer donors at American Red Cross blood drives throughout the region, but the third-annual Manhattan Battle of the Badges managed to combat the problem.

Tuesday began the three-day Battle of the Badges drive in CiCo Park's Pottorf Hall. Firefighters and police officers encouraged members of the community to donate and vote for their respective department, said Kristi Ingalls, Red Cross donor recruitment representative.

Ten years ago, Mike Watson, director of the Riley County Police Department, established Battle of the Badges while working in Wichita. When he came to Manhattan, he brought the idea with him, Ingalls said.

"Fall and spring are the best times with donors because of the high schools and colleges," Ingalls said. "Winter is hard because of the holidays, but we really struggle during the summer. People are busy and on vacation."

Anyone interested in donating could walk-in without an appointment and be screened to be a donor.

The Red Cross set a goal for 285 donors throughout the three-day drive and surpassed the individual goals for Tuesday and Wednesday with appointments alone, said Wendell Perks, Red Cross team supervisor.

The Red Cross team was stationed in Wichita and did community drives as well as the drives on the K-State campus.

"We cover almost all areas of Kansas and northwest Oklahoma," Perks said. "The blood serves the areas we draw from and then the surplus goes out of state but primarily it is kept in the areas we draw from."

Once collected, the blood was separated and created two different products.

"We have packed red cells which is used for people who really need blood," Perks said. "The plasma we take off is good for a year. It has clotting factors."

"I'm a regular donor. I've been doing it every three months for 10 years," Ricklefs said. "Someone told me when you get a pint in the hospital it is $300. It's pretty important to donate. We've been scraping the bottom of the barrel this week for volunteers."

Poker proceeds benefit research

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With a desire to raise money for cancer research, 14 people gathered Thursday in the Hemisphere room at Hale Library for a Texas Hold'Em poker tournament.

Proceeds from the tournament went to the American Cancer Society Relay for Life. The event raised $280.

"I'm just here to lose my money," said Roberta Johnson, director of financial services at Hale Library.

Eric Matthews, library assistant, was the winner of the tournament. He took home two K-State football tickets, a medium pizza, two hats from the country club and two gift certificates for ice cream and sub sandwiches.

Several tournament players said they were looking forward to the Riley County Relay for Life, a project they have worked together with before.

The relay begins at 7 p.m. on June 16, and will go until 7 a.m. on June 17 at Memorial Stadium, Johnson said.

For those interested in participating in the relay, contact Belinda Snyder at Shear Dynamics, 1125 Laramie St.

City enacts mosquito-control plan

By Amy Bolton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In an effort to control the growth of mosquitos during the summer, the City of Manhattan has initiated a mosquito-control plan.

The plan includes treating standing water on city-owned property, which is where the problem generally begins.

"Any standing water is a breeding ground for mosquitos," Terry DeWeese, director of parks and recreation for the City of Manhattan, said. "On land that we're responsible for, we treat the larva and the pools of water."

The water is treated by using a pellet containing bacteria called Bactimos. Mattox said it doesn't hurt any other animals that might use the water.

Although the city doesn't treat on private property, it is important for individuals to treat any standing water on their own property, DeWeese said.

Mattox suggested getting rid of water in gutters, tires, birdbaths and anywhere else that has standing water.

Currently people are concerned about mosquitos because of the threat of West Nile Virus, but DeWeese said that is not why the city is treating the water.

"We've done this for a number of years," DeWeese said. "It's not something we've started because of West Nile."

So far this year there have been no cases of West Nile Virus in Kansas, said Charles Murphy, Director of the Riley County-Manhattan Health Department.

"There's been some human cases in Texas and Mississippi, but none that I know of in Kansas," Murphy said.

There were 90 human cases of West Nile Virus in 2003 and seven human deaths, according to the Kansas Department of Health and Environment Web site. In 2004, there were 46 human cases and two deaths.

To prevent mosquito bites and the risk of West Nile Virus, Murphy said to not go out in the evening or at night, when the mosquitos are most prevalent. If people do go outside, he advises them to wear long-sleeve shirts, pants and use an insect repellent that contains DEET.

Murphy also said to eliminate the threat of West Nile, people should eliminate any standing water sources in their homes.

"We always encourage getting rid of mosquito breeding spots, which is standing water," he said. "If you get rid of that breeding site you'll reduce your chances of West Nile."

Coach Huggins to earn at least $800,000

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State head basketball coach Bob Huggins will earn at least $800,000 in guaranteed compensation for the first three years of his five-year contract, the Associated Press reported Monday.

The contract will pay him $900,000 for the fourth year and $1 million in his final year, and it includes an additional $1 million annuity as an additional incentive for Huggins to remain at K-State.

He can also earn nearly $500,000 in bonuses, which includes $25,000 for conference and tournament championships. For each postseason victory, he will earn $10,000 and $100,000 for a national title. He would receive $50,000 for being named NABC or Associated Press Coach of the Year and $25,000 if all home games are sold out, according to the AP.

He will also receive the use of two courtesy cars, membership in the Manhattan Country Club and playing privileges at Colbert Hills Golf Course, as well as a signing bonus of $30,000.

The right Country Stampede outfit should keep style, comfort in mind

By Heidi Paulson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cowboy boots, short skirts and country music will stampede through the air June 22-25 at Tuttle Creek State Park.

Country Stampede is a four-day music and camping festival.

"If you can imagine coming to a party where 150,000 of your closest friends camp and enjoy country music – that's Country Stampede," he said.

When mixing camping with partying, Fawna Henke, senior in animal science, said she's been to enough Country Stampedes to know that the festival dictates a style all its own.

"Everybody just wears swimming suits, tank tops and shorts," Henke said. "It's usually so hot that you often see one or two of those items missing."

The one thing Henke said she can't party without is her hat.

"I'm going to wear my Wranglers, tank top and my cowboy party hat," she said. "You've got to have a party hat."

As for the guys, Henke said they have it easy.

"All they have to do is wear flip-flops, cargo shorts and pile on the beads," she said. "Add a cowboy hat, sunburn and beer, and you've got your classic Stampede guy."

Henke recommended the RB Outpost, 7003 Tuttle Creek Blvd., and Vanderbilt's, 510 Lincoln St. in Wamego, for traditional western wear.

"RB Outpost is awesome and they always have the latest fashions and pretty great sales," she said. "Vanderbilt's has really cute sleeveless button-down shirts, too."

Tara Latham, Vanity's store manager in West Ridge Mall in Topeka, said to not wear white.

"If you want to wear white this season at Country Stampede, it will turn brown," Latham said. "There's no way it will stay clean."

Orange, teal and olive are this season's choice colors for the tank tops, Latham said.

"Last year I wore short denim skirts, strappy tanks, cowboy hats and strappy sandals or flip-flops, and I have all of that at my store," she said. "But pretty much all the girls run around half-naked."

For more of an urban-western look, people should wear music inspired screen-tees, denim skirts or shorts of any color and woven hats, said Kelly Daughters, team leader at the Buckle in Manhattan Town Center, Third Street and Poyntz Avenue.

"Something cool for the hot weather like tank tops and shorts or mini-skirts," Daughters said. "And a cowboy hat, because then you don't have to worry about your hair."

Tan lines were the main concern for Jacklyn Baker, co-manager of Maurices at Manhattan Town Center. She recommended strapless tanks and minimal jewelry to avoid them.

"Swimsuits, tanks and mini denim skirts topped with a cowboy hat – it's perfect," Baker said.

Recent box office flicks disappoint, one entertains

Mini Movie Reviews By Amy Bolton

"X-Men 3: The last stand"
Grade: B-

A disappointing follow-up to its predecessors, 2000's "X-Men" and 2003's "X2: X-Men United." This time around, a cure is being offered to mutants, and they have to decide whether their powers are something that can be treated. The ending of the movie is a letdown, although there is rumored to be an extra scene at end of the credits. Fans of the series will want to see this movie to find out what happens, but they won't be satisfied with the fates of their favorite characters.

"Over the hedge"
Grade: A

Definelty a hilarious cartoon comedy that manages to entertain kids and adults. RJ the raccoon, voiced by Bruce Willis, gets in over his head when he steals a hibernating bear's food stash. While trying to gather more food to repay the bear, he meets an eccentric group of critters who have woken up to discover a hedge surrounding their park. RJ teaches them how to get human food. This cute story teaches a lesson about friendship while amusing the viewer at the same time.

"Poseidon"
Grade: C-

"Poseidon" is a scary story of a cruise ship destined for a Titanic-like ending. When a rogue wave flips the ship upside-down at midnight on New Years Eve, a group of survivors decide to defy the captain's orders and attempt to escape the ship before help arrives.

Anyone who is afraid of death by drowning or leery of having to hold their breath for long lengths of time might want to skip this movie because many scenes of quite graphic nature.

New Comedy Central programming 'Bites'

"Dog Bites Man"
Grade: C-

TV Show review by Brendan Praeger

Summer has been a historically rough time for television fans. It is a season filled with reruns and rejects. Despite the unfortunate popularity of reality shows, recent programs like "Rescue Me" have proven that summer television can be good.

This summer, Comedy Central is trying new programming with the fake news show, "Dog Bites Man." Unfortunately it proves once again that it's better to go outside instead of staying in your living room.

Comedy Central describes this show as part improvisational and part mockumentary. It features a group of dysfunctional fake newscasters interacting with real people in front of the camera and behind the scenes of KHBX, a fictitious local news station in Washington, D.C.

First of all, being a "Daily Show" junkie, I was excited for another addition to Comedy Central's lineup of fake news programs. I also love shows that employ the fake documentary or mockumentary style of storytelling. I hoped that this show could follow in the footsteps of "The Office" to provide an entertaining spoof of the genre.

Unfortunately, not only does the show fail to live up to my expectations, it fails on such a grand scale that it becomes almost painful to watch.

The first hurdle for any new show is to have well-motivated characters. They don't necessarily have to be likable, but they must offer some value to hook viewers to the show.

Matt Walsh, from Upright Citizens Brigade plays the lead reporter. His experience on "The Daily Show" shows that he can be a decent fake reporter, but none of his expertise appears on this show. He spends most of his time trying to relive the one night stand he had with his former intern, who has become the show's producer.

Rather than providing a laughable one-way, flirtatious relationship like Steve Carrel does on "The Office," Walsh comes off as a creepy and perverted. He acts unprofessionally by bringing up their short-lived relationship during interviews and even goes as far as putting a hidden camera in her hotel room.

The other characters aren't much better. Andrea Savage is cute, but her character brings nothing entertaining to the table. AD Miles tries to do his best Napoleon Dynamite impression, but rather than being funny, his character is annoying and uninspired.

The show's only bright spot comes from Zach Galifianakis. I've been a huge Galifianakis fan ever since seeing "Out Cold" in high school, and I've also enjoyed his stand up comedy. He was also part of another short-lived Comedy Central show, "The Comedians of Comedy." His character consistently provides the only humorous moments on the show. However, it's too bad they are few and far between.

I am basing my opinions on the first two episodes, so it is possible that the show will improve. It airs Wednesday nights at 9:30 on Comedy Central. It's also available as a free download from iTunes if you want to check out the episodes you might have missed.

My suggestion: don't bother.

FASHION TIPS FOR SUMMER

ALEX PEAK

With the temperature reaching about 95 degrees every day and mosquitoes buzzing everywhere, it's pretty safe to say summer is here, calendar solstice aside.

For the lucky few, being fashionable is as natural as breathing. But for the rest of us, it seems like as soon as we become comfortable with our seasonable wardrobe, the weather changes and we have to search and seize another new set of clothes. This is an adventure that can be dreaded for some and an enjoyable pastime for others.

Thanks to designers and companies such as BCBG, Bebe, Victor Alfaro and Stella McCartney, fashion is apparently in the eye of the beholder. Since most college students can't find it within their budgets to go on a Versace or Prada shopping spree, they can instead visit stores like Gap, Old Navy, Express, Forever 21, Hollister, American Eagle and others to check out what they have.

Shoppers should not assume the rule is merely what a clothing store or designer says is the "it" fashion statement of the season. Fashion is what you make it. Although I'm certainly not a style tycoon, I have found a few tips that seem to help my outfits come out satisfactorily.

Here are a few simple guidelines:

1 It's not necessary that all colors or patterns match, but try to avoid wearing navy or brown with black.

2 If you're going to wear a lot of different, busy patterns, separate them with a layer in between. For example, if you're wearing a purple T-shirt with white polka-dots and a skirt that has gray and black stripes, you should wear a plain undershirt or tank top under the polka-dot shirt to separate the busyness. This also will give you the popular layered T-shirt look.

3 Don't be afraid to be adventurous with undershirts. It's OK to wear a white shirt with a black undershirt. Just make sure the shirt is boat, scoop or v-necked and the undershirt long enough to be seen under the T-shirt.

4 If you can't find any capris to your liking, make your own. Take a comfortable pair of jeans or khakis and either trim them or (if you want to wear the pants as full-length pants in the future) fold the bottoms up to a desired length.

5 If you're not comfortable wearing tank-tops, squeeze a tight T-shirt underneath. You can find regular Hanes T-shirts in the boy's section at Target that make great undershirts for tank tops.

6 If you're a little round in the mid-section or even short-waisted, try wearing long T-shirts or undershirts that hang out, to create a thin, lengthy illusion.

7 Don't fall for the lie; cowboy boots are gross. Don't wear them unless you are an authentic cowboy, cowgirl or you're working on farm.

8 Try browsing your local thrift store. Although many of the clothes there can be crusty and old, often some true treasures can be dug up.

9 Shrugs and sweaters can be added to an outfit as an afterthought and can also be practical at the same time. If you're going somewhere new, you never know what the climate will be like (whether it's a new office or a vacation place). Having this additional layer can assure your comfort. And when it gets too hot, you can take off the layers.

10 Most importantly, make sure you are comfortable with what you're wearing. If you're insecure with your clothes, it will show. If a skirt is too short, wear tights underneath. If a shirt is too low-cut, wear an undershirt. If the shoes aren't broken in, opt for sneakers or flip flops and spend a weekend at home doing chores in your new heels to break them in.

When it comes to looking good, you must feel good about what you wear. After all, it's always better to be safe than sorry.

Manhattan, Lawrence rapists fit similar profile

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Similarities between a serial rapist in Lawrence and a serial rapist in Manhattan have spawned questions of the two being the same person. The Riley County Police Department, however, is unsure of any connection.

RCPD Captain John Doehling said there could be a possible connection, but would not comment further on the case.

The series of rapes in Manhattan began in October 2000 and have targeted college-age women.

The suspect in the series of rapes in Manhattan has been described as a Caucasian male in his 20s. He is between 5 feet 9 inches and 6 feet tall and weighs about 180 pounds. The suspect has also been described as wearing a dark ski mask, long-sleeve black T-shirt, black leather gloves, black pants and black boots.

The most recent offense linked to the serial rapes in Manhattan was between 3 and 4 a.m. on Sept. 5, 2005. A woman in her 20s reported that she was raped in her home in the north-central area of Manhattan, near the K-State campus, according to a September 2005 press release from the RCPD.

An attempted rape also was reported on Oct. 9, 2005, when a woman said she fought off an attacker dressed similarly to the alleged serial rapist.

The attacker was described as a white male in his 20s. He was about 6 feet tall, weighing about 180 pounds. He was wearing a black ski mask and dark clothing.

Sgt. Dan Wood of the Lawrence Police Department said his department is investigating the possible connection between the rapes in Manhattan and those that have occurred in Lawrence since 2004.

"The three victims in our case have all ranged from 19 years old to their early 20s," Wood said.

The alleged rapist in Lawrence has been described as a white male in his early 20s. He is approximately six feet tall with a slender build, Wood said.

The reported rapes in Lawrence have occurred since July 2004. The first rape happened July 14, 2004, the second on Dec. 29, 2004 and the most recent on June 13, 2006.

Wood would not comment on the possibility of the rapes in Lawrence being connected to rapes in Manhattan.

Susan Allen, director of the K-State Women's Center, said the description of the rapists and victims in Lawrence and Manhattan are similar, but that is common on a college campus.

"That just describes everybody," she said.

In hundreds of campuses across the nation, the description of victims and perpetrators of many rapes fit the population of the college they attend, she said.

If there is a serial rapist in Lawrence, Allen said, it is discouraging, whether or not it is connected to the one in Manhattan.

Loan rates to increase on July 1

By Amy Bolton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students wanting to lock in lower interest rates should consolidate their federal student loans by June 30.

As of July 1, interest rates will increase and students who have federal loans will not have the option to consolidate until they graduate, said Larry Moeder, director of admissions and the Office of Student Financial Assistance.

"In the past, the interest rate has been a variable rate," Moeder said. "It fluctuates from year to year depending on the economy."

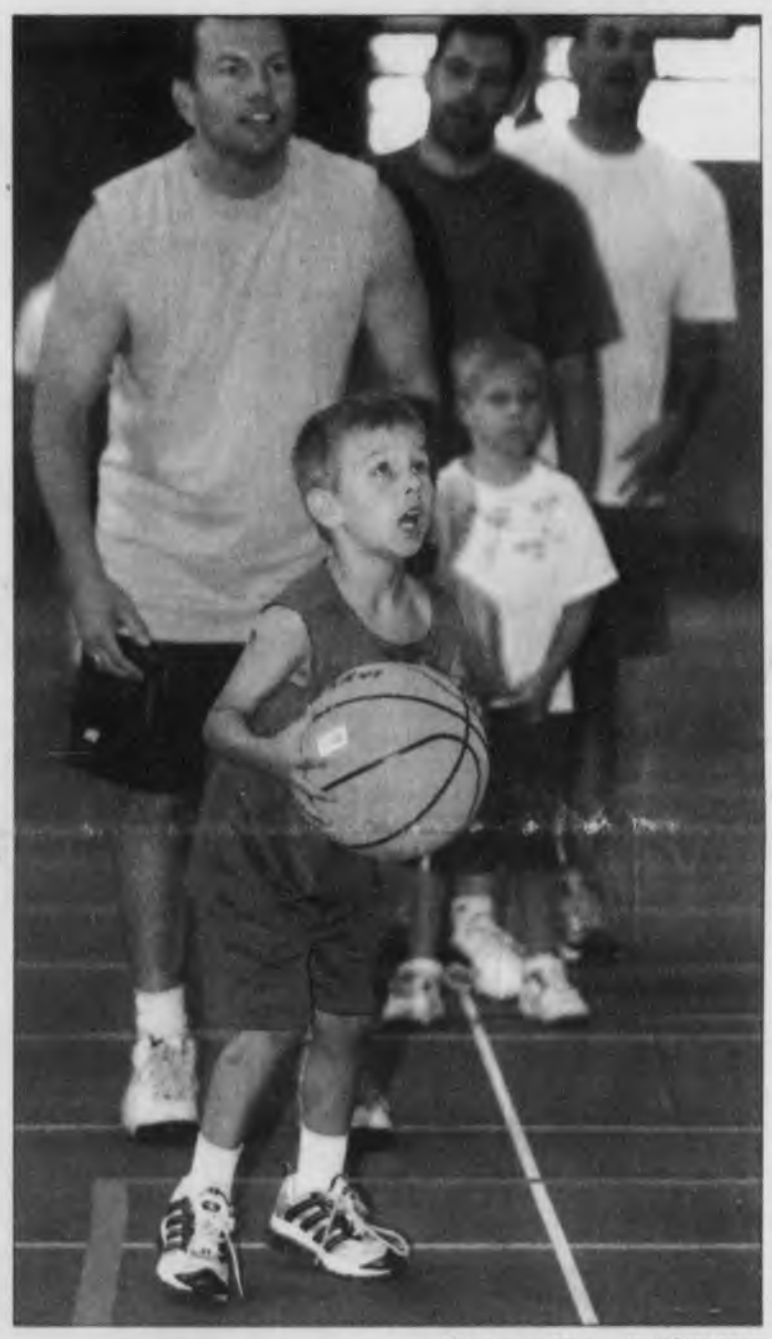
Consolidation allows students to lock in lower interest rates.

Jim Keating, an accountant for the Controller's Office, said the current rate for students is 4.7 percent. On July 1, it will increase to 6.54 percent.

For students who are out of school, the current rate is 5.3 percent. After July 1, it will increase to 7.14 percent.

Moeder said loans come from two sources – private lenders and the federal government.

Student loans are part of the Federal Family Education Program, which has two types of loans. They are the Federal Stafford Loan, which comes from private lenders, and the Federal Direct Student Loan, which is funded by the federal government.



The individual university decides which loans they will use. K-State uses the Federal Stafford Loan.

"The interest rates are identical on both programs," Moeder said. "It's just the source of funding is different."

Most K-State students use Sallie Mae Inc. as their private lender, but Moeder said that students can choose to use a different lender.

Basketball coach leads summer camp

By Ben Spicer
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With his head slightly down and eyes focused, Ross Elder, 7, dribbled spiritedly as fast as he could to the hoop.

Four dribbles later, he squared his shoulders and took a concentrated aim. Imitating what he saw in the demonstration from the K-State players, he made a high-arching shot to the goal that landed softly through the rim.

Ross was one of 175 people taking part in Bob Huggins' inaugural basketball camp Friday and Saturday at Ahearn Field House, a camp specifically designed for fathers and sons to learn drills directly from K-State coaches and players.

The camp, which cost $100 per person, began with a barbeque and offered campers a chance to listen to guest speakers, most notably the new K-State men's basketball coach, Bob Huggins.

"In the game you have to move," Huggins said. "It is about stepping into shots. It doesn't do you any good to just shoot."

Andy Assaley, camp director, said the camp was to instruct both fathers and sons on the fundamentals of basketball in a fun and educational atmosphere.

"I've helped Coach Huggins conduct these camps the past few years," he said. "Kids get a lot out of the camps, learning directly from the players, and fathers learn drills that help their children down the road."

Assaley said as the first of several camps Huggins offers this summer, it was targeted toward children enrolled in kindergarten through the eighth

The line stretched around Varney's Book Store, 623 N. Manhattan Ave., and almost back to the front door at Snyder's book signing Thursday, June 15.

Snyder, along with co-author Mark Janssen, signed autographs of the new Snyder biography, "Bill Snyder: They Said It Couldn't Be Done." The biography tells the story of Snyder raising the K-State football program from the ground up.

Many people arrived 10 to 15 minutes before the start of the signing session to wait for Snyder's autograph.

"I arrived around 5," Cathy Waugh, a Manhattan resident, said after getting her book signed at 6:15 p.m. "I really think it's a neat opportunity. The turnaround has brought great joy to my family throughout the (Snyder era). We were there during the bad years too, so it seems to mean that much more to us."

Many K-State students showed up to purchase the book and have it signed.

"I think the book is a very interesting read," said Amy Wright, junior in Architecture, Planning and Design. "I especially enjoyed looking at the photos from Snyder's past."

Kelly Reader, co-author Janssen's daughter, said she was so proud of her father that she flew in from Washington, D.C., to witness the event.

"You can't imagine how proud we are of him," Reader said. "It's a lifelong dream of his. A lot of our family flew in so we could share in this special day with him."

As for Snyder, he said he is keeping himself busy with activities such as being the head of the new Kansas Mentors program, founded by Kansas Gov. Kathleen Sebelius.

"There are lots of things going on," Snyder said. "Maybe more than I should (attempt): the American Cancer Society, Masonic Temple, the Kansas Mentors program."

Snyder said he hasn't really had a chance to feel what retirement is like yet.

NEWS HIGHLIGHTS

KSU rated a 'best buy'
A Kansas Board of Regents study shows that tuition and fees at the six regents schools are among the best, compared to neighboring states. Even with the second highest tuition increase in the K-State history — 14 percent for undergraduates in 2006-07 — K-State's in-state tuition is 11.4 percent below the regional average.

Architecture award
The "Eight Visions for One Community" studio project, led by K-State architecture professor Stephanie Rolley, received a merit award at a recent design competition. About 40 students and other business professionals assisted with the project, which is geared to redevelop the Bannister Mall area in Kansas City, Mo.

Jardine reconstructs
The Jardine Apartment Complex began the destruction of "K" building Tuesday, June 20. The complex is also running through heavy renovations and reconstruction — all a part of its multimillion-dollar redevelopment project. The redevelopment is estimated to span over a 14-month time frame.

Presidential performance
Bush's job-approval rating has increased from 34 percent in an April poll to 38 percent currently. Energy and war are issues people disapprove most with Bush.

Husband a victim

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Manhattan man previously arrested on child-abuse charges was the victim of arson and criminal damage to property Saturday, June 17.

Jorge Hernandez Jr. arrived at his home at 5 p.m. to find $2,900 worth of damage to his clothing, said Captain John Doehling of the Riley County Police Department.

"The victim (also) found that a great deal of his clothing had been cut into itty-bitty pieces," Doehling said.

In addition to the damage to his clothing, Hernandez reported that he found a pair of his sneakers burned.

Hernandez's wife, Dana Hernandez, 2104 Elm Lane, Apt. 1, was arrested for arson and criminal damage to property. Bond was set at $1,500.

In a related incident, Hernandez Jr. reported $2,015 missing from his bank account. He said the money was transferred to another account without his knowledge.

The RCPD is still investigating the case.

Weiser's contract renewed

Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Athletic Director Tim Weiser will be with the K-State Wildcats for 10 more years, the athletics department announced June 13.

WEISER

This new rollover contract is a revision to the five-year contract that was signed in August 2003. His base salary will be $265,000.

During Weiser's time at K-State, the athletics budget rose from $27 million in fiscal year 2001 to a projected $37 million for the next fiscal year.

This has been made possible by increases in fund raising, corporate sponsorship agreements, media rights fees and ticket sales revenue.

Country music to 'stampede' through Tuttle Creek State Park for 11th time

Country music stampedes through the air at Tuttle Creek State Park June 22-26, bringing top recording artists to the stage each day.

Performances this year feature Gretchen Wilson, Joe Nichols, Toby Keith, Sara Evans, Brad Paisley, Miranda Lambert, Chris Cagle and Terri Clark.

Wayne Rouse, president and general manager of Country Stampede, said people don't necessarily have to be country music fans to enjoy the festival.

"Visitors can watch and listen to live performances on three stages by some of the top names in country music, fill their bellies with a variety of foods, shop at more than 100 vendors' booths and participate in other activities that provide fun for all ages," he said.

Country Stampede takes place at Tuttle Creek State Park, located about five miles north of Manhattan on U.S. Highway 24/Tuttle Creek Blvd.

Rouse called it a big, four-day party.

"If you can imagine coming to a party where 150,000 of your closest friends camp and enjoy country music – that's Country Stampede," he said.

Fisher's ATV Showdown will feature safety demo rides and head-to-head competitions beginning 6 p.m. June 22. It offers fans a chance to compete against artists performing at Country Stampede and features two giveaways: a new Suzuki ATV on June 24 and a new Suzuki LT50 for children ages 6-8 on June 25.

Butch Patrick, known as Eddie Munster on the 1964-66 television show "The Munsters," said he will be at the park throughout Country Stampede. He will accompany the Munstermobiles, visit with fans and advertise for the re-opening of Monster World, Inc. Campground & Theme Park's Log Jam microbrewery in July.

"People enjoy meeting Eddie Munster and seeing the Monster World Campground's Munstermobiles," Patrick said. "T-shirts, pins, photos and other collectables will be available."

Rouse said The Outdoor Channel will also be at the Stampede, hosting two-minute auditions for anyone who'd like to host their own fishing show on the network.

He said new this year is Sunday Fun Day on June 26.

Fort Riley's Information, Ticketing and Registration Office received 2,000 free Sunday Fun Day tickets for military servicemen and their families, Rouse said. "They can either come free for the whole day on Sunday, or upgrade if they'd like to come to the entire four-day event."

Teresa Mayes, manager of ITR on Fort Riley, said Sunday's complementary tickets are available on a first come, first served basis.

"There is an $8 service fee that goes back to the soldiers through MWR (Morale, Welfare and Recreation)," she said.

As for the $55 upgrade to a four-day ticket, Rouse said, "It's a heck of a deal, and the least expensive we've ever had them."

Country Stampede tickets for children 5 and under are free. For children ages 6-12, single-day tickets cost $15 and four-day tickets cost $25. Children's discounts do not apply to reserved or VIP seating.

Adult single-day tickets cost $65 at the gate.

Reserved tickets cost $225 at the gate. VIP tickets cost $500 at the gate.

General and family campsites cost $170 and are available for sale on-site only. Four-day tickets are required to enter campsites.

Two different campgrounds are available: the Branding Iron Family Campground and the Horseshoe Bend Campground. Rouse said the family campground is for the fans who'd like to go back to their tents and sleep after being at the festival all day. It has a midnight noise curfew.

The last day to buy a four-day general car parking pass through Country Stampede for $30 was June 16. ITR on Fort Riley will continue to sell four-day general car parking passes on a first come, first served basis. Parking areas open June 22 at 8 a.m., and vehicles without passes require a $10 entry fee each time they enter the gates.

TO THE POINT

Celebrating diversity

Last weekend marked the Juneteenth festival for Manhattan. While there was a diverse crowd at this year's event, some are still left in the dark about the true meaning of Juneteenth.

To the point is selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Juneteenth began to commemorate the true ending of slavery. On June 19, 1865, Major General Gordon Granger landed at Galveston, Texas, to tell the people that the Civil War had ended and that all slaves were free.

Though Abraham Lincoln signed the document, there were still many slaves who did not know they were legally free.

When Granger arrived in Galveston, two-and-a-half years later after the end of slavery, slaves still spent their days in the hot sun picking cotton and tending to their masters.

When Juneteenth began, it consisted of former slaves going back to Galveston to celebrate the day they were freed. It has now evolved into not only a celebration of black freedom, but how far our society has come in embracing America's diversity.

Juneteenth is an important celebration, perhaps as important as other holidays like Independence Day. It not only marks independence from slavery, but how all races are moving toward erasing the color lines of injustice and celebrating freedom.

Blazing freedom

Respect for flag should not destroy what it stands for

Illustration by Jordan Mizell | COLLEGIAN

ZACHARY T. ECKELS

On Monday, the United States Senate will consider passing an amendment unlike the laws of any civilized nation. In fact, the amendment strays so far from nations like England, France or Germany, that it actually resembles the laws of dictatorships.

SJ Res. 12, commonly known as the flag-burning amendment, would allow congress to criminalize any physical desecration of the stars and stripes.

The real problem with this is that the law would most likely only target people based on their intent. For instance, according to the United State's Flag Code, "The flag, when it is in such condition that it is no longer a fitting emblem for display, should be destroyed in a dignified way, preferably by burning."

Basically, under this amendment, if you got caught burning an American flag, a judge could interpret whether you burned it in a "dignified" way. Personally, I think they have a hard enough time figuring out facts to solve cases.

The situation only gets worse when you go beyond just burning the flag. Since it reads any "physical desecration" instead of just burning, theoretically you could break the law by flying a tattered flag or leaving it out in the rain.

I realize that the flag is a very revered symbol to many Americans and represents everything they believe in. And, I can understand why they would feel so wronged by having the flag disrespected. But what needs to be realized is that the beliefs the flag represents actually protect the act of desecrating it.

Taking away this freedom would be a major step backwards for our country. As a symbol of our country, our flag would ultimately take a step backwards with it. To me, that is a worse crime than the flag's desecration.

In the end, it's also important to realize the true intentions behind such a law. It's an election year, and making your opponents appear to approve of flag burning is a good way to get a few extra votes.

Sure, we've all seen flags burned on television, but how often do you witness it in real life? Personally, I've never seen someone burn a flag; it just doesn't happen that often. Getting votes is the only thing this amendment is good for.

Now, I'm sure there are many of you who, upon finishing my column today, see me as an unpatriotic, pompous jerk. In fact, I can almost hear your shouts suggesting that if I don't like America, I should just get out.

To you, I will say that the only kind of countries that ban flag burning are dictatorships such as North Korea, China and Cuba. If you have a problem with the freedom to express such things, you might want to give one of them a try.

Country Stampede promises sunburns, body odor

CARLA CASSEL

"You don't know what you're missing!"

Oh, how many times I have heard this exclamation in relation to the Manhattan event of the summer: Country Stampede.

Though I've lived in Manhattan since middle school, I've never traveled the long road through Tuttle Creek State Park to the flashing fest that is Country Stampede.

But the claim that I don't know what I'm missing may not be accurate. In the name of science, I've created a list of possible omissions to a long and fulfilling life I've encountered by refusing to participate in the Stampede.

The first thing I think I'm missing is exposure to talented musicians (among various other kinds of exposure).

I grudgingly acknowledge that country musicians are more likely to be able to actually play their own instruments or, even more rare, read music than their mainstream counterparts. I respect the country stars for this skill, but don't expect that respect to translate into any form of loyalty.

Country music speaks too much of tractors, whiskey, horses and heartache for me to endure long portions of it at a time. Maybe if the singers would just play their guitars and let the crowd choose its own lyrics, I'd be more willing to indulge in the activity. As it stands, I respectfully decline.

The second aspect of Country Stampede that I must be missing is the brotherhood and fellowship the event surely provides. After all, who doesn't want to fit thousands of sweaty people into a prickly field next to a fish-infested lake, give them all obnoxious amounts of alcohol and various degrees of sunstroke, deprive them of sleep and showers and ask them to make friends?

I can only suppose it's the best way to ensure that you've seen the worst side of your compatriots before you agree to lifelong friendship. Call me conservative, but I think I'd rather spend the weekend checking Facebook for long-lost elementary school buddies – at least then I don't have to smell them.

Illustration by Christina Forsberg | COLLEGIAN

The third thing I sacrifice every time I skip out on Country Stampede is the irreparable damage done to my skin cells. My favorite County Stampede activity is to hang around Wal-Mart and laugh at the highly fried cowboys and bikini-clad coeds inching toward the Aloe Vera gel. Nothing says quality entertainment like a weekend of scathing burns and uncomfortable blisters.

You would think the faithful attendees would learn to invest in some sunscreen before the big event. Of course, maybe the sticky layers of aloe are as much a tradition to the event as the oft-removed bikini tops that failed to prevent them.

Finishing the list of things I miss every year I refuse to attend the Stampede, I include incurable parking situations, the inevitable petty-theft troubles, heat stroke and the smell of 100-degree vomit from those unlucky few who drink too much.

Now that I realize what I'm missing, I wonder if it's not too late to sign up for the basket of fun.

All I need is a trendy cowboy hat, polka-dot bikini and a cheap dermatologist to fix the inevitable rash that follows the promising third-degree burns.

Krystallos returns to Aggieville

Store moves back to original district after 3-year relocation

By Jesse Sachdeva
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After being located on Poyntz Avenue for three years, Krystallos has returned to Aggieville.

Krystallos Inc., a retail store specializing in sterling silver jewelry and one-of-a-kind clothing, was a part of the Aggieville district for nearly 18 years. They have now relocated to 1218 1/2 Moro St.

An electrical fire in the neighboring bar, Aggie Station, spread to and destroyed Krystallos in May 2003.

They wanted to reopen in Aggieville, but there weren't any vacancies for shops at the time, Lin Rose, owner of Krystallos, said.

Krystallos reopened at 405 Poyntz Ave., in November 2004, but Rose immediately noticed a difference.

"In Aggieville, much of our business came from pedestrian traffic," Rose said. "On any given evening, people walk up and down Moro (Street), eating ice cream, drinking coffee or visiting the restaurants and we would draw in a lot of window shoppers."

Krystallos was not able to recapture the same type of business at its downtown location, Rose said.

"Customers in downtown tended to have a more destination-oriented mindset," Rose said. "The draw just wasn't the same, which is sad because the area has a lot of potiential."

Amber Crawshaw, a 2004 K-State graduate, has worked at Krystallos since the store's relocation to Poyntz Avenue. She was a regular customer while attending K-State.

Knowing the success it had in its original location, Crawshaw said she understood why Rose wanted to return.

"It seemed as though customers weren't aware of our new location, after we had been tied to Aggieville for so long," Crawshaw said. "But fortunately, an opportunity to return presented itself when a vacancy opened up. We began remodeling, and we just opened up shop here."

Crawshaw said sales have already increased since the store's return.

"Things have been looking up. Foot traffic is up, and we've been able to recapture some of the student market we lost when we moved to Poyntz," Crawshaw said.

However, Krystallos' products are not just for students.

"Our target market is to appeal to as many people as possible, young and old," Crawshaw said. "We just try to offer products that are both trendy and classy."

Rose said a grand opening has been planned to target students returning in the fall.

"I'd like to have a grand opening sometime in late August, as a way of letting the students know we're back." Crawshaw added. "It'll probably be a fun, wine and cheese sort of soiree."

Students sublease summer housing

By Mary Bershenyi
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When she decided to stay in Manhattan for the summer, Rachel Knight, senior in mass communications, said she knew she was going to have to find a place to live. Knight was one of many students needing to sublease for the summer months.

Knight lived in her Delta Delta Delta sorority house until the end of the spring term, when the house closed. It will not open again until August, like many greek chapter houses, which leaves members who lived there needing another place if they decided to stay in Manhattan.

Knight chose to sublease from a friend who graduated in May but had an August-to-August lease, she said.

Apartment managers said they saw a great deal of turnover during the summer months.

University Crossing, 2215 College Ave., allows renters to find subleasers, but charges them a fee to do so.

"We have a $50 fee, and they're able to have someone take over the lease," Morgan Dietz, leasing agent, said. "We have a list we hand out if people are interested (in subleasing), but it is not guaranteed. It is whoever calls them to do it."

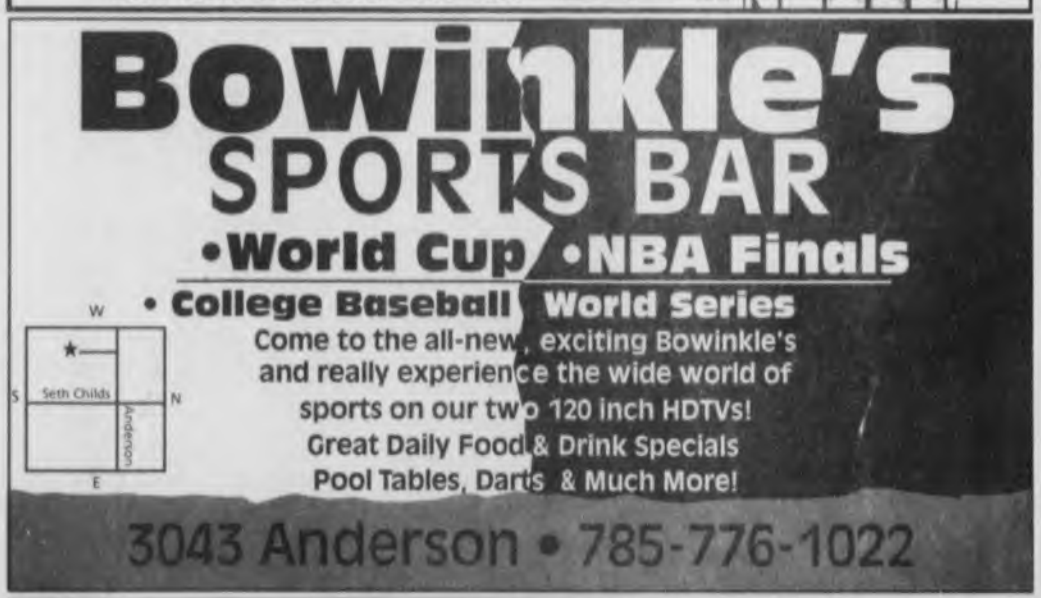
The complex also offers summer leases to keep occupancy rates as high as possible.

"During the summer, the lease ends the end of July and begins at any month, usually May or June 1," Dietz said. "They can start our new leases on August 17."

Despite their attempts, Dietz said occupancy dropped significantly this summer.

"Our pool is pretty full," she said. "But you can tell with the parking lot, there are not a lot of cars out there."

University Crossing is close to full for this fall. There are only about 100 bedrooms available, Dietz said.



"We rent the bedrooms individually," she said. "The two-bedrooms are all full, the only rooms we have open are in four-bedroom units."

For Knight, living on her own has been very different than living in her sorority house.

"You have to make your own food," she said. "But it is nice because you have your own space, you don't have to share a room. They both have their benefits."

LAWRENCE CONSIDERS CELL PHONE BAN

LAWRENCE – The Lawrence City Commission will soon vote on a potential ban on the use of cellular telephones in vehicles.

The proposal, which would ban use of even hands-free devices, would make Lawrence's ban the harshest of cell phone bans in the country. According to the Cato Institute, cell phone use accounts for about 300 deaths per year.

LA. GOV SIGNS BILL TO BAN ABORTION

BATON ROUGE, La. – Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco signed a bill on Saturday that would ban abortion in the state, with the exception of when pregnancy threatens the life or health of a woman.

The bill will take effect if the U.S. Supreme Court overturns Roe v. Wade – a 1973 Supreme Court case that reserved a woman's right to privacy, preventing states from banning abortion.

PET DOG CALLS 911, SAVES OWNER'S LIFE

Belle, the dog, began to bite onto owner Kevin Weaver's cell phone to call 911 after the diabetic man had a seizure and collapsed.

Weaver, 34, said Belle had been trained to summon help. She had been taught to bite down on the number 9 on his cell phone, contacting 911.

SENATE TO DEBATE U.S. TROOP WITHDRAWL

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Democrats introduced a resolution Monday that calls for a phased withdrawal this year of U.S. forces.

The measure doesn't set any numerical goal for withdrawal and doesn't set a deadline for all of the 130,000 U.S. military personnel in Iraq to leave. Some senators, however, plan to propose having all troops return by July 2007.

MYSPACE.COM SUED OVER ALLEGED SEX ASSAULT

AUSTIN – A 14-year-old girl who says she was sexually assaulted by another user of MySpace.com sued the social networking Web site Monday, claiming it does not take sufficient steps to protect underage members.

The girl says a 19-year-old man lied in his profile about being a senior on a football team to gain her trust and phone number.

The man, Pete Solis, was arrested in May on a charge of sexual assault of a child.

City aims to prevent budget misuse

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Citing concerns about missing funds from Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation, city commissioners moved to table the motion that would increase the city manager's approved amount for purchases before requiring approval from the Manhattan City Commission.

The policy change was recommended by Berberich Trahan LLC, an auditing firm from Topeka.

The change would require city purchases reaching ammounts higher than $20,000 to be approved by the City Commission.

Putting the spending criteria into one policy makes sense, Bernie Hayen, Manhattan city finance director, said.

"I hate policies. I hate things like this," Hayen said. "I know why it's probably necessary."

Purchases of less than $20,000 would require approval by the city manager. For purchases of less than $10,000, other city employees might have the right to expenses, pending approval.

The plan also would allow for approval of emergency spending, regardless of the amount.

Commissioner Ed Klimek said what he would identify as an emergency might not be the same for someone else.

"I don't think you defined what emergencies are," Klimek said, speaking to Hayen.

Klimek also raised concerns about increasing the spending limit needing approval by the City Commission with the recent investigation of parks and recreation by the Riley County Police Department for mishandling of funds.

Children scrambled for candy and adults watched from chairs as the Kansas City Marching Cobras paraded by with drums and dancers stepping to the beat.

Barbeque chicken, hot-link sausage and a parade were included in the celebration of Juneteenth at the Douglass Community Center Park, at Ninth and Yuma streets. More than half of the sale proceeds went to support the Henry W. Grady Health System Foundation in Atlanta.

A highlight for the crowd was the Marching Cobras with 4-year-old Lonell Hamilton as drummer.

He made it to the end of the parade route on Yuma Street before his drum slipped off his shoulders.

Lonell is the great-grandson of Olivera King, who also had a granddaughter, Olivia King, and great-granddaughter, Reashawe Hamilton – all of whom are members of the Marching Cobras.

The Marching Cobras have performed for two presidents. They have also performed overseas, and participate in 40 to 45 performances each year, King said.

Surviving in the sand

Monica Lopossay | THE BALTIMORE SUN

With the sandstorm worsening, Staff Sgt. Rafael Rodriguez of the Army's 57th Medical Company, heads in after securing the Black Hawk medevac helicopters. His crew transports both injured Americans and Iraqis to the U.S. Air Force's Theater Hospital in Balad, Iraq. This fall, roughly 2,000 Fort Riley soldiers will deploy to the area in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom.

K-State-Salina flies in female race

By Jamie Smidt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A tradition that began with Kansas's own Amelia Earhart continues this week with the only all-female trans-continental air race in the world.

The K-State-Salina team of Janelle Baron, sophomore in professional pilot; co-pilot Robin Mikols, junior in professional pilot; and passenger Tricia Erker, sophomore in professional pilot, will compete in their first race. This is the third year that K-State-Salina has competed.

"This is the biggest challenge any of us has come across in our career," Baron said.

The K-State-Salina team will compete for the collegiate trophy against three other teams: Purdue University, Central Missouri State University and Western Michigan University. The K-State-Salina team will also compete in the open race with 36 other teams.

The teams must fly only during daylight hours and use visual flight rules instead of relying on the instrument panel.

Stops along the way include Santa Teresa, N.M., Ozona and Bryan, Texas, Bastrop, La., Ada, Okla., Albert Lea, Minn., and Lawrence.

They will fly one of the university's five Cessna 172 planes with the Garmin G-1000 glass cockpit. This means the aircraft is equipped with the latest technology, and the pilots will be looking at two flat-panel monitors, which will make flying easier and more precise.

Teams will compete against their own handicaps – the goal is to obtain the highest score in knots-per-hour above the handicap. This method levels the field as the different planes have different performance levels. The handicap on the Cessna for the K-State-Salina Team is 107.75, Baron said.

Other challenges Baron and Mikols will face include flying over mountains and maintaining a steady altitude. In the past, this race has been won by tenths of a second. In practice flights, the students try to stay within a 50-foot altitude. But in this type of race, fluctuations add time.

"If I fly up 20 feet and then back down 20 feet – that's ten seconds," Baron said. "I need to keep it within five feet."

Despite the challenges, Baron said she is optimistic.

"There is no way to know, but we're aiming for No. 1," she said.

While this year's prizes are worth more than $16,500 in cash awards, ribbons, medallions and a trophy, most women will say they compete for the experience, to see the country or simply for the fun of it.

"It's the ultimate road trip," Baron said.

Students receive fully-paid trips

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four students will have the opportunity to study abroad for a full year with help from the Fulbright scholarship.

This is only the third time that K-State has had four or more Fulbright winners in a single year, President Jon Wefald said in a K-State Media Relations and Marketing news release. The scholarship will fully fund an academic year study abroad for each student selected.

This fall, the four K-State students will travel to Japan, Mexico and Hungary.

Married students Dave and Amity Thompson each won the scholarship and will travel together to Sendai, Japan, and attend Tohoku University.

Amity, a 2005 graduate, said she first became interested in Japan because her friend Ai is Japanese and lived with her for two years.

"I was impressed that she came to school in a country whose language and culture was so different from her own," Amity said. "I decided that someday I wanted to be able to visit her in her homeland and speak to her in Japanese."

Dave, graduate in electrical engineering, said he got interest in Japan through Amity.

"She told me that one of her goals was to live in Japan for a year or more," he said. "I wanted to help her accomplish that. I started taking classes, and then got interested in both the language and the culture as time progressed."

In Japan, Amity and Dave will work to improve their language skills as they experience the country and culture.

Amity said she hopes to become proficient enough by the second semester to take some history classes and do some personal research about early modern Japan, which would help her pursue a doctoral degree in Japanese history.

Amity and Dave said they became interested in the Fulbright scholarship after looking at various options to study in Japan.

When applying for the scholarship, the couple tried not to think about what would happen if one received it and the other didn't.

"We applied for the Fulbright amidst applying to graduate school as well," Amity said. "People kept asking us 'What if?' as in what if one gets it and the other doesn't, what if one gets into graduate school and can't defer. We finally decided to trust God on this one. He'd get us where we need to be, wherever that would be. And He did seem to take care of everything."

Lynn Brickley, graduate in counseling and student development, will travel to Budapest, Hungary, where she will teach English and work with the Fulbright advising center. Brickley said she hopes her time in Hungary will help her with what she wants to do with her career – international advising to college students.

"I am really interested in international student development where I could go to these other countries and other universities and help start a program," she said.

Elizabeth Greig, graduate in nutritional science and Spanish, will study in Cuernavaca, Mexico. She will study the cultural factors that affect health to help her work with Hispanics as a future physician, according to a K-State Media Relations news release.

After her year in Mexico, Greig will attend medical school at the University of New Mexico.

K-State aims to conserve water

By Leann Sulzen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Water usage in Manhattan increases in the summer time. Students and residents have options when it comes to conserving water and saving on the bill.

Peter Armesto, assistant director for Manhattan Public Works/Water, said the city pumps water at a rate of 10 to 16 million gallons per day. Armesto said this rate is more than double what the city pumps in the winter months.

While the city pumps millions of gallons of water, Armesto said there are no problems with shortages.

Much of the water is stored in one of the city's water tanks until needed when there is more of a demand.

Even during a state-wide drought a few years ago, he said the city asked only for voluntary water conservation.

Although Manhattan has not required a mandatory limit on water usage since Armesto can remember, he said it is still important to conserve on water.

"We don't have a shortage of water, but we don't want people wasting it," Armesto said. "For one, it's going to cost them money, and it's not the best use of this resource."

Armesto said a good way to conserve water is to be more conscious of how much it really costs.

"When you are brushing your teeth or shaving, don't just let the water run unless you need it," he said.

According to a brochure by Armesto, also available on the city's Web site, www.ci.manhattan.ks.us, another way to conserve water is to avoid using water outside during the hotter parts of the day.

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Alex Trippel, groundskeeper for the department of facilities and junior in pre-professional architectural enginerring, positions a water sprinkler in the grassy area north of Kedzie Hall on Monday afternoon. One way K-State helps conserve water is by watering plants at night.

The brochure recommends using water before 8 a.m. and after 7 p.m. so there will be less evaporation.

With the largest water usage account in Manhattan, K-State also takes measures to conserve water.

John Woods, director of facilities services, said his crew waters plants on campus at night instead of during the day to conserve water on campus.

"We try to water just the amount that would soak in and not run off," he said.

"Most of the systems are on computerized irrigation systems, so if we get a heavy rain we might turn them off."

Water needs are evaluated by two people with grounds maintenance who have taken irrigation classes and can make audits on irrigation systems, Woods said.

"When they do that, we can then determine what amount of water is needed for that particular area and that sprinkler head," he said.

Another way to conserve water is to use mulch, according to a K-State Horticulture report from K-State Research and Extension called "Water Conservation in the Home Landscaping."

Woods said the grounds crew uses mulch in several areas on campus.

"We get several truckloads a year to put around to conserve the moisture in the shrub beds so they don't dry out and we don't necessarily have to water them as much," he said.

Although the university uses a large amount of water, Woods said it is necessary to keep the campus green.

"What attracts lots of students is the appearance of campus," he said.

See to Learn program brings affordable care

By Mary Bershenyi
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Failing to take care of young eyes can result in problems that extend into adulthood. To combat that problem, Kansas and 19 other states developed the See to Learn program.

In an effort to make eye care more affordable and available to families, the program joined with optometrists across the state to offer free eye exams for 3-year-olds. There are more than 250 participating doctors in Kansas, according to the Eye Care Council.

Participating doctors include Eye Care Associates of Manhattan's Dr. Paul Bullock and Dr. Matt Stanley.

"Age 3 children need an evaluation at least," Bullock said. "If they detect things early, the chances are very good they can be treated. If everything is OK, they need a complete check up at age 5 when they start school."

See to Learn also focuses on educating parents and school nurses about the consequences associated with undetected vision problems. More than 20 percent of children entering kindergarten have undetected vision problems, hindering their ability to learn to read and succeed academically, according to the Eye Care Council.

Despite the affordability and accessibility, some parents still do not take advantage of the program, Stanley said.

"People just don't do it," he said. "It is possible parents don't hear about the program."

Continuing good eye care is important throughout life, including during college.

Eye Care Associates sees a large number of college students who come in for their annual screenings or to update their contact lens prescriptions, Bullock said.

A lot of the problems or visual strain the practice has seen in college patients range from extended use of computers to the amount of reading students do on a daily basis.

In addition to going in for checkups, students should make sure they are protecting their eyes from the sun the same way they protect their skin.

It is important to buy quality sunglasses instead of the ones found in drug stores and gas stations, because they do not guarantee the same level of protection, Bullock said.

"The ozone layer is supposed to protect our eyes, but with pollution it isn't," Bullock said. "We need to inform our patients."

Ron Prince to help instruct fall leadership course

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Most people agree, good leadership can be taught on and off the field.

This fall, football coach Ron Prince and Susan Scott, associate dean of Leadership Studies and Programs, are teaching a course that is available to all K-State students.

The class, "Core Topics in Leadership," is available to more than 500 K-State students.

Twenty-two slots are available for seniors completing a minor in leadership studies.

Additional slots are available for juniors in the leadership studies program.

These students will meet seven times throughout the semester.

About 500 slots are available for students through the Division of Continuing Education.

This class will be taught strictly online.

For more information
Contact Todd Wells, associate director of education and personal leadership, at 532-6085 or sign up online at www.dce.k-state.edu and click on the leadership icon.

"There are several slots still available through continuing education," Scott said.

"I can't imagine we'll reach 500," she said.

The class will use the book "Built to Last," by Jim Collins, and will discuss the core values and the character of different, successful cultures, Scott said.

Many students are taking the class because coach Prince is teaching it, she said.

"They're interested in coach Prince's leadership," Scott said.

John Iiams, fifth-year in architecture, said he wouldn't take the class simply because coach Prince is teaching it.

"I wouldn't, but I imagine a lot of people would," Iiams said.

Coach Prince said he is a teacher at heart and is looking forward to teaching the class.

"I think there's nothing more honorable than teaching," Prince said.

He said he originally wanted to be a lawyer or some other honorable profession, before becoming a coach.

"If you're the head coach at Kansas State, you need to be the head coach for the entire state of Kansas," Prince said.

HUGGINS | Camp helps children learn fundamentals of basketball

grade, along with their fathers. Assaley said the camp was divided into seven stations for the children, where they learned anything from shooting techniques to dribbling, as well as defense, post moves and passing.

"While the kids are getting hands-on instruction from the players, the dads will benefit by learning new ways to better their sons' performance," Assaley said.

Assaley said during the camp, fathers learned ways to help their children develop strength and learn about nutrition.

Ross, his 6th-grade-brother Brooks, and their father participated in the camp for the first time.

"I wanted to learn how to dribble between the legs," Ross said. "I really wanted to improve my dribbling."

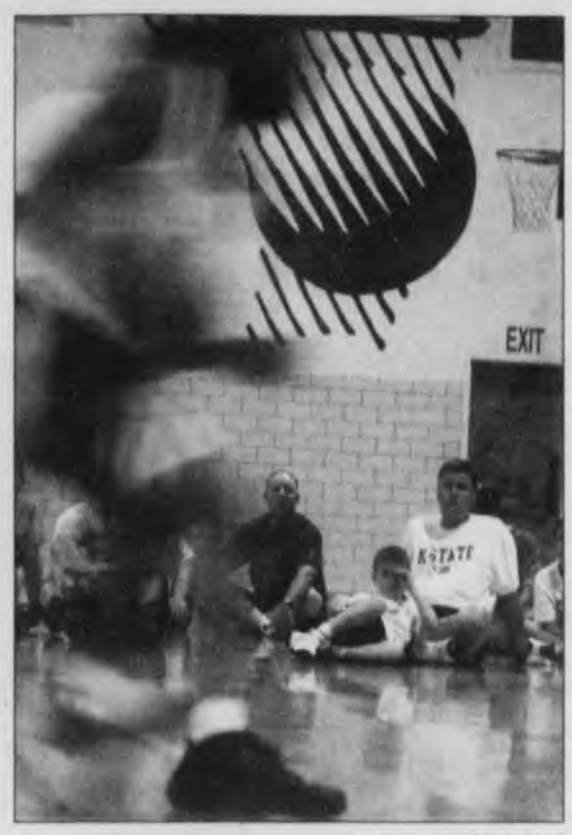
Todd Elder, Ross' and Brooks' father, said his boys were just the right age to benefit from the additional coaching.

"It's fun to learn from and interact with the K-State coaching staff," he said.

Schyler Thomas, a senior point guard on last year's K-State men's basketball team, assisted at the camp as one of the coaches.

"The premise of this camp is to put 'fun' in fundamentals," he said. "We wanted to help the kids out and teach them skills to improve."

Thomas said the important thing about this camp was for everyone to enjoy themselves and improve their game.



Treg Arganbright, a sixth-grade student, said he had gone to former coach Jim Woolridge's camp for the past two years and said he had looked forward to this one.

"I wanna get my shot better," he said.

"Well, that, as well as work on my ball handling."

Treg's father, Thad Arganbright, said as a K-State basketball fan he was excited about the camp.

"How can you not be excited about it, with a coach like Bob Huggins coming to town," he said.

LOANS | Consolidation due June 30

Erin Korsvall, spokesperson for Sallie Mae, said interest rates on student loans are based on a 91-day Treasury Bill.

"It's representative of a larger trend of rising interest rates," Korsvall said.

"Because that rate has increased over the past year, that is driving up the interest rates of existing loans as of July 1. Essentially we're seeing short-term interest rates rising."

Korsvall said those wanting to consolidate loans will need to file the proper paperwork.

"They need to get an application into their lender no later then midnight on June 30," she said.

"In many cases, you can apply online."

Consolidating student loans extends the repayment term, which means students will receive a lower monthly payment, Korsvall said.

"When you do extend your repayment term, you will pay more in interest over the life of the loan, but there's never a prepayment penalty on student loans," she said.

That means students can pay off their loan early and not pay interest, Korsvall said.

Congress also passed legislation on June 15 removing the restriction of requiring consolidation of a student loan with the current lender, Korsvall said.

"Time is ticking so you want to shop around quickly for lenders," she said.

"Look for things like interest-rate reduction and also great customer service, things like online account access and online payments.

"It's a rare opportunity to be able to protect yourself not only from interest rates that we know will increase on July 1, but from any other interest rate increases over the life of your loan."

Latest dance move very popular in clubs, creates new style of music

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the 1960s, everyone was doing the "Mashed Potato" dance. In the 1970s, it was the "Bump." The 1980s brought in the "Moon Walk," and the 1990s started the "Cabbage Patch."

The newest dance rage in the clubs is the "Snap" dance.

According to www.urbandictionary.com, the new sub genre of hip-hop, snap music, originated in the South. There are some discrepancies regarding who discovered snap music and when, but many claim that it was K-Rab, an artist and producer from Atlanta, who is responsible for the 2005 hit "Laffy Taffy," by rap group DL4. This sound is characterized by the finger-snap sound in place of a snare drum, including Dem Franchise Boys' song, "Lean Wit It, Rock Wit It," and Cherish's song "Do it, to it."

Each decade has its own style of dance moves. "I know my kids will laugh at me when an old song comes on and I start doing dances I used to do when I was in college, because it won't be popular anymore," Brittany Foster, sophomore in apparel design, said.

Snap music is requested right now in clubs like Silverado's on Wednesday's Hip-Hop night, Foster said.

There are four dances that can be done to snap music. These include the "Poole Palace," the "Westside Walk," the "Motorcycle," which was made popular by Young Joc's smash hit, "It's Going Down," and the "Snap" dance.

The dances are very simple to do with basic movements using the torso and arms with little or no movement in feet, followed by snapping and leaning back in conjunction of the music, Foster said.

"Silverado's was playing snap music before it really got popular," Foster said. "A lot of people can't do it right. But when those songs come on, the whole club dances, even people who just stand on the wall."

Part of snap music's appeal is how simple it is to dance to, said Montreal Devine, junior in social science and KSDB-FM 91.9 disc jockey.

"They love it. It's a dance that is easy to do even if you don't have rhythm," Devine said.

"It gives the club a more crunk style," Ochanda said.

The snap dance also gives men a chance to dance, said Kim Agwu, sophomore in open-option.

"Even 'gangstas' or guys who think they are too cool to dance can still do this dance," Agwu said.

As the cousin to crunk music, a style that has high energy and can be described as a mix of rock and rap, snap music is described as the laid back style of crunk, according to MTV.com.

"The difference between crunk and snap is that crunk music is more high energy," Devine said.

Some think snap music is a fad and people will grow tired of the simple movements a lot of rap artists have scored hits with.

"To tell you the truth, I only think snap music will last six more months at the most, simply because people get tired of doing the same old dance, just like the 'Harlem Shake,'" Devine said.

How to do the "Snap" dance:

When the snap sound happens in the music, dancers should snap their fingers along with it. In between snaps, they lean back alternatively to the left and right and freeze at the snap as if their photo is being taken.

Dancers can add flair to the dance by doing a chimney instead of a lean, or by making their snap and freeze more dramatic.

How to do the "Motorcycle" dance:

When the bass bumps in the music, dancers should ball their fists as if they were on motorcycle handles, put their arms up in the air, and lean back with a bounce. When they lean back, they should flick their wrists.

Dancers can add flair by bouncing back and flicking their wrists.

Women should avoid relationship stereotypes

Entertainment industry produces unattainable love

LAUREN ROHRER

There is an unspoken blueprint of how our lives are supposed to go.

In my mind, it goes something like this: we finish high school, go to college, date and eventually meet our soul mate or trust-fund baby. Then we live happily ever after in the suburbs while driving around in our luxury sport-utility vehicles.

Personally, I blame the movies for the standard.

Seriously, have you ever seen a happy ending where the female lead doesn't kiss the guy, get married or have a baby?

This unspoken blueprint has been around ever since the 1989 movie, "Say Anything," where John Cusack holds a radio over his head and sets this ridiculous standard – a standard that basically screams that a guy is going to complete you.

Now, ladies, why are you even worrying about a college degree when the world is telling you that some guy is eventually going to come along and fix all your problems?

OK, I get it – I'm a little bitter. We are not housewives from the 1950s.

I realize dating, for many, is a pain.

Most guys need to be voted off the island.

If it's not the creepy guy at the bar, it's the stage-five clinger, which apparently isn't exclusive to Vince Vaughn in "Wedding Crashers."

Looking for the right guy in this town can be like looking for a parking spot on game day.

This summer, I ask you to try something different.

Try because you are not a housewife. Try because settling is for quitters. Try because divorce can be more expensive than weddings.

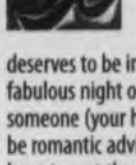
And try because you are smarter than a stereotype.

There's too much emphasis on finding that someone.

At the end of the day, as much as it makes me want to vomit, some women are just meant to follow the unspoken blueprint.

So, we keep trying and we keep dating.

I always keep in mind that right now there are people locked into relationships they rushed into lusting after the blueprint.



My blueprint is one where I went to college, dated and discarded many, drank way too many summer beers with my buddies, and then completely forgot that I was supposed to want something else.

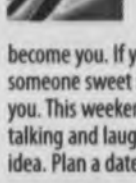
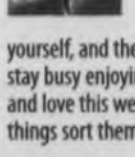
HOROSCOPES

For Wednesday, June 21, through Saturday, June 24



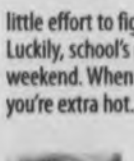
Aquarius

Midweek, someone's showing eccentricities that nearly equal your own unparalleled, fun and funny individuality — a match made in heaven? Good times are ahead. From Friday through the weekend, the good just gets better — you're burning hot, and your love life really sizzles.



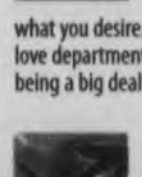
Aries

Making the first move is rarely a problem for you. Later in the week, you might even surprise yourself with boldness in the love department. Look out for some spontaneous combustion. As far as romantic matters this weekend, say it in a short and sweet way or say it with flowers.



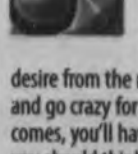
Cancer

On Wednesday and Thursday, whatever you start in the love department can really take off — and if it's a little crazy, so much the better. Catch love fever — it'll carry you into a weekend that finds you busting out of your shell in an inspiring way. A certain someone's likely to be impressed with your wild side.



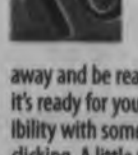
Capricorn

Wednesday and Thursday are days made for romance, and your sensual side definitely deserves to be indulged. Plan a great date or a fabulous night out with friends. This weekend, someone (your honey? A well-meaning, would-be romantic advisor?) has a lot to say, but you'll have to sort through it for the substance.



Gemini

Wednesday and Thursday, give you the opportunity to separate romantic fact from fiction. Ask the right questions, particularly of yourself. This weekend, you're a big flirt. If you're single, you go. If you're coupled up, confine those compliments and bat eyelashes to your sweetie, or at least make sure you have an understanding.



Libra

The way to hold on around Wednesday or Thursday is to let go; possessiveness doesn't become you. If you're single, on the other hand, someone sweet may be looking to hold onto you. This weekend, experiencing new things and talking and laughing about it afterward is a good idea. Plan a date accordingly.

Pisces

Wednesday and Thursday ought to bring some communication about exactly that. Initiate it yourself, and the results could look nice. Plan to stay busy enjoying the small, sweet parts of life and love this weekend; it's best to let the bigger things sort themselves out.

Leo

Your romantic role on Wednesday and Thursday is less obvious, and it may take a little effort to figure out the lesson to be learned. Luckily, school's out and plain old fun is in this weekend. When you're busy enjoying yourself, you're extra hot.

Scorpio

Wednesday and Thursday, and the form it'll take is largely dependent on you. Go after what you desire. This weekend, something in the love department that seems minor may end up being a big deal — or even a deal-breaker.

Sagittarius

Wednesday and Thursday are more about setting aside your own concerns to handle responsibilities and do a good deed for a loved one. It's all good as far as your karma's concerned. If your romantic efforts are thwarted this weekend by activities, at least you won't be bored.

Taurus

Wednesday and Thursday, act on your feelings — these days are perfect for it. Shout your heart's desire from the rooftops, give a stranger flowers and go crazy for love. By the time the weekend comes, you'll have plenty to think about — and you should think hard.

Virgo

By the middle of the week, you should have stuff squared away and be ready for a little romance — and it's ready for you, if your remarkable compatibility with someone is any indication. Talk about clicking. A little tandem soul-searching can also happen, making for lots of bonding. Watch what you say this weekend, though; it may seem logical to you, but someone else could be mystified.

Donning lampshades to try to win VIP backstage passes to the Brad Paisley performance, Jessica Pontious, Gerard, Kan.; Stephanie Jackson, Jasper, Mo.; and Janice Pontious, Gerard, Kan., let out a cheer while waiting for the performance by Sara Evans on Saturday, June 24, during Country Stampede at Tuttle Creek State Park.

As Sean Paigo, left, searches through a stack of cowboy hats, Tony Paigo, right, both residents of Saratogna, N.Y., helps customer Amos Moses, resident of Hanover, Kan., to select a hat at the booth Wanted Man Western Wear.

Some people passing by smiled, made faces or pointed and laughed.

Others stopped to talk and ask the three girls why they were wearing lampshades on their heads Saturday, June 24, at the 11th annual Country Stampede.

"We're trying to get VIP backstage with Brad Paisley," said Janice Pontious, sporting a colorful lampshade with "alcohol made me do it" written on the side. "We spent hours trying to come up with a clever way to make a sign for 94.5 FM to see us. They're looking for the biggest, weirdest signs out there."

In the song "Alcohol," musician Brad Paisley sings, "And I'll bet you a drink or two that I can make you put that lampshade on your head," in his lyrical narration.

"That's where we got the idea," said Pontious, "We're big fans of Brad Paisley."

This is the second Country Stampede for Janice and Jessica Pontious, residents of Gerard, Kan., and fellow Stampeder Stephanie Jackson, resident of Jackson, Mo. The three said they trekked out to Manhattan's Tuttle Creek State

Wildcat 91.9 celebrates 2nd Rock against Country

Concert features alternative music

By Jesse Sachdeva
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Country Stampede comes to Manhattan, those who don't like country music often find their weekend entertainment options limited. However, K-State's KSDB-FM 91.9 took the situation into its own hands and established Rock Against Country last year.

"We wanted to provide an alternative to the Stampede, to show that Manhattan is not just a country music town and to give back to our listeners," said Chris Swick, Wildcat 91.9 program director. "Last year's concert was a success, and this year we only hope to improve upon it."

The second-annual Rock against Country concert was Friday, June 23, at Bobby T's Bar & Grill, 3240 Kimball Ave.

Local acts, including Mikey Needleman, The Ruckus and Pineapple Truck played to a crowd of more than 220 people.

Needleman opened the show with his own blend of acoustic alternative, highlighted by a cover of Bon Jovi's "Livin' on a Prayer," mixed intermittently with Rammstein's "Du Hast."

Needleman was followed by The Ruckus, an eight-member ska outfit. The band's high-energy style incorporated two trumpets and a trombone in with the traditional rock instruments.

The Ruckus got the crowd moving throughout its entire set with the horn section's dance moves. Mike Higgins, trumpet player for The Ruckus and 2006 K-State graduate, gave a short history of the band's formation.

"Many of us had been playing different bands throughout the local scene since 2004, but the band came

Pharmacy robberies may be related

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two recent robberies at local pharmacies may be related, said Capt. John Doehling of the Riley County Police Department.

Candlewood Health Mart Pharmacy, 3254 Kimball Ave., and Dillons Westloop Pharmacy, 1000 Westloop Place, reported aggravated robberies by a white man in his early 20s.

Candlewood Health Mart Pharmacy was robbed June 3, and Dillons Westloop Pharmacy was robbed Sunday, June 25, at approximately 1:05 p.m.

The suspect for both crimes was described as a white man in his early 20s, approximately 6 feet 3 inches tall and weighing 200-220 pounds.

He was described as having sandy blond or brown hair, a tan skin tone and a full, roundish face, according to a RCPD press release.

At the Dillons Pharmacy, the suspect was wearing a blue baseball cap, blue jeans and white sneakers when he allegedly robbed the pharmacy, Doehling said.

The suspect jumped over the counter at Dillons Pharmacy, and displayed a knife as he demanded specific drugs, Doehling said.

"We do not comment on an ongoing investigation," said Su-Ella McKinzie, spokeswoman for Dillons Stores.

Candlewood Health Mart Pharmacy also declined comment on the case.

If the suspect is seen, people should contact the RCPD at their phone number 537-2112. In the case of an emergency, people should contact 911.

Do not make contact with the suspect, as this person should be considered armed and dangerous, Doehling said.

2 women report rape to RCPD

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two reports of forcible rape were reported to the Riley County Police Department over the weekend, said RCPD officials on June 26.

The first incident involved a 23-year-old female from Council Grove, Kan., who said she was abducted and raped by three white men on Sunday, RCPD Capt. John Doehling said.

"At least part of this incident happened in the south-central part of town," Doehling said.

The alleged rapes occurred in Riley County and adjoining counties between 1:30 and 8:30 a.m., Doehling said.

"We are still investigating," he said.

Another incident of rape was reported as having occurred between 8 and 11 p.m. June 19 in the southeast part of Manhattan.

The alleged victim reported she was raped by a person she knew while she was visiting him in his home.

The alleged victim was in her late teens.

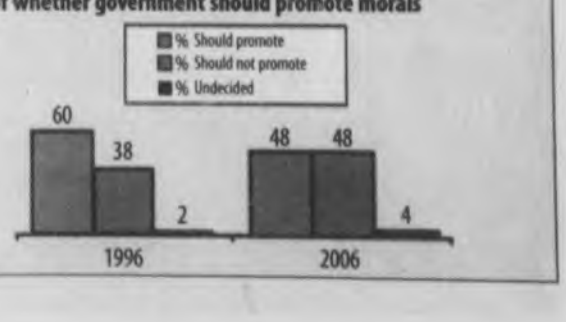
NEWS HIGHLIGHTS



Track All-American
K-State sophomore Laci Heller was named to the CoSIDA/ESPN the Magazine Academic All-America second team for women's track Friday. This is the first academic national honor for Heller. She is a native of Meriden, Kan., and is majoring in feed science and management. Heller, a 4.0 GPA student, has won several honors this year.

Child safety belt law
By July 1, the state safety belt law will change. Children ages 4 to 7 must ride in a booster seat unless the child weighs more than 80 pounds or the child is taller than 4 feet, 9 inches. Children ages 8 to 13 must be protected by a safety belt. For more information about safety law changes, go to www.kansassafekids.org.

Student loans rates
As of July 1, student loan rates will increase and students who wish to consolidate should do so by June 30. Today, students pay 4.7 percent interest on consolidated loans. On July 1, that rate will increase to 6.54 percent. Currently, students out of school pay 5.3 percent interest. By July 1, that rate will be 7.14 percent.

Mixed on morals
While 59 percent of Americans say government policies significantly influence moral values, most are divided on whether government should promote morals.

TODAY 2000: U.S. returns young Cuban boy

Child reunites with father after 6-month U.S. captivity

Elián González, a young Cuban boy found clinging to an inner tube off the Florida coast in Nov. 1999, became the subject of an international dispute between the U.S. and Cuba.

Elián's American relatives and the U.S. Cuban community said the 6-year-old refugee should remain in Florida rather than be returned to his father in Cuba. They said that American democracy would benefit the boy more than life in Fidel Castro's communist Cuba.

A dramatic raid by armed federal agents on April 22,2000, ended the standoff, and the boy was reunited with his father.

The influential Cuban-American community lost a good deal of public sympathy by pitting political ideology against familial bonds. For Castro, it was a publicity bonanza, emphasizing the intransigence of the official U.S. policy toward Cuba, which has imposed a 38-year-old trade embargo and other cold war-era sanctions.

THURSDAY Camera Day

Camera Day is best celebrated with pictures. Though the origin of the holiday is unclear, many people come to appreciate the convenience of the modern camera.

The first photograph was made in 1826 by Paris inventor Joseph Nicéphore Niépce.

Inventor George Eastman, founder of Eastman Kodak Co., introduced the first portable camera to America in 1888.

Today, companies have expanded camera accessibility through cell-phone cameras, digital cameras and disposable cameras.

FRIDAY 1936: 'Gone with the Wind' publishes

Margaret Mitchell's only novel, "Gone with the Wind," was published June 30, 1936. The book then became one of the best-selling novels of all time, selling more than 25 million copies. The book sold 1 million copies within six months, with as many as 50,000 copies being bought on a single day.

Mitchell spent 10 years writing and researching the antebellum South and the Civil War in order to produce "Gone with the Wind." The book was made into an Oscar-winning movie in 1939.

She never tried writing a sequel to the book, but in 1988 her estate sold sequel rights to Warner Books for nearly $5 million. The sequel, "Scarlett," by Alexandra Ripley, was published in 1991 and topped the bestseller list, despite a chilly response from critics.

SATURDAY 1968: 61 countries sign treaty, limit development of nuclear weapons

The United States, Britain, the former Soviet Union and 58 other nations signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty on July 1, 1968. The treaty, geared to limit the spread of nuclear weapons, is signed in 188 sovereign states today. Three of the eight international nuclear power countries — North Korea, India and Pakistan — are not signed to the treaty.

SUNDAY 1937: Pilot Earhart, Noonan are missing

EARHART

On July 2, 1937, the Lockheed aircraft carrying American aviator Amelia Earhart and navigator Frederick Noonan was reported missing near Howland Island in the Pacific. The pair was attempting to fly around the world when they lost their bearings during the most challenging leg of the global journey: Lae, New Guinea, to Howland Island, a tiny island 2,227 nautical miles away, in the center of the Pacific Ocean. The U.S. Coast Guard cutter Itasca was in sporadic radio contact with Earhart as she approached Howland Island and received messages that she was lost and running low on fuel. No trace of Earhart or Noonan was ever found.

Earhart was born in Atchison, Kan., in 1897. She took up aviation at the age of 24, and she was the first woman to fly across the Atlantic Ocean.

MONDAY World UFO Day

On July 2, 1947, Mac Brazel, a rancher northwest of Roswell, N.M., discovered wreckage of a metallic object on his ranch. He said the wreckage and the metal it was made of was "strange."

Brazel contacted military authorities, who investigated the site and removed the wreckage. This was the first military report that referenced a mysterious Unidentified Flying Object — UFO.

To commemorate the event, July 2 is the official World UFO Day. The report was later rescinded, leading to wide speculation and claims of a government cover-up of the discovery of UFOs from outer space.

TUESDAY 1776: The U.S. declares independence from Great Britain

New England had been fighting for independence from the Kingdom of Great Britain since 1775. The U.S. Congress voted unanimously, July 4th, 1776, for adoption of the Declaration of Independence of the 13 colonies. The flag, pictured at the right, was also adopted as the official flag of the United States at the same time.

New law allows take-home wine

By Jamie Smidt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wine connoisseurs and the restaurants that cater to them might have reason to celebrate this week.

Effective July 1, a new Kansas law will allow restaurant patrons to carry home unfinished bottles of wine in special, tamper-proof bags.

Dennis Carpenter, president and CEO of the Kansas Restaurant and Hospitality Association, said this law will encourage people to drink in moderation.

"If a bottle is purchased in a restaurant, the restaurant can cork it, place it in the bag with the sale's ticket, and the state will not consider the bottle to be an open container," Carpenter said.

More than 30 other states have similar laws, and the issue was not opposed by Kansas state legislature, Carpenter said.

Dubbed "wine doggy bags," the bags themselves come in various sizes and can be printed with the restaurant's logo. They can be sealed only once, and they include handles, making them easy to transport.

Scott Benjamin, co-owner of Manhattan restaurant Four Olives Wine Bar, 3033 Anderson Ave., said he is excited about the potential business opportunities the law presents to his restaurant.

"We have an extensive e-mail database that we use to keep customers updated on news, and we notified everyone about this new law and have received positive responses," Benjamin said.

In the past, patrons have asked to take bottles home, especially those from other states that might have similar laws, so there is a demand for this type of service, Benjamin said.

Restaurants are responsible for providing the bags to the customers, and at Four Olives the bags will not raise the prices of the wine bottles.

"The cost of the bags is nominal, about 30 to 40 cents each, and we consider it a service," Benjamin said.

Benjamin considers the law something that was long overdue.

"It's just like the food. If you get full, you can box it up and take home," he said. "Now, you can do the same with the wine."

K-State alum to chair Kansas Board of Regents

Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State alum has been named chair of the Kansas Board of Regents.

Nelson Galle was elected for the one-year appointment by a nine-member committee Thursday, June 22. Last year he was vice chair of the board.

Galle was appointed to the Board by Gov. Kathleen Sebelius in 2003 and chairs the board's Fiscal Affairs and Audit Committee.

He is a 1958 graduate from K-State with a bachelor's degree in agricultural education. He received his master's degree in 1964 in adult and occupational education. He also has a graduate degree from Harvard Business School.

He is retired from agribusiness, where he was vice president of administration at the farm machinery manufacturer Hesston Corporation. He also taught vocational agriculture at Goessel Rural High School, according to the board's Web site.

Galle and his wife, Marilyn, owned and operated Central Kansas Hatchery in Moundridge, Kan., where they hatched 4 million baby turkeys a year, before they retired and moved to Manhattan in 1999.

They have three sons, Russell, Randall and Ronald – all K-State alumni – and six grandchildren.

Christine Downey-Schmidt, Inman, Kan., was elected vice chair.

People should practice caution while shooting fireworks

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While there are events ranging from a children's tricycle race to a watermelon feed and a fireworks display for the Fourth of July this year, many people plan to set off their own firecrackers and police and firefighters advise safety precautions.

Dean Thibault, market president of Landmark Bank, 701 Poyntz Ave., has helped plan the day of public events.

"There will be a lot of things for the family," Thibault said. "There will be quite a lot of fun things to do."

While some people will attend scheduled firework shows, many others plan to set off their own.

Riley County Police Department Captain John Doehling said although officers will be making normal patrols on the Fourth, they will not tolerate the use of illegal fireworks.

"We will confiscate illegal fireworks," he said. "This time of year we get a lot of calls about people throwing fireworks at cars or passers-by, too."

Doehling said he would advise people who are setting off firecrackers to do it on private property.

Doehling said the best place to set off firecrackers is on a hard, flat surface.

Manhattan Fire Marshall Jim McDiffett said it's important to make sure people are using age-appropriate firecrackers and to always make sure children have adult supervision.

"Sparklers are the number one cause of injury," he said. "And people need to stop throwing firecrackers. They should just light them, lay them down and walk away."

McDiffett said one of his main concerns this year is making sure people remain safe while using potentially dangerous fireworks.

"All it takes is one firecracker to go off in the wrong place," he said.

McDiffett also suggested those setting off fireworks should keep a bucket of water nearby, as it is the best way to extinguish firecrackers, he said.

"The last few years, we've been really lucky and had very minimal calls about firecracker accidents," he said.

TO THE POINT

Turnover decisions hurt court

The Kansas death penalty was, once again, reinstated when new Justice Samuel Alito broke the stalemate in a recent Supreme Court ruling, 5-4.

To the point is selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Kansas has experienced a few turnover decisions, especially in recent years, on capital punishment since it was first instated in 1859.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 1976 that capital punishment alone isn't unconstitutional if certain procedures are followed. However, according to the Kansas Supreme Court ruling in 2004, the death penalty was unconstitutional and termed as cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. Yet, the high court just barely managed to override Kansas' interpretation of the law.

The fact that the justices were not unanimous in their decision begs the question of the constitutionality of the severity of future criminals' sentences. This also gives victims and criminals alike a blurred view of what a just and fair ruling should be.

The dissension in recent years on the constitutionality and the exact nature of the death penalty merely makes the court seem as if it's gambling with the severity of criminals' sentences.

Income gap benefits few, deprives too many

ZACHARY T. ECKELS

Most of the time in politics, no matter how much I disagree, I am still able to see the other side's point. Even the most horrible ideas that our government has produced usually have good intentions behind them. However, when it comes to the greed of the GOP, I have nothing but contempt.

The gap between rich and poor has been consistently rising in our country, and, according to Reuters, chief executive officers (CEOs) are earning 262 times more than the average worker they employ.

The study was completed from a non-profit think tank last week. It showed that, while the average worker earns slightly less than $42,000 a year, the average CEO earns nearly $11 million.

Why the hell does anyone need to earn that much money? There is not one excuse in the world for people to be starving in the streets, while a small percentage of our population wipes their asses with $100 bills.

Personally, I see no reason the highest-paid employee needs to earn more than three times as much as the lowest. I realize that for most people, treating our citizens equally is too outrageous. I can only pray that three times the amount of the average employee seems more appropriate than 262 for most people reading this column.

Sadly, the day these findings were released, Republicans in the Senate voted down what would have been the first minimum-wage increase since 1997. Which, at the end of this year, will be the longest minimum wage has gone without an increase.

Factoring inflation into the mix, many hard-working people are being pushed further and further into poverty. Those who suffer the most are single women with children.

As if raising children isn't a hard enough task in any society, ours now requires them to leave their homes to find work. Many have to rely on public transportation that keeps them out of the home for even longer periods of time.

No matter what route was taken to end up in such a situation, no one deserves to suffer so much for so little. Denying them the proposed wage change, which would have increased the minimum wage to $7.15 per hour, is one of the most selfish, cold-hearted and atrocious crimes our government has committed in recent years. Well, at least against its own citizens.

What's even more upsetting to me is that our own two Senators from Kansas helped to crush the measure. Sam Brownback and Pat Roberts were among the Republicans who voted to keep money out of the pockets of those who need it most.

I suppose spending so much time with the fat cats in Washington, D.C., could turn just about anyone to greed.

It is our duty as Americans to make sure these two politicians don't forget about the hardworking men and women they left behind. We need to make sure they don't forget the people who voted for them. We have to live paycheck to paycheck. It's our duty to make sure they know just how hard some people have it in our society.

Local stores meet needs for students' pet fix

LOLA SHRIMPLIN

Romeo is dead. So is Baby, and I'm devastated.

For those not in the know, Romeo was the white cat at On The Wildside, 1128 Moro St. He was there so long, and had such a huge fan base, that the owners hung up a sign when he died with his picture on it, much the same as Hobbes' picture hangs on the wall at the Grand Ol' Trunk, 1304 Pillsbury Drive.

Baby replaced Hobbes, but she recently died of kidney failure, so Grand Ol' Trunk is left a desolate place.

On The Wildside recently got Diva, a tripod cat who rules the store with an iron paw. I regularly go into the store for a Diva fix, just to see her lying in a case on top of the jewelry or watching the baby who visits.

I can't have a cat at this point.

My apartment is no-pets-allowed, so I have to get my fix at stores around town, and, while I would love a kitten, I'm not prepared or well-off enough to make sure it would be cared for adequately.

So, I go to The Dusty Bookshelf, 700 N. Manhattan Ave., and pet Cleo and Maxine, or to the Atomic Age, 406 Poyntz Ave., and visit the blind cat there. There also are cats at Rockstar and Rogers, 715 N. 12th St.

I always had cats when I was growing up. My first memory is of Humphrey dying of distemper when I was very little.

Then came Fat Cat. He "got into the house by accident," my brother and I told my mother, who is not a fan of cats.

My cat, whose other name was Lola's Cat, stayed with me from

Illustration by Christina Forsberg | COLLEGIAN

Hays, Kan., to Manhattan, and finally had to move to stay with my parents when I couldn't keep her anymore.

I understand the urge to have a pet.

Many people grow up with them and want them when they're out on their own.

But a cat or a dog is a living creature, a huge responsibility.

It has feelings, opinions, likes and dislikes.

Puppies grow up to be dogs, and kittens grow up to be cats.

They require care and love, and just because you're tired or have to study doesn't mean the dog can forego going outside to walk.

College students love pets. This creates a problem because college students by nature are very mobile. Very few stay in the same apartment for four or more years, and eventually Fluffy or Fido has no place to go when the new place doesn't allow pets.

But many students don't think about this when that kitten or puppy is looking all cute, lovable and just begging to be taken home.

So the kitten who was so cute and lovable ends up on the street, where they are ill-prepared to survive.

The puppy who was just a tiny bundle of fluff grows up into a large dog who doesn't receive the exercise it requires, chews the carpet or the computer, and gets taken to the pound, where it stands little chance of being adopted.

So I visit Diva, Cleo or Maxine, who are well cared for, and are more well known than the owners of the stores they live in.

I watch the cats run around Rockstar and Rogers, and I avoid the animal shelter like the plague; I couldn't stand not taking all of them home with me.

Until I get a cat, when I am able to care for it like it deserves, I'll content myself with watching Diva meow at me as I walk by or seeing the small children swarming Cleo.

Program geared to teach girls about science

By Mary Bershenyi
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The ninth and 10th grade girls participating in the fifth annual EXCITE! summer workshop learned a lot about hand mixers Monday, but it had nothing to do with baking.

In the Hemisphere Room of Hale Library, 50 girls took apart and put back together the motors in hand mixers. They learned how to use an electric charge to make wires jump and got to know other students from across the state. EXCITE! – Exploring Science, Technology and Engineering – was sponsored by the K-State chapter of Women in Engineering and Science Program (WESP).

Since the program's inception 10 years ago, making EXCITE! a reality was not easy, Chris Sorenson, professor of physics, said.

He said he, along with Mohammad Hosni, department head of mechanical and nuclear engineering, worried that young people were not learning the kinetic aspects of science and their education and future talent for science may be compromised.

"These kids grow up with a mouse in their hand," Sorenson said. "It is beyond the cerebral aspects; what makes me a good scientist is that I am good with my hands."

When the program first started, the professors spoke with area shop teachers who believed in the idea, but pointed out a problem. Shop classes did not attract students in the top academic third of classes – the audience the EXCITE! program intends to target. Hosni and Sorenson also could not fund the program, so it was put on the back burner, Sorenson said.

Five years later, the program was reinstituted and organized by WESP.

"The first year we had 14 girls and one (subject) track," Susan Arnold Christian, WESP outreach coordinator, said. "This year there are 50 and seven tracks. It used to be just a summer program but now it is year-round. It has grown immensely."

The purpose of the program was to give girls a chance to see that there are opportunities in the science field for them, despite stereotypes of being the only girl in their advanced-level science classes at their high schools, Christian said.

"It starts opening eyes to pursuing a career in science and engineering," she said. "Many girls in Kansas don't have opportunity for a single-gender program. This is an opportunity for them to make friendships...it is less intimidating."

In addition to the 50 participants, the program also taught a lot to their undergraduate escorts, either engineering, science or education majors.

"I didn't know this program existed in high school," Kaley Morris, sophomore in biology, said. "But, I have learned a lot. Especially about engineering."

Morris said she became involved because of her membership to WESP. She responded to an e-mail sent out over the group's Listserv asking for volunteers.

"I did it because I thought it was a great opportunity to get involved," she said. "I wanted to meet other girls at K-State in my field."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

READERS BENEFIT YOUTH AT JARDINE

Dear Editor,

If you have driven anywhere in the vicinity of Jardine Drive and Denison Avenue in the last three months, you are probably aware of the redevelopment project that is taking place at the Jardine Apartment Complex.

What you may not know is that there are still residents, many of them children, living within the on-campus apartment community here at K-State.

Each year, the staff of the apartment complex puts together the Summer Reading Program, which includes an opportunity for the children to read for prizes, participate in activities and hear special stories read by guest readers. Even though we are just two weeks into the program, we have benefited from two sets of wonderful readers.

I would like to take the opportunity to publicly thank men's basketball coach Bob Huggins and basketball players Akeem Wright and David Hoskins, as well as Becky, James and Willie the Wildcat from the cheer squad for taking the time to travel over to the Frith Community Center to read to our children. I wish each member of the K-State family could have been with us to see how well Willie acted out his story and how much the kids enjoyed the book Akeem and David chose to read.

We are privileged to have the gift of their time, and thankful beyond words for their investment in our community.

IMMIGRATION PLAN NEEDS WORK

Dear Editor,

Our immigration policy has backed us into a corner. We have 12 million people who are illegal, but their departure would result in hardship and instability.

As Americans consider the solution, we must first appreciate the source of the problem. While a nation's success can't be measured by the scales of immigration, it is an indicator of the weight of its virtuous foundation. The freedom, liberty and the resulting prosperity sought by immigrants, is a testimony to the supremacy of our democratic principles. A country that recognizes the God-bestowed "unalienable rights" of all people is coveted by those trapped in a government ignorant of that truth.

Here the irony begins. The very principle that draws illegal immigrants into our country becomes the basis for holding them accountable and the justification for keeping them out. America is founded upon the rule of law – tradition, experience and decree based upon the objective truth of the moral law. This legal ordering not only pre-exists, but transcends government and applies to all found within its borders. It is not subjective, and therefore, it cannot be applied or complied with selectively.

But it is here that we must not mistake irony for a catch-22. Our immigration problem is not a contradiction requiring an impossible course of action.

The options are not self-defeating, leaving only the harsh alternative of arrest and deportation.

Our country is at war with an enemy that has demonstrated the ability to breach our borders and kill our citizens. Our borders must be sealed and immigrants must be required to enter legally.

Additionally, immigrants must show respect for our traditions, laws and customs. It is the uniqueness of American government and culture that has led to our success both within and without our borders.

Finally, those promoting the rights of illegal immigrants must start addressing the cause of illegal immigration from the border. Until the corruption is confronted, the draw of democracy will continue to overtake the law protecting it.

Fireworks colors represent chemicals

By Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The fireworks that will shine over Manhattan on July 4 have become a tradition on Independence Day, and could be a chemistry lesson for those wanting to know how they work.

In a 2004 K-State Media Relations and Marketing press release, Kenneth Klabunde, distinguished professor of chemistry, said fireworks explode at the molecular level and most metals react with oxygen.

The bright light fireworks give off is magnesium, Klabunde told Media Relations.

"The electrons in the metal become hot and excited, and when they fall back into their ground state, they give off light called photons," he said.

The bang fireworks make is gunpowder, Klabunde said.

For rockets, explosives are needed with a mixture of chemicals. It's a mixture of a gun powder-like substance, Klabunde told Media Relations.

"The reason it has such force is that it creates gases when it explodes, so it pushes things away with great intensity," he said. "Then there's a charge that's timed so that the propelling takes a certain amount of time to get a certain altitude."

The colors of fireworks are formed by a combination of metals:

- Red - Strontium and lithium
- Orange - Calcium
- Gold - Incandescence of iron, charcoal or lampblack
- Yellow - Sodium
- Electric White - Magnesium or aluminum
- Green - Barium plus a chlorine producer
- Blue - Copper plus a chlorine producer
- Purple - Strontium plus copper
- Silver - Aluminum, titanium or magnesium powder or flakes

Explosives cause fear in some animals

By Megan Crane
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As the Fourth of July draws near, pet owners may start asking how to calm anxious pets.

With the noise, light and smell associated with fireworks, many pets become stressed. But there are ways of fighting the uneasiness.

People should keep their pets indoors, said Dr. Deborah Diehl-Nelson, owner of Blue Hills Animal Hospital, 2313 Tuttle Creek Blvd.

"People usually start calling as soon as they start selling fireworks," she said. "Certainly a number of dogs are phobic to the sound of fireworks and there are several different techniques for coping."

Diehl-Nelson said bringing pets indoors and providing a quiet place where they can feel safe is a good idea. Some pets may require medications such as tranquilizers or mild sedatives.

Dog owners aren't the only people with pets affected by firework anxiety.

"Sometimes cats can be just as panicked," Diehl-Nelson said. "They hide and get into small dark spaces. I encourage anyone that lets cats outdoors to not do that during the fireworks timeframe."

In a K-State Media Relations and Marketing press release, Dr. William Fortney, assistant professor of diagnostic medicine/pathobiology, said a dog's fears can be lessened if the owner just takes the time to overcome the problem.

Those who have noticed signs of anxiety because of fireworks should contact their local veterinarian to learn more about making it an enjoyable time for all members of the family.

JUDGE ON TRIAL FOR MULTIPLE COUNTS OF INDECENT EXPOSURE

BRISTOW, Okla. – A former Oklahoma judge is on trial on the charge of four counts of indent exposure. Donald Thompson, former Creek County district judge, has been accused of masturbating during trials using a sexual device known as a "penis pump."

Thompson's defense lawyer said the local police wanted to "take the judge out" because of unfavorable rulings against them.

UNEMPLOYMENT CLAIMS ON THE RISE

WASHINGTON, D.C. – The number of Americans filing claims for unemployment benefits rose by the largest amount in the past month, suggesting the slowing economy is beginning to show up in a weak employment market.

The Labor Department reported that 308,000 people filed for jobless benefits in the third week of June, a bigger-than-expected increase of 11,000 from the first week.

FRAUD TRIAL SET FOR JACKSON ACCUSER'S MOTHER

LOS ANGELES – The woman who claimed Michael Jackson molested her son, leading to the sensational trial a year ago, at which the singer was acquitted, was ordered to stand trial on a charge of welfare fraud. She entered a not -guilty plea.

The woman is accused of one charge related to accepting $8,000 in fraudulently-obtained assistance and four charges of committing perjury on welfare applications.

MAN CHARGED IN 13TH KANSAS CITY KILLING

KANSAS CITY, Mo. – A former trash company supervisor accused of strangling a dozen women over two decades was charged last week in a 13th killing.

Lorenzo J. Gilyard, 55, was already charged with killing 11 prostitutes and another woman between 1977 and 1993. He was arrested in 2004 after the city's crime lab began DNA testing of evidence in its cold-case files.

The new murder charge involves a 26-year-old Austrian who was killed in February 1989. She was found dead on a street with a paper towel in her mouth and strangulation marks on her neck.

BURGER SELLS FOR $100

BOCA RATON, Fla. – A hundred bucks might buy more than six dozen burgers from McDonald's, but Boca Raton Mayor Steven Abrams could barely speak between bites as he devoured the 20-ounce, $100 hamburger marked as the "beluga caviar of sandwiches."

The burger debuted last week at the restaurant in the Boca Raton Resort and Club.

"We've never had a hamburger on our menu here so we really wanted to go to the extreme," the restaurant owner said, calling it "the most decadent burger in the world."

At about 5 1/2 inches across and 2 1/2 inches thick, the burger was made of beef from three continents – American prime beef, Japanese Kobe and Argentine cattle.

Summer finals approaching

By Mary Bershenyi
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With many of the summer semester's six-week courses ending this week, students are preparing for another round of finals.

These, however, are different than the fall and spring semester examinations.

The summer semester does not have a finals week built into its course schedule.

Students will take their last unit or cumulative exam during the final class period at the regular time and place, according the Registrar's Office Academic Policy.

The major difference between the summer and other semesters is scheduling, Gunille DeVault, associate registrar, said.

"It is different compared to fall and spring; your exams aren't necessarily given during your class times (in the fall and spring)," DeVault said.

During the regular semesters, if students had more than two exams in a 24-hour period, they could have one rescheduled.

However, use of this policy is very limited during the summer due to the limited range of classes.

"You can have two exams back to back," DeVault said.

"Students who have three (can reschedule), but it isn't likely because it isn't how the courses are set up during the summer," DeVault said. "You don't necessarily have three classes on the same Monday, Wednesday, Friday schedule."

Hale Library is not doing anything special to prepare for exam weeks in the summer, Tara Coleman, science librarian, said.

"We're not doing anything special for finals week during the summer, but it is something to think about for next year," Coleman said.

Hale will maintain its regular schedule. It is open 8 a.m. to midnight Monday through Thursday; 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Friday; noon to 4 p.m. Saturday; 1 p.m. to midnight Sunday. The library does this rather than going to a 24-hour schedule like during spring and fall finals weeks.

Student preparation for summer classes is different as well.

"I'm doing a lot more studying in a shorter amount of time," said Laura Noll, sophomore in mass communications. "Because the way it's set up, it is a lot more work. I'm studying a lot harder."

Noll said the final exam for her first six-week course was on Thursday, July 29, and her next summer course will begin July 3.

Gallagher to become interim dean

By Kristen Roderick
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The College of Engineering will have a new interim dean July 1.

GALLAGHER

K-State provost Duane Nellis selected Richard Gallagher, associate dean for academics and administration, as interim dean in the College of Engineering.

Gallagher was one of four finalists for the position.

"He set a wealth of experience as associate dean," Nellis said. "He provides an easy transition to this position."

Gallagher will succeed Terry King, who is a provost at Ball State University in Muncie, Ind.

"He'll continue to build on the strong legacy that Terry King leaves behind," Nellis said.

Gallagher has been the associate dean for academics and administration in the College of Engineering since 1997.

Gallagher will not run for the permanent position, so Nellis said he will finalize the search committee soon.

Even so, Nellis said he is glad Gallagher is taking the role of interim dean.

"I feel very pleased that we have the quality of Gallagher to step in at this time," he said.

ROCK | Bands offer alternative

together in its current lineup just a few months back," Higgins said.

The show closed with Pineapple Truck, a hard-rock band that incorporated a tenor sax into its sound. A stark contrast to the Ruckus' light-hearted ska, Pineapple Truck's brand of progressive, funk-influenced rock hit much harder.

Brad Lutz, senior in electrical engineering, said he enjoyed the concert.

"A lot of my friends wanted to go out to Stampede, but since I'm not much of a country guy, I'm glad 91.9 put on this show," he said. "I hope they do it again next year."

Drew Bartlett, Wildcat 91.9 underwriting director, said he was pleased with the results of this year's concert.

"The bands were really pleased with the turnout and Bobby T's was happy to have us," he said.

RCPD to have camp

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Middle schoolers may have a date with the Riley County Police Department on July 17-20.

The second-annual Junior Police Academy Summer Camp will be at Pottorf Hall in CiCo Park from 9 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. each day. It is available for children who will be enrolled in the 7th to 9th grades this fall.

Students this age are going through a big transition, RCPD Officer Brian London said.

The camp allows officers to teach students what is right while they are going through changes in middle school. It is also to prove that the police aren't their enemies, London said.

"This is front-end policing," he said.

About 20 officers will cover topics like traffic enforcement, crime scene investigation, special weapons and tactics team demonstrations and team-building exercises.

The team-building exercises will teach students the ability to work with people, London said.

Space is limited to 30 people. For more information, call Brian London at 537-2112.

STAMPEDE | Weekend attracts variety of participants, vendors

Park for the show, the people and the party atmosphere.

Some attendants and vendors have been coming every year since Country Stampede's beginning. Others have traveled long distances, just for the experience.

Lucy Hummel, resident of Fairbury, Neb., and friend Linda Rogers, resident of Lincoln, Neb., came for their third year of Country Stampede.

They were decked out in T-shirts cut and tied with decorative beads around the sleeves and bottoms. The two women also wore hats with homemade crafts they'd created to get ready for Stampede.

"I'm making another T-shirt for when I come tomorrow," said Hummel, "I'm almost done with it."

Hummel and Rogers preferred VIP seating and staying in a motel for rest between the days' events.

"I only slept from 3:30 a.m. to 6 a.m.," said Hummel.

Brothers Tony and Sean Paigo, and their cousin Jay Paigo, brought their business, Wanted Man Western Wear, on a 22-hour journey from Saratoga, N.Y.

The Paigos sold hats, signs, shirts, purses, wallets, belt buckles and other western wear in their business tent, which was set up east of the main stage.

Other vendors lined the north and south sides of the stage with refreshments, trinkets, Country Stampede merchandise and other entertainment and conveniences for attendants.

Aside from things people could purchase at the different vendors, many, including Janice Pontious, said that the musicians are the feature of Stampede she enjoyed most. Artists like Toby Keith, Gretchen Wilson, Brad Paisley and Terri Clark were some of those featured in this year's Country Stampede entertainment line-up.

"Our favorite performance was by Toby Keith," Janice Pontious said.

The Pontious sisters have family members deployed in Iraq, a reality some other Stampede attendants also shared, especially with Manhattan being close to Fort Riley.

"Toby Keith was the very best," said Jay Paigo. "He was very supportive of the troops. He's very patriotic, and he really got the crowd into it."

Stampede portable restrooms lack toilet paper, hand sanitizer

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Country Stampede attendees wait their turns to use a portable restroom Friday afternoon, June 23, at Tuttle Creek State Park. About 90 portable restrooms were rented and were staffed throughout the event.

By Heidi Paulson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Concert goers were greeted by numerous smells and scarce toilet paper at Country Stampede's portable restrooms.

"There's no toilet paper, the seat is wet, the floor is wet and there's brown stuff on the floor," said Lenora Watkins, resident of Branson, Mo. "Not sure what it is – could be feces, could be dirt. I didn't get close enough to look."

Watkins said more attendants could have been helpful.

"They need an attendant here with toilet paper when it is this busy," she said.

Larry Mather, president of Mather Flare Rental Inc., said Stampede planners rented about 90 portable restrooms through his company. Mather said eight people were staffed to service the portable restrooms three to four times a day.

"We had four pumper trucks on site," Mather said. "We serviced the portable restrooms at the high point of the concerts."

Several supervisors said they saw the pump trucks servicing the restrooms at least twice a day. One employee said there's only so much waste a pump truck can carry.

Sarah Manuel, a K-State alum, said there are a few precautions she takes when attending Stampede.

"I just bring my own toilet paper and hand sanitizer," Manuel said. "Small packages of tissues are the easiest to carry around."

One attendee said the lack of toilet paper is best attributed to intoxicated concert goers.

"There's never toilet paper. I guess that's what happens when a bunch of drunk cowboys use the same porta-potties all weekend," said Megan Valeo, a soldier stationed at Fort Riley. "More facilities would be better, and maybe placed in different areas. The latrines in Iraq are better than this."

Kaleb Little, sophomore in general agriculture, said he's sure Stampede officials did all they could. "There's only so much they can do when faced with serving 150,000 people's needs," he said.

Little said people just need to exercise a little bit more self-control and not abuse the facilities provided.

"Last night there was toilet paper and stuff coming up higher than the seat," Little said.

The Stampede office was unavailable for comment.

Tips to make your summertime food, party a success

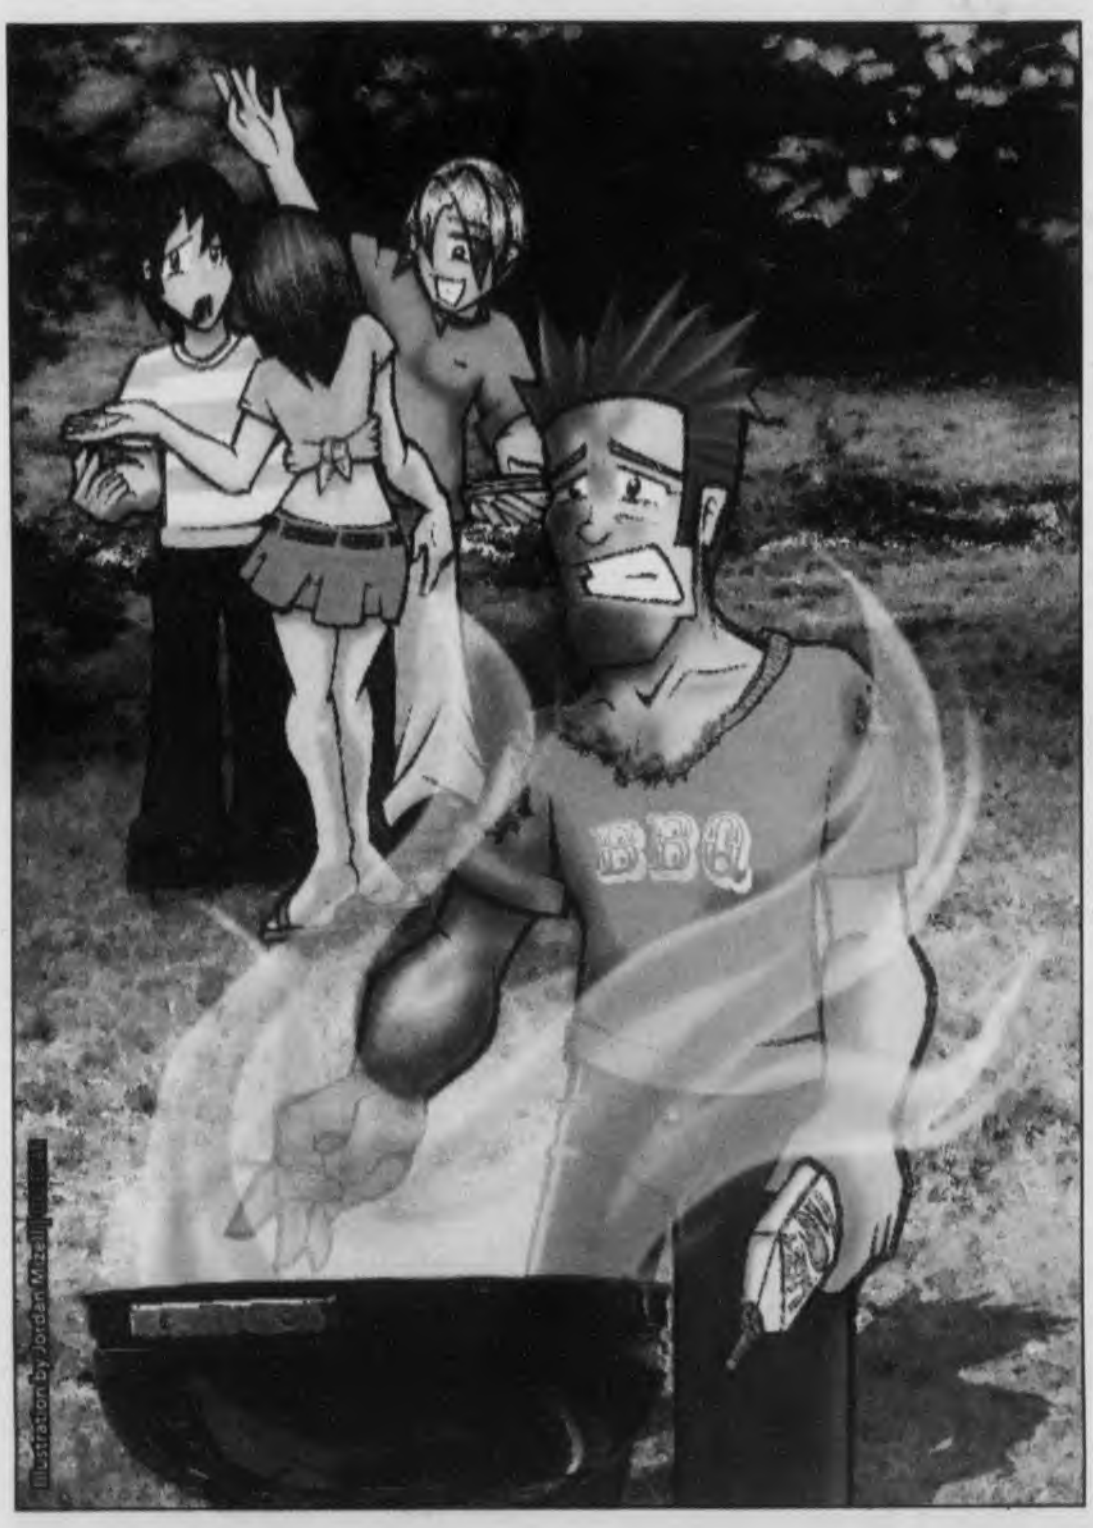

Illustration by Jordan Mizell

ALEX PEAK

Since the summer tends to be more relaxing than the school year, many people have more time to throw parties or get together with friends. If you are planning to throw a barbeque on a weekend or for the Fourth of July, here are a few tips to make sure your barbeque is lots of fun.

There are a few must-haves in order to throw a successful barbeque.

First, you should have a variety of different tastes for your meal spread. Aside from the usual baked beans, potato salad, hamburgers, hot dogs, chips and dips, include a variety of sliced fruit and vegetables with dips, some hummus and pita bread, deviled eggs and pasta salads. You could also offer sandwich meat, cheese and small buns or tortilla wraps for guests to make little sandwiches or roll-ups.

Drinks are also an important aspect of good dinner parties. For those of age, try to be creative with your boozing. Mix up some Sangria or make summer beer to give guests a break from the usual drinks. For those who aren't drinking alcohol, have the regular Sprite, Coke and Dr. Pepper line up, but also offer a mixed fruity drink like a raspberry fizzler.

For guests with a sweet tooth, dessert is an important part of the meal. Blend vanilla ice cream with Hershey's chocolate syrup and toss in a few Oreo cookies for texture to make milkshakes that your guests will love. While homemade brownies and cookies are always winners with crowds, try making cheesecake cups.

Once you have the food portion of your party settled, you can concentrate on other areas like entertainment. If you or a guest has an iPod, try hooking it up to speakers and creating a playlist with a mix of different music to play throughout your party.

You could also set up a slip and slide, a beer pong table or, using plenty of caution, play drunken Red Rover.

If your party is on the Fourth of July, supply firecrackers and encourage guests to bring their own – just stay within the city's permit laws.

You can buy paper plates, cups, silverware and napkins that match or are red, white and blue (if it's the Fourth of July). As long as your guests are well fed, they will have a great time.

4 FUN BBQ Recipies

SUMMER BEER

1 can of frozen lemonade concentrate
12 oz of water
1 can (12 oz) of beer
12 oz of vodka

Pour lemonade concentrate in a gallon pitcher. Measure water and vodka in the 12 oz lemonade can and add to the pitcher. Pour in the beer, mix well and serve over ice.

TERIYAKI MARINADE

1 cup orange juice
1 cup soy sauce
1 cup sugar
garlic powder to taste

Mix ingredients together. Soak steak for at least one hour and then grill. Chicken can be cooked right in the mixture in the oven. (You can use chicken leg quarters.) Bake them at 350 degrees for 1 hour.

ALOHA MARINADE

1/2 cup soy sauce
1/4 cup water
1 Tbsp. brown sugar
2 green onions, chopped
1 tsp. ground ginger
1/4 tsp. garlic salt
1/2 tsp. ground black pepper

Combine ingredients. Marinade chicken for 4 hours or overnight. Grill until done. To use for basting, add 1/4 cup oil to marinade

CHEESECAKE CUPS

16 vanilla wafer cookies
2 (8 oz) packages of cream cheese, softened
3/4 cup white sugar
2 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla extract

Preheat oven to 350 degrees Fahrenheit. Line muffin pans with cupcake papers. Place one wafer cookie in the bottom of each cupcake paper. In a medium bowl, mix together cream cheese and sugar. Mix in eggs and vanilla until smooth. Pour over wafer in cupcake papers. Bake in oven 15 minutes.

The Devil Wears Prada

Grade: B-

Movie review by Eileen Laux

The life of an assistant can be hell.

Based on the best-selling novel by Lauren Weisberger, "The Devil Wears Prada," features a small-town girl, Andrea "Andie" Sachs (Anne Hathaway), who tries to make her dreams come true by writing for the New Yorker. But, before her dreams become a reality, the Northwestern University grad must climb her way up the ladder and land a job as an assistant to Runway editor in chief Miranda Priestly (Meryl Streep).

Priestly has a reputation for being difficult, to say the least. "Work a year for Miranda and you can work at any magazine you want... This is a job that a million girls would kill for." Thus ensues months of getting coffee, memorizing names and guessing what her boss truly wants.

The film doesn't follow the book exactly, but that was to be expected.

Streep shines as Priestly with every icy glance she shoots Andie's way. Some have said Hathaway steals some of the scenes, but Streep dominates every scene she is in and commands that everyone pays attention to her.

Tucci also is a likeable character, and his humor jumps off the screen and into the audience.

I read the book just before I saw the movie, and I was somewhat skeptical if sweet little Hathaway could pull off such a headstrong, independent Andie Sachs. But she did a nice job, and, as the movie ended, I found myself pulling for Andie.

Weisberger's book portrayed Miranda as a cold, demanding ice queen. The movie conveys this, but it shows her human side and what she had to sacrifice to get to where she is. The book was based on Vogue editor in chief Anna Wintour, which just goes to show that these assistants' horror stories may not be as fictional as we all thought.

The film as a whole was great. I had very low expectations because the book was phenomenal, and I thought that would be difficult to capture on film. However, any movie with Streep is usually excellent. The chemistry between assistant and boss develops and makes the audience think just how much they would put up with or sacrifice in order to get ahead.

Summer hair gets swept away

Today's leading ladies are doing the hair sweep with grace and style, turning this formerly tacky 'do into the hippest flip. For a successful hair sweep, after you wash and condition your hair, blow-dry it in the desired direction. Mist your part with hairspray or gel to keep it in place and then wrap-set your hair with a scarf until you're ready to unveil your new 'do.

Kidman and Urban tie the knot

Nicole Kidman has officially beaten Tom Cruise back to the altar. The "Bewitched" star married country crooner Keith Urban on Sunday, June 25, at a cliff top Catholic chapel overlooking the harbor near her family's home in Sydney, Australia.

Helicopters buzzed overhead and paparazzi thronged outside the gates to the private estate, playing host to the nuptials, hoping to catch a glimpse of the bride and groom.

As church bells signaled the end of the vow-swapping, the newlyweds and their 230 guests celebrated at a reception held under a towering white marquee, decorated with thousands of pink and white roses.

Rather than bringing gifts, wedding attendees were asked to donate to several charities earmarked by the happy couple.

Supermodel sued for assault

Yet another one of Naomi Campbell's maids is suing the supermodel for assault after claiming Campbell hit her in January when she couldn't find a specific pair of jeans.

The latest suit comes as Campbell is due in court next Tuesday to face charges that she hit a different maid in the head with a cell phone for a similar reason: a missing pair of jeans.

Serena-Maneesh, "Serena-Maneesh"

This eponymous debut is an extremely confident recording and an excellent introduction to Norway's Serena-Maneesh. The band liberally employs noise, distortion and feedback to their heady mixture of atmospherics, competent musicianship and musical ferocity without sacrificing accessibility. Within the album's narcotic haze, Serena-Maneesh possibly has crafted the perfect make-out record.

Rating: A-

Figurines, "Skeleton"

The sophomore album from Denmark's Figurines has garnered comparisons to such indie-rock bands as Built to Spill and Modest Mouse, mostly due to front man Christian Hjelm's vocal idiosyncrasies.

But to write this band off as derivative would be unfair and would ignore the fact that, throughout the entirety of "Skeleton,"

Eagles of Death Metal, "Death by Sexy"

The sophomore album from the dynamic duo consisting of Queens of the Stone Age frontman, Josh Homme, and his falsetto-singing friend, Jesse Hughes, is full of clever lyrics and sexy swagger that is an enticing guilty pleasure — with the emphasis on pleasure.

With lyrics like, "You're doing things that make my flesh burn hot," and, "I touch you there because I know the spot," (from "I Got a Feeling") these boys have created the perfect record to soundtrack your nights of doing the nasty.

Professor fails to have evidence suppressed in current investigation

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State professor failed Wednesday, June 28, to suppress evidence gained in a search of his residence by the Riley County Police Department.

The March 9 search, which took place at the residence of John Uhlarik, professor of psychology, 2340 Park Drive, was related to an investigation into stalking allegations involving former K-State athlete Gwen Wentland.

Uhlarik's lawyer, Keen Umbehr, sought to suppress all evidence gained in the search and requested the evidence be returned to Uhlarik.

Judge Paul Wright ruled that application for the search warrant was sufficient and denied the defense's motion to return the seized items.

Detective Darla King, crime scene investigator for the RCPD, testified that the search was legal and the items taken from the residence were related to the ongoing investigation.

The RCPD seized a laptop computer, newspaper articles and numerous pictures of Wentland, as well as marijuana and drug paraphernalia during the search, King said.

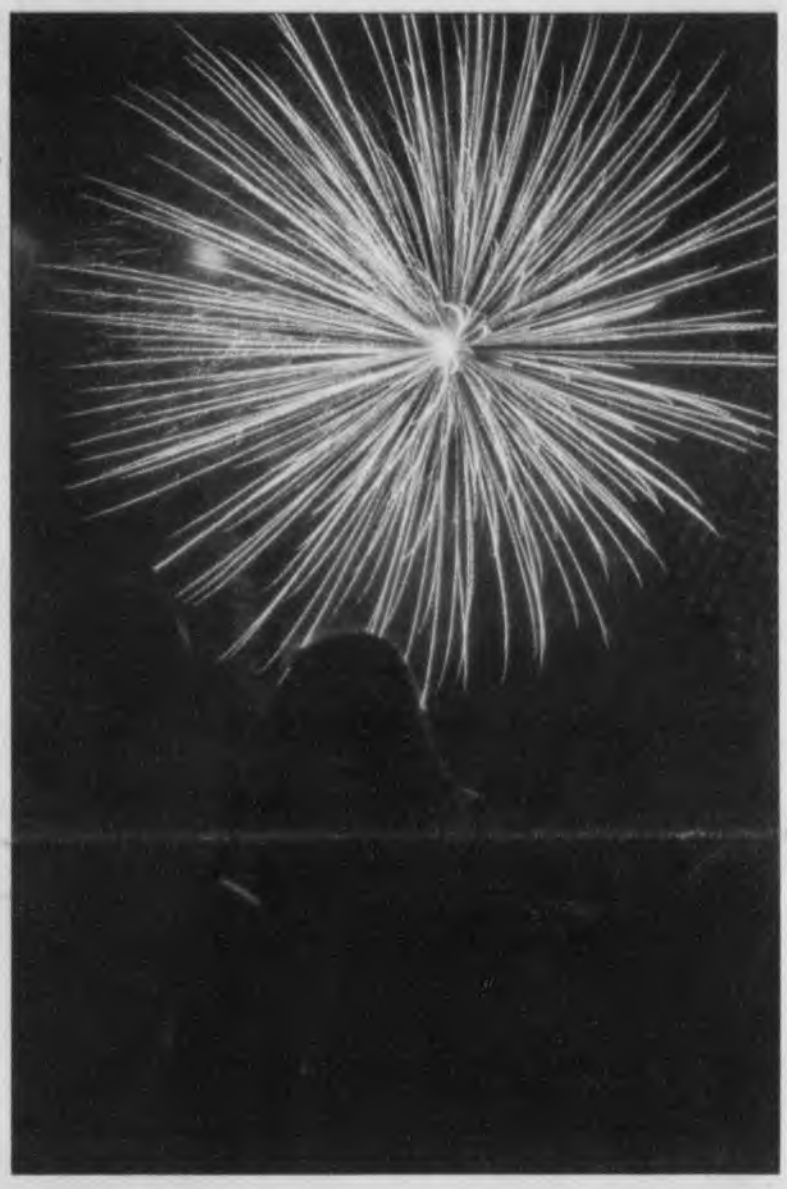
"We were looking for mementos relating to the victim," King said.

More than five detectives and officers from the RCPD, including a supervisor, took part in the search, King said.

A total of 45 items were seized.

Umbehr argued that a personal protection order, which was issued in May 2004 against Uhlarik, had expired at the time of the search, thereby invalidating the reason for the search.

"I believed I had probable cause for a warrant for John," King said.



Both Uhlarik and Wentland signed the protective order. The order was modified to continue for one year, expiring in May 2006, said Bethany Fields, representative of the Riley County Attorney's office.

However, Umbehr argued that since a judge had not approved the order, it was invalid.

Uhlarik was originally charged with aggravated assault and criminal threat, for allegedly pulling a knife on Wentland and threatening her.

Fireworks show caps off Fourth of July activities

By Jesse Sachdeva
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A crowd of nearly 1,000 people assembled with lawn chairs and blankets coating the park as they waited for fireworks to conclude the Independence Day activities.

The fireworks consisted of more than 500 shots and lasted 45 minutes. The evening wound down with reggae band Muzizi performing as the final preparations were made for the fireworks show.

Lisa Stork, senior in park management and conservation and life-long Manhattan resident, said the celebration, "Thunder over Manhattan," has evolved over the years into the full-scale production it is today.

"I used to just stay at my house and watch the fireworks show from my roof, but the events the city has added to the celebration give everyone a reason to come down to the park to get a front row seat for the big show," she said.

Held annually in CiCo Park, the celebration features a full day of events. The day's celebrations began at 7:30 a.m. with the Solar Kiwanis Pancake Feed, which served more than 300 people. Events, including free swimming at CiCo pool, continued into the afternoon.

There were several of activities for children as well. A tractor pull and tricycle races for young children took place, with contestants racing from one end of Hulbert Hall to the other. And Uncle Sam distributed free helium balloons to the children.

The crackle and pop of Black Cats being set off in the surrounding neighborhoods could be heard as the evening's events began, with a concert from the city band. The Manhattan Municipal Band, consisting of members from high school to retirement, entertained a crowd of about 250 people.

"Explosions, barbeque and watermelon; what more could you want," Brian Ransom, senior in biochemistry and nutritional science, said.

Topeka police find dead man by Kansas River

By Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The badly decomposed body of a man was found Sunday, July 2, near the Kansas River in downtown Topeka.

Police Maj. John Sidwell, department spokesman for the Topeka Police Department, told the Topeka Capital-Journal the identity of the body is yet to be determined.

The body was found on the north side of the Kansas River at 8:45 a.m. by a police dog trained to find dead bodies. It was not in the water, but on the riverbank.

It was found while Topeka police were searching for David Owen, 38. Owen, an advocate for homeless people, has been reported missing since June 24. His father, Darrel Owen, Cimarron, Kan., last spoke to David on June 16 and was the one who reported David was missing. They were searching the river because that's where Owen usually was, Sidwell told the Capital-Journal.

The body was put onto a Stokes basket, or a stretcher-like device, by six firefighters from the Topeka Fire Department's Technical Rescue Team.

They body was then put into a hearse and transported to the coroner's office, where the man will be identified.

Police did not say whether animals had tampered with the body.

Three women, city council member Lana Kennedy, Sylvia Ortiz and Ortiz' daughter, Ta'Nia Gibbs, had searched for Owen along the Kansas River and under bridges on June 28, but didn't search the area where the body was found because it was getting dark.

They also distributed fliers about Owen to people in the area.

Topeka police also searched Owen's apartment and areas by the Kansas River, where he talked to homeless people. Police tried calling his cell phone, but it had been turned off.

Police said they had reports of Owen being in disputes with homeless people along the river, which is why they were particularly concerned.

Cool Cats take over hall responsibilities for summer

By Megan Crane
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While many may notice the changes in Manhattan during the summer, but what may not be noticed are the changes in the residence halls.

Because of fewer students living in residence halls during the summer, Moore Hall is the only residence hall open for continuous housing. Other halls are open for conference housing and summer orientation tours.

With fewer students and less need for staffing, 24 summer staffers, known as Cool Cats, work the front desks and check conference attendees in and out of the halls.

David Yoder, Marlatt Hall residence life coordinator and coordinator for conference staff, is in charge of hiring and training the Cool Cats. He said they have many responsibilities.

"We want them to be welcoming to the university's guests and represent the university very well," Yoder said. "We need individuals who can solve problems, find solutions and understand resources."

A 135-page manual supplements the three-day training session Cool Cats participate in to prepare them for the summer tasks.

Cool Cat Meghan Snodgrass, junior in human ecology and mass communications, said shifts can change week to week, but sometimes Cool Cats work up to 50 hours.

There are approximately 45 conferences that run through K-State during the summer. A Cool Cat also assists in organized orientation and enrollment tours for prospective students.

In addition to the work, the Cool Cats have found time to form intramural volleyball, softball and bowling teams in the summer.

"I think it's the best job to have in the summer if you want to stay in Manhattan," Patrick Simpson, Cool Cat and K-State graduate, said.

Cool Cats Greg Brown, junior in philosophy, Dwayna McFerren, senior in social work, and Drew Vining, senior in speech communication, talk together in the front lobby of Moore Hall.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The nation's top-rated power forward has made a verbal commitment to K-State for the 2007-08 basketball season.

Michael Beasley, a six feet eight inch forward from Oak Hill Academy in Virginia, originally made a commitment to Charlotte in September, when Dalonte Hill worked for the academy. However, coach Bob Huggins made Hill an assistant coach in April and Beasley met with coach Huggins soon after.

He is ranked No. 4 in recruiting by Rivals.com, along with high school teammates O.J. Mayo and Bill Walker, who are also being recruited by Huggins.

Wooldridge accepts job at Texas State

Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Former K-State head basketball coach Jim Wooldridge has accepted a job at Texas State University-San Marcos, the university announced June 30.

Wooldridge, who coached the Bobcats from 1991-94, accepted the position as major gifts development officer with the school's athletic department.

"My wife and I have wanted to return to San Marcos ever since we left," Wooldridge said in a statement released by the Texas State athletics department. "My coaching positions have given me extensive experience and involvement with alumni and the community that I can put to good use as a development officer for the Bobcats."

Wooldridge led Texas State to its first winning season in NCAA Division I and its first NCAA postseason appearance when the Bobcats went 25-7 in 1994, according to an Associated Press report. In addition, Wooldridge also was named Southland Conference Coach of the Year in 1994.

800 mumps cases reported

Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

About 800 cases of mumps were reported to Kansas hospitals this past year. Only 18 of 800 were in Riley County.

"We haven't had any here at K-State," said Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion for Lafene Health Center.

Of the 800 confirmed or probable cases in Kansas, Riley County has had 18, Geary County has had seven and Pottawatomie County has had four.

Douglas County has had 281 cases of mumps, 200 of which are students at the University of Kansas, said Patty Quinlan, supervisor of nursing at Watkins Memorial Health Center in Lawrence.

Although Douglas County had the largest number of mumps cases reported out of the 69 Kansas counties in the report, Quinlan said the cases were significantly slowing down.

More than 1,300 cases of the mumps have been reported in eight Midwest states from February to April, according to a New York Times report. This was the nation's largest outbreak of the virus in two decades.

The mumps virus can cause swollen, painful salivary glands, headaches, fever and sore throat. It can also lead to more serious health problems, said Sonder Crane, 2005 K-State graduate now attending the University of Kansas Medical School.

According to the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, the age group with the highest number of mumps cases as reported by June 26 was those who are 18 to 24 years old.

Doctors recommend parents in the United States get children vaccinated for the mumps. A child should get the first dose at 12 to 15 months old and a second dose at 4 to 6 years old, according to a Mayo Foundation for Medical Education and Research report. It is recommended that children who haven't had this second dose receive it by 11 to 12 years of age. Older teens who haven't had two doses of the mumps vaccine also should be immunized, except for women who are pregnant or who may become pregnant within 3 months of vaccination.

The mumps usually goes away on its own within about 2 weeks, but in some rare cases, can lead to more serious illnesses such as encephalitis – inflammation of the brain – and meningitis – inflammation of the lining of the brain and the spinal cord. When mumps affects teenage boys, it can lead to orchitis, an inflammation of the testicles that causes swelling and pain. In teenage girls, mumps can affect the ovaries, causing pain and tenderness in the abdomen.

Zookeepers find ways to keep animals cool in the summer

Fluctuating climate challenges Sunset Zoo staff

By Megan Crane
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If humans and domestic pets find it hard to endure the summer heat, imagine how hard it might be for an animal not native to Kansas' climate.

This is the conundrum zookeepers face at the Sunset Zoological Park, 2333 Oak Drive.

"If the animal is outside and the temperature gets too warm, they get access to indoor facilities," said Ryan Gulker, general curator of the Sunset Zoo. "Most exhibits have pools the animals can sit in if they get too hot, and we also put up water misters."

One animal the zookeepers specifically keep a close eye on is the colobus monkey. Colobus monkeys are originally from subtropical Africa and live at high altitudes.

"They're furry and black, so we tend to watch them closely when it gets warm and let them in their quarters," Gulker said. "They're more designed for a cooler climate."

The zoo also provides shade cloths in areas that don't have tree cover. Another cooling method is to give the animals ice blocks.

"For tigers there might be some blood in them, for other animals, fruit or other enrichment items," Gulker said. "For rabbits we use a two-liter bottle size. The animals chew on it or sit on it to keep them cool."

Cats vs. Dogs

Cats rule, dogs drool

LOLA SHRIMPLIN

Cats rule, and that's that.

Anyone who knows me knows I am a cat fan from way back.

I love cats.

From my first cat, Humphrey, named after Hubert Humphrey, to my last cat, simply named My Cat, I have always been a big fan.

I like dogs, and my family has had tons of dogs, from Prince to Dupper and Tiny.

Cats, however, are my favorite.

Cats, to me, are more independent and free spirited. My Cat used to get mad when it snowed. She would claw the door or me when she realized that it was snowing outside the window.

With the exception of J.R., who had brain damage, I never met a stupid cat.

J.R. passed out after choking on his food, and when his throat relaxed, he woke up. After that he would run into doors.

I seriously think he was a dog in disguise.

Dogs are more dependent on people for things, while cats seem to be able to go and survive on little more than an occasional petting and maybe a mouse stuffed with catnip.

We've always had cats at my house, with dogs interspersed between. From Fat Cat to Blackie Tom, cats were always present.

Now mom and dad have four cats, all were strays when they were found. Yet there isn't a dog in the house, and I like it that way.

Dogs leave a particular smell behind them, and once a house smells like dog, there is no getting rid of it.

Dogs yap and bark and whine, and it's annoying as hell when you have to listen to that over and over.

Cats are cleaner, they bathe themselves, and they seldom embarrass you in front of a group of people by showing where they can lick themselves.

Sure, cats are destructive, but that's part of their nature. They don't do it out of clumsiness or stupidity, but pure maliciousness.

Just ask my mom.

My parents have a cat named Lucy, who loves to shred stuff. Jem knocks stuff over, but that's because he's a dog in a cat's body. Scout loves to drink milk off a bowl on the counter. And Maggot likes to scare Jem.

They all have distinct personalities, and when Lucy shreds things, or Maggot hides her hackie sack in the laundry, my mother knows its out of pure spite.

Dogs are just plain stupid.

Sure, there was Lassie on television, but even then they had to get a female collie so she wouldn't pee all over everything and try to have relations with everything that moved.

When Maggot tried her little kitten wiles on Jem, the neutered male cat, all he did was scream like a girl and run.

That's his nature. That's why cats are great.

Jem is a wuss, and has been since he was a kitten. Lucy is a bully. And Scout is aloof.

Maggot is just a pain.

When My Cat was going through her little kitten horniness, I took her to the veterinarian, Dr. Carl Christensen at Christensen Animal Clinic in Garden City, Kan., and got her fixed. Before that, she came on to everything, including the dog.

But did the dog scream and run? No. He just stood there, looking confused.

At least Blackie Tom had the grace to slap some sense into her.

You could almost see him saying "Pull yourself together, and stop acting like an idiot. I can't do anything for you."

That's why cats are better than dogs.

Dogs are loyal, friendly pets to have

ZACHARY T. ECKELS

There was a large change in my life on March 22. The change, which subtracted large sums of money from my account, has added entertainment, companionship and a lot of responsibility.

March 22 was the day I brought home a nine-month-old Boxer/Pointer mix.

From that first day on, Petie has understood his place in our house. He quickly learned that he was the subordinate member and learned the commands we needed him to learn.

Not once has he acted more important than any person. Such a horrible trait is not for dogs; it's much more suited for a cat.

According to www.pedigree.com, this understanding of dominance comes from a dog's pack instinct. In the wild, dogs live in their own society. The pack is responsible for hunting and rearing the young. Without a clear understanding of which dog is the dominant of the pack, fights would break out.

This is what leads to dogs always wishing to contribute whatever they can to help. They understand that you enjoy it when they learn tricks and work to make you happy. Sure, there are trained cats out in the world too, but would you want to go through the effort to train one?

Cats on the other hand are solitary hunters. They have no notion of teamwork and pretend they could make it in the wilderness on their own. To excuse this behavior, cat people come up with weak terms like individual, mysterious or composed. Let me explain to you what these terms really mean.

Individual – The cat will not come when you call. If you want to play and it doesn't, tough luck – it's more important than you are.

Mysterious – When you're least expecting it, the cat will pounce and attack you.

Composed – The period when a cat looks like a good pet, but is actually planning the next attack.

As if all of that wasn't enough of an excuse to never consider owning one of these pests, there is still the worst part about them: their tongue. I was 10 years old before I found out that a cat's tongue feels amazingly like sandpaper. The idea that Satan's tongue resides in the mouth of every cat has freaked me out ever since.

The fact is, I don't want a pet that attacks my friends while treating a robber as just another servant. I want a pet that works with me, not against – an animal that will protect my territory and me and understands when someone is no threat.

A dog is all this and more. In less than four months, Petie has become a huge part of my family. He's loyal, playful and loving. He's always ready to entertain guests by chasing his tail or singing along with a harmonica. As a dog, he's worth more than all the cats in the world combined. As a friend, he's priceless.

Editors share their fondest Fourth of July memories

Carla Cassel – I lived in the coolest little Oklahoma town, and we went crazy for the Fourth. We had all-you-can-eat watermelon, action-packed turtle races and an earth-shaking fireworks display. And, my dad was a fireman, so I got to ride on top of the fire truck and throw candy at all my jealous friends. I was living the American dream.

Steven Doll – When my family was moving to Littleton, Colo., we wanted to go watch the fireworks, but we were new to town and didn't know where to go. We drove all over town and looked for fireworks before giving up and going home. After being at home for about 15 minutes, we heard the fireworks and found that we had a perfect view from the front yard.

Annette Lawless – It was this year, when I seriously considered burning down Anderson Hall with just one sparkler. Just kidding.

Sheila Ellis – This year, when one of my friends and I were shooting roman candles in a park a couple of blocks from my house, we walked there, and before five minutes even passed, it started pouring down rain. When we got back to my house, we were drenched.

Kristen Roderick – Oh gosh, memories. When I was younger, my cousins and I would spend Independence Day at my grandparent's house in Kingman, Kan. We would take Black Cats out of the bucket and see how far we could throw them before they exploded. For some reason, the firecrackers always went off in my hand. One year, one of my cousins threw his firecracker, and it landed in the bucket of Black Cats. After a moment of stunned silence, every single Black Cat in the bucket went off. It was awesome.

Travelers need passports by 2008

By Mary Bershenyi
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dec. 31, 2007, will be the last day people can cross the U.S. borders without a passport.

A federal regulation, called the Western Hemisphere Act, closed borders previously open to travelers without passports including Mexico, the Bahamas, British Virgin Islands and Canada.

Students studying abroad in those countries, like other travelers, have not had to produce a passport to come back to the United States.

The new regulation, however, will not influence K-State students studying abroad very much, if at all, Jennifer Chambers, study abroad director, said.

The Office of International Programs, responsible for handling all study abroad requests, already requires students to have a passport, even if they are going to Mexico or Canada.

"Once you're at the bank at another country trying to make a transaction, they're more likely to take a passport to do that than use your license," Chambers said. "Or, if you decide to travel. Many who study abroad in Mexico go somewhere else, too. Unless they're staying in just Mexico, they would have needed one anyway."

To obtain a passport, students must fill out an official application and turn it in to a governmental office equipped to process them.

The act did increase passports the Manhattan Post Office processed, Sam Collins, passport clerk, said.

"(Demand) increased in January or February because they had to have passports to travel to Mexico for spring break," Collins said. "That is still the case with Canada. All the airlines, boats and cruise lines require passports."

TO THE EDITOR

Minimum wage complicated

Dear editor,

Like many people with a liberal bent, you, Zachary Eckels, love freedom except when it causes things to be unequal in the world, especially in terms of money.

Freedom means each of us is free to make choices concerning how much education to get and how hard we wish to work. It means equality of opportunity, not equality of outcomes.

Executives are paid a lot for a reason. The job market for them is more competitive than the minimum wage market. The highest bidder receives their services. Intelligence, experience, integrity and superior competence make them worth so much more.

I sometimes say that I have a master's degree in minimum wage, since I spent about five years in that arena before graduating from K-State in 1975. I can almost guarantee that I have more experience with that law than you do.

Raising the minimum wage is an area involving unintended consequences.

When the minimum wage is raised, some people benefit to be sure, if they are worth the additional cost to their employer.

However, if they are not, then they lose their jobs and fall off the bottom rung of the employment ladder. For those in that situation, how has the law helped them?

The minimum wage law is another of the "feel good" laws that actually harm more than they help. I believe in freedom. Let the markets work their magic, including the market for labor, I say. Our Sens. Brownback and Roberts did the right thing.

As a final note, I believe Economics 101 should be a required course for anyone entering the field of journalism.

Weiser leads K-State through athletic transitions

By Tye Burger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's been five years since Tim Weiser became the athletic director at K-State, and a few things have changed.

Weiser accepts that change is part of the sports world, even though it's uncomfortable for people at first. It started almost from his first day on the job in 2001, when the athletic department moved its radio rights from long-time partner WIBW-TV to Learfield Communications.

"What we needed most was a recognition of our value, being paid what the market would generate for us," Weiser said.

That radio deal is now a 10-year, $30 million partnership and is one of the most important parts of the university's long-term financial progress.

Powercat Illustrated Editor and Publisher Tim Fitzgerald said while Weiser made some people unhappy with that decision, it showed he did what was best for K-State.

"He showed he wasn't afraid to make the tough decisions," Fitzgerald said.

Two obvious changes have come within what has been a busy past year for Weiser. Since November 2005, K-State has hired new coaches in the department's two highest-profile sports. Virginia offensive coordinator Ron Prince replaced K-State legend Bill Snyder in football, and veteran Bob Huggins replaced Jim Wooldridge in men's basketball.

Weiser said the athletic department has spent nearly $10 million on new facilities or improvements to existing facilities. Some of the most visible changes include the ongoing work at Bill Snyder Family Stadium and the Vanier Football Complex, Tointon Family Stadium and Brandeberry Indoor Training Complex. More subtle changes include a new boathouse for the women's crew team and new playing surfaces for the volleyball, basketball and football teams.

Weiser said future plans include improvements to the west side of the athletic complex, most notably to Bramlage Coliseum. The idea to improve Bramlage has been around for a while, but, since the hiring of Huggins as head coach, Weiser said interest in K-State basketball has skyrocketed, providing motivation to make the improvements.

The improvements include installment of premium seating, or suites inside the arena, as well as an exterior facelift.

"The west side would be, in my mind, the front door of our facility, and I don't think that front-door feeling is what it could be," Weiser said.

Weiser mentioned the possibility of extending the building to what is now the edge of the parking lot and putting the ticket office out front. The new space could be used for an interactive room highlighting the history of K-State athletics.

"We want the people in the twilight of their years of supporting K-State to come in with their grandson or granddaughter and talk about what they remember from their years," Weiser said.

Physical improvements are part of the athletic department's goal to provide student athletes at K-State with the best experience possible. Weiser said there are two measurements for that experience.

"One, they are able in four or five years to walk across that stage, reach out and grab that diploma, and two, on that hand is a championship ring," Weiser said.

4 students join work crew at first U.S. Senior Open in Kansas

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's his first summer working at Prairie Dunes Country Club in Hutchinson, Kan.

And this week, Michael Liebe, senior in golf course management, will work 10-hour days in preparation for his first large golf tournament.

Liebe, along with Nathan Ratzlaff, senior in golf course management; Dylan Senn, senior in golf course management; and Jeff Cameron, sophomore in golf course management, will be a part of the grounds-crew at the 27th U.S. Senior Open Championship at Prairie Dunes Country Club in Hutchinson, Kan. The tournament's practice rounds were Monday, July 3, through Wednesday, July 5, and the championship rounds are Thursday, July 6, through Sunday, July 9.

"It's good because you see what it takes to hold a major championship, and it's not really one of those things you can get anywhere else," said Liebe, whose duties at the golf course include mowing the fairways and checking the greens for discoloration or disease. "I'm keeping my eyes open and seeing how things are being put together and try to take that with me."

Ratzlaff, who has worked on the Prairie Dunes' grounds-crew for four summers, will work from 3:30 to 8 a.m. and noon to finish all week at the tournament. He said he hopes the tournament will prepare him for his career.

"I hope to get a job one day where I will do it again," said Ratzlaff, whose responsibilities at the tournament include mowing and watering. "(Working at the tournament) will look good on a resume and help me get a job out of college."

Stan George, golf course superintendent at Prairie Dunes, said he learned in fall 2003 that Prairie Dunes would be the host site of the 2006 U.S. Senior Open. During the last two-and-a-half years, the course has prepared by adding five bunkers, three tee boxes and narrowing the fairway widths.

"We'd already had these changes on the drawing board, but we just put them into action," George said. "They were more of our own specifications with USGA (United States Golf Association) approval, but they weren't mandated."

The first U.S. Senior Open Championship was played in June 1980 with 631 entries, according to the U.S. Senior Open Web site. The championship had 2,876 entries in 2005.

While this is the first U.S. Senior Open to take place in Kansas, it is the eighth USGA championship to take place at Prairie Dunes Country Club, said Jill Ulrich, marketing director for the U.S. Senior Open. About 130,000 spectators are expected to attend the nationally televised event, Ulrich said.

There are about 75 people with staff and volunteers working the tournament, and George said to his knowledge, only four of them are K-State students.

This is only the second time that he has been a part of a large golf championship.

This is not the first professional golf tournament for Senn, who is volunteering at the U.S. Senior Open as part of his internship with the Wichita Country Club. Senn, whose duty is mowing greens at the tournament, has worked at several tournaments, including the U.S. Amateur Public Links Championship in Lebanon, Ohio, in July 2005.

Cameron, who learned about the opportunity through his academic adviser, said this is his first time volunteering at a golf tournament. He said his responsibilities at the tournament will include raking bunkers and blowing grass off the fairways.

The experience of working at a large golf tournament will allow the students to learn about different concerns with turf grass, said Dale Bremer, assistant professor of horticulture, forestry and recreation resources.

"It's definitely a tremendous opportunity for them because it allows them to get out in the field and see what the real-world issues are, especially in a high-profile deal like the U.S. Open," he said.

EDUCATORS CHALLENGE 'NO CHILD LEFT BEHIND'

ORLANDO, Fla. – An overwhelming majority of delegates from the nation's largest education union approved a plan Monday, July 3, to aggressively lobby Congress for reform of the No Child Left Behind Act.

The National Education Association has fought to change the measure since its beginnings in 2001, but this is the union's most organized effort to date, said Joel Packer, the NEA's policy manager on the act.

In an hour-long debate, only three of the 9,000 members of that assembly argued against the lobbying effort.

CHURCH PREACHES HOW 'JESUS LOVES PORN STARS'

LOS ANGELES – A Christian group has been making rounds at U.S. adult entertainment conventions, handing out Bibles with "Jesus loves porn stars" stamped on the covers.

The group, XXXchurch, billed its Web site, www.xxxchurch.com, as the number-one Christian porn site. It includes downloadable Bible studies and an array of "prayer software," including "accountability programs" designed to help users resist pornographic temptation.

Pornography brings in more revenue in the United States than all of professional football, baseball and basketball franchises combined, according to the conservative research group Family Safe Media.

RAPPER LIL' KIM RELEASED FROM JAIL

NEW YORK – Grammy-winning rapper Lil' Kim has been released from jail after serving a 10-month sentence for lying to a grand jury over a gunfight involving her entourage.

The rap artist, known for her lewd lyrics and provocative wardrobe, wore a low-cut white dress and clutched a flower bouquet as she left the Philadelphia Federal Detention Center in Pennsylvania.

Lil' Kim – born Kimberly Jones – was released more than two months before her prison term was to expire in September, but will remain under house arrest for 30 days.

Students use text messaging to communicate quickly, quietly

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The digital age has become dependent on quickness and convenience.

Since text messaging started in the late 1990s, it has become a norm for many students.

Text messaging has become popular because it's fast, easy and convenient, said Joe Guillory, senior retail and sales representative at T-Mobile in Manhattan Town Center.

Most students take advantage of many cell phone companies' unlimited text messaging plans because of their addiction to texting, he said.

"The 500-texting plan limits you on how many texts you can use," Tiffany Kellum, sophomore in open-option, said. "With the unlimited plan you don't have to worry about going over on your bill."

Some students who don't have unlimited text messaging suffer overage charges every month.

Alyssa Smith, sophomore in family and consumer sciences education, said she has seen an overage charge for $500, just in text messaging.

"I have went over on my text messaging almost every month, partially because sometimes I text message things that aren't too important," she said.

Chain text messages, which are similar to chain letters, are also another problem with text messaging. This can put some students over their limit, consequently adding extra dollars of usage charges.

"I hate chain text messages because they waste text messages," Bryon Williams, junior in economics, said.

Students use text messaging as an option when they can't talk because they are in class or at work, said Heather Smith, supervisor at Alltel authorized agent in Town Center.

"I text when I'm in class, when I'm on the phone talking to someone else and to save minutes," Williams said.

Usually students can text even when they don't have a signal, Guillory said.

Most people are addicted to text messaging simply because they would rather text than talk, Kellum said.

"It's a quick and easy way to communicate with your friends and family," Kellum said.

Although text messaging can be very convenient at times, it can also be a distraction.

Some people try to answer text messages when they drive, but Heather Smith said text messaging while driving is very dangerous.

"Many people text while driving, but we all know that it's not safe," Heather Smith said.

Cell phones are not limited to text messages alone. There are also a number of other communication services offered on cell phones.

People can check their e-mail, Facebook and MySpace accounts via cell phone. Some people can even bid on online auction sites like eBay.

"Because of the advances in technology, people are needing to connect with the outside world more often," Alyssa Smith said.

Quick facts about text messaging:

- About 63 percent of Americans from ages 18 to 27 text message.
- Nearly 31 percent of cell phone owners ages 28 to 39 use text messaging, and 18 percent of those 40 to 49 do as well.
- As of June 2005, about 5 billion text messages were sent in one month in the United States, up from 2.8 billion in 2004.
- Worldwide, 90 percent of non-voice revenues come from text messaging.

WEISER | K-State athletics strong financially, still must save money to see intercollegiate athletics change young student athletes in a positive way is the most important and rewarding part of his job.

"I've watched so many kids come in as very cocky and arrogant, convinced that they're going to take over the university, only to realize they're one of many great student athletes we have here," Weiser said. "By the time they're a senior, they've matured and developed in a way that you're really proud to see that transfer take place."

Fitzgerald commends Weiser for the work he has done to ensure K-State athletics' financial situation is stable.

"We're very fiscally solvent and strong right now," Fitzgerald said. "We've stayed away from debt while still keeping our facilities up."

Part of the department's financial solvency is the reserve fund, which Weiser introduced. For the first time in athletic department history, money is being set aside for the future. Weiser said he introduced a 10-year plan that proposed setting aside one percent of the department's operating budget each year.

At this point in time, the department is slightly ahead of schedule.

When he took over, K-State was unprepared for lean times financially.

"At the time, we didn't have one penny in a reserve account," Weiser said. "It is not for us to ever use on an annual basis. It's only meant to be used in cases of a significant emergency or unexpected need that we can't solve in any other way."

Weiser said the $34 million operating budget ranks in the lower third of the Big 12 Conference. When Weiser came on board in 2001, the operating budget was about $30 million, well behind conference leader Texas, which had about $50 million to spend that year. Despite funding four fewer sports programs than Texas, K-State still has less money to spend per sport than Texas.

"At Kansas State you're always going to have to outwork, outthink and out hustle your competition," Weiser said. "For me as an athletic director, it comes down to making good choices on people. We can't afford to make mistakes, because if you're Texas and make a mistake you throw money at it. At Kansas State we don't have that luxury."

UHLARIK | 45 items seized from professor's house to remain evidence

Wentland had previously filed 12 complaints against Uhlarik with the RCPD.

"Including mine, was 13," King said.

None of the 12 complaints resulted in charges by the Riley County Attorney's office and that related to Wentland's credibility, Umbehr said.

Detective King disagreed, saying that it showed Wentland's determination.

"It showed that she was dedicated and felt she was being stalked," she said.

Umbehr disapproved the stalking charges, saying of that having pictures of a former girlfriend was common.

"Do people who allege they're being stalked always tell the truth?" Umbehr asked.

"We're not here to prove or disprove whether an incident occurred," Wright said

Uhlarik's next court appearance is set for 1 p.m. Aug. 30.

FEELING CRAFTY?

Those with a knack for projects can indulge in creative summer activities

By Amy Bolton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State students who want to fill the long summer hours with new hobbies can visit one of Manhattan's many craft stores for new projects.

Ben Franklin Crafts, 1101 Westloop Place, carries various kinds of craft and hobby supplies.

"Right now beading is really popular," said Pauline Myers, night manager and buyer for Ben Franklin Crafts.

The store carries a variety of beads people can use to make jewelry, she said.

Other craft projects Ben Franklin carries include kits for making your own clocks, glass suncatchers and stepping stones.

Ben Franklin and other stores like Jo-Ann Fabrics, 320 Poyntz Ave., and Hobby Lobby, 628 Tuttle Creek Blvd., also provide supplies like needles, fabrics, greek paddles, architecture supplies, stickers and rubber stamps.

"A lot of people do the friendship books and the 21 [birthday] books," Myers said.

And for those who need a little creative education, several local craft stores offer classes to help people develop creative skills.

"We usually have new classes every month," Myers said.

Classes include beginner's knitting and crochet, rubber stamping, quilting, floral and basketweaving.

Many popular projects involve yarn.

"We've got all kinds of fun yarns," Myers said.

People interested in yarn projects can also visit Wildflowers Yarn and Knitwear, 300 Poyntz Ave.

There are many different yarns available, and classes listed in Wildflower Yarn and Knitwear's summer 2006 newsletter include beginning and intermediate knitting, sock knitting, beaded bracelets, felted totes, crochet blocks and crocheted flowers.

Beginner's crochet, knitting and help sessions are also available.

Another art and craft project store, Ceramic Canvas, 1344 Westloop Place, is a paint-your-own pottery store. Ceramic projects are ready for people to paint.

"We provide everything you need to finish your projects," said Michelle Klentz, owner of Ceramic Canvas. "You don't have to have any talent or artistic ability at all."

There are more than 800 different pieces of ceramic art to chose from, including a full line of dishes, dragons, fairies and holiday pieces. Most pieces cost $10 to $20, Klentz said.

There is also a studio fee that is 50 percent of the cost of the piece.

Customers also have access to all supplies, unlimited time to paint and the firing of the ceramic.

The Ceramic Canvas also has a wet clay studio with pottery wheels.

Experienced potters can work with clay and create their own project to paint later.

One-on-one classes are available for the wet clay studio.

They can come back when their piece is fired to paint it. An open studio is also offered where customers can come in to work unlimitedly for $30 a month.

For those interested in other ceramic venues, the Manhattan Arts Center, 1520 Poyntz Ave., also offers several classes for children and adults interested in learning more about ceramics.

For those interested in other creative arts, Manhattan Arts Center offers classes in drawing, music, painting and acting.

Personal tragedy, reporting linked together 'Dispatches'

"Dispatches from the Edge"
Grade: A

Book review by Adrianne DeWeese

He started his journalism career with a fake press pass and a home-video camera in Africa.

He was 24 years old, and he wanted to be a war correspondent. While establishing his credibility as a journalist, he reported on famine in Somalia and genocide in Rwanda, Africa. And he also reported on war in Sarajevo, a city located in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

Fast forward 15 years, and his reporting-itinerary in 2005 alone included tsunami-torn Sri Lanka, starvation in Niger and the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

Anderson Cooper, anchor of CNN's "Anderson Cooper 360," details the accounts he has seen across the world in his memoir "Dispatches from the Edge: A Memoir of War, Disasters, and Survival."

Cooper demands honesty in his interview with U.S. Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., three days after Katrina. Cooper asks Landrieu if government officials have any responsibility for the storm's aftermath, and she says there will be plenty of time to point fingers and begins thanking politicians for their recovery efforts.

"Excuse me, Senator. I'm sorry for interrupting," Cooper breaks in, "... to listen to politicians thanking each other and complimenting each other – you know, I've got to tell you, there are a lot of people here who are very upset, and very angry and very frustrated."

In his non-linear storytelling, Cooper also offers personal flashbacks into the pain he experienced at age 10 when his father died of a heart attack and 10 years later when his brother Carter committed suicide.

The book offers some insight into Cooper's childhood when he discovered at age 12 that his mother, railroad heiress and designer Gloria Vanderbilt, was famous.

"Dispatches" has caused literary success for Cooper in the month since its release. It has made the Amazon Top 10 list and topped the New York Times best-seller list for non-fiction hardcover books.

But Cooper is not a journalist for the broadcast ratings or economic successes that might come with his reporting.

"Each day they (my producers) tell me the ratings for my broadcast are high, but the truth is, I don't want to hear about it. This is not a 'story'; these people aren't characters," Cooper writes in regard to his broadcasts and coverage of Hurricane Katrina.

Overall, Cooper's memoir serves as a sense of closure from the deaths of his father and brother and the sufferings he has reported.

While journalists have a responsibility to report the news fairly and accurately, Cooper shows that they, too, are only human at the end of the day.

"It's impossible to block out what you see, what you hear. Even if you stop listening, the pain gets inside, seeps through the cracks you can't close up," he writes.

Depending on a machine

Photos by Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

Reggie McGowan, a dialysis patient, sits in the Kansas Dialysis Services clinic Monday morning, July 10, as he undergoes dialysis treatment. McGowan has been undergoing dialysis for more than eight years.

Reggie McGowan's blood is pumped through a dialysis machine to remove toxins and excess fluids from his blood because his kidneys have failed.

Manhattan residents describe their lives on dialysis

By Logan Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The room is sterile. It is a dialysis clinic, after all.

Eleven machines line the walls in Kansas Dialysis Services clinic, 1133 College Avenue. Several of them are attached, through the arm or the chest, to people lying in lime-green chairs and passing the time as their blood is processed.

Famed Washington Post columnist Art Buchwald, 80, chose to die rather than go to a place like this and has received national attention since entering a Washington hospice. His decision seems to make dialysis sound literally like a fate worse than death, but the people here aren't doing too badly.

Frances Myers sits in one of the chairs on a recent day just as she does every Monday, Wednesday and Friday morning for more than three hours. She has soft, frizzy hair and a tired face.

"You have your good days and your bad days," Myers said

She said she has deep veins, and there are times when it's tricky for the nurses to get her treatment started.

She doesn't disagree with Buchwald's choice, though she picked a different path.

"I could understand, because he's so old," she said.

Myers's bright red blood goes out of her left arm and up to the top of the machine where a roller pump pushes it along. It goes past sensors that monitor its contents and into a clear tube about three inches thick and a foot long. It is in that tube that her blood contacts the dialyzing solution before being pumped past more sensors and back into her body, still just as red.

Myers said two of her sisters had diabetes and died from it in their 30s. The same disease took her kidneys in late 2004 and now she has to use the machine every other day to stay alive.

Before she started dialysis, Myers said she remembers intense pain from the buildup of toxins in her body after her kidneys failed.

"I felt like I was going to erupt in my body," she said. "I felt terrible."

Her cousin, Josephine Martinez, is also in the clinic.

Martinez has smooth, dark brown hair with a few streaks of gray shining through. She said she started dialysis two months before Myers, after her kidneys stopped working due to anemia.

She said the nurses considered putting the cousins together when they both required the treatment, but she warned against that on the grounds they'd be "double trouble." Martinez doesn't mind the dialysis, she said she mostly gets used to it until toward the end when she gets "fidgety" and wants to leave.

...e arrest man after gun is shot

By Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Manhattan man was arrested after he allegedly fired shots in front of a group of people.

Mark Douglas Jr., 1919 Lincoln Drive, was arrested at 3:38 a.m. Sunday, July 9, for five counts of aggravated assault and carrying a concealed weapon. Bond was set at $20,000.

The violence began with a physical confrontation at a private party at 418 N. Fifth St., according to a Riley County Police Department press release.

After the confrontation, an assailant, who police believe was Douglas, drove up in front of the house and allegedly took a semi-automatic handgun and aimed it at people in the vicinity.

He then allegedly fired one round from the gun into the ground, and immediately got back into the vehicle and left.

None of the people involved were harmed in the incident.

The case is still under investigation and police expect more arrests will be made.

Investigation begins after soldier dies

By Staff Reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An investigation has begun to find the person who shot a Fort Riley soldier on June 29 in Salina, Kan.

Sgt. 1st Class Terry Hoffpauir, 35, of Orange, Texas, died June 30 at Via Christi Regional Medical Center in Wichita of injuries from a gunshot wound to the head, according to a news release issued by Fort Riley on Wednesday, July 5.

He was assigned to Headquarters and Headquarters Troop, 1st Squadron, 4th Calvary, 4th Infantry Brigade Combat Team, as a fire support specialty.

He arrived at Fort Riley last December after enlisting in the army in March 1989.

Manhattan Taco Hut to sell after 37 years of service

By Jesse Sachdeva
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After nearly 40years as a staple of the Manhattan dining scene, Taco Hut is up for sale. The restaurant's hilltop building, located at 2809 Claflin Road, was put on the market when owner Sharon Skalenda decided to retire from the business.

Taco Hut has long been popular with students of K-State for their affordable, made-from-scratch food, Kyra Dettmer, Taco Hut employee, said.

"Our most popular items among students are usually our 90 cent tacos and our sancho supreme," Dettmer said

Taco Hut is actually a regional chain of restaurants based out of Joplin, Mo., Skalenda said. Her mother opened the Manhattan branch of Taco Hut in 1969. Skalenda and her husband also own a branch in Hutchinson, Kan.

"Everyday stress from a lack of reliable workers led to my decision to sell," Skalenda said.

"As with many local businesses, we've experienced a high turnover with people deciding to put other things before work."

A resident of Hutchinson, Skalenda said she has been living in Manhattan for the past eight months to help Taco Hut through its employment struggles.

"After my husband retired six years ago, I inherited all of the ownership duties," she said. "I moved to Manhattan to help out the branch manager, but our workforce has made things really difficult."

Taco Hut recently began closing on Sundays to give Skalenda and her manager a break from the constant work of maintaining the restaurant, she said.

Skalenda said she listed the business and franchise for sale either together or separately with Realty Executives' Linda Weis.

This means that if the building is purchased, but not the franchise, the restaurant will close. The building itself is on the market for the asking price of $750,000.

Skalenda said she has already had a few potential buyers look into the property, but a serious offer has yet to emerge.

"Several people have come to look at the building over the past week, but most have been interested in the building, and only a few in the franchise," she said.

After the sale of the Manhattan branch, Skalenda said she plans to return to Hutchinson and continue her duties as owner of that branch.

"If the franchise here stays open, I'd stay on to train the new owner, but after that I probably wouldn't have any involvement," she said.

Though employee problems have plagued the restaurant, Dettmer, who has worked at the restaurant for a year, said she has enjoyed her time at Taco Hut.

"I've liked working here; it's unlike other places I've worked in Manhattan," Dettmer said.

"Taco Hut has more of a close knit, family type of environment (between Skalenda and the employees). I'd be sad to see it go."

Sharon Skalenda, owner of Manhattan's Taco Hut, prepares food for a customer Tuesday, July 11, at Taco Hut. After almost 40 years of owning the restaurant, Skalenda is selling the business.

Complex upgrade to complete by opener

A construction worker, who did not want to release his name, works on the construction of an elevator for the Vanier Football Complex at Bill Snyder Family Stadium on Tuesday, July 11.

COLLEGIAN

By Jesse Sachdeva
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Construction on the Vanier Football Complex is progressing as scheduled.

The $4.3 million renovation is expected to be completed in time for the Sept. 2 opening game against Illinois State.

The renovations, in the final half of a six-phase project, began shortly after coach Bill Snyder's final game last November.

Among the renovations to the stadium are a 23-foot high by 61-foot wide video board installed in the south end zone and a custom LED system installed on both sides of the stadium.

The new LED system will allow the board to display more complete information, such as animated images that are beyond the current system's capabilities, according to www.kstatesports.com.

Renovations have also been made to the north end zone seating area, with the addition of permanent seating, a new façade for the complex, the installation of additional office space for coaches and an expansion to the team's locker room. The seating upgrade will add about 1,900 new seats to the stadium.

"The new seating will feature aluminum benches and concrete stairs," said Casey Scott, associate athletic director of operations. "There won't be any permanent concession or restroom facilities installed just yet, but north end zone fans will have access to the main concourse through section one (the west side) of the stadium, which is something we haven't been able to offer before."

Another addition to the complex, the Via Christi Hydrotherapy Center, will have a multi-depth pool and various aquatic exercise machines to help injured athletes regain their strength in a limited weight-bearing environment.

"The facility will be open to all K-State athletes, not just the football team, as our sports medicine program is based out of the complex," Scott said.

The renovations will add nearly 10,000 square feet of additional space to the complex.

"Though little delays and budget surprises are expected with any construction project, we've been pretty lucky and things have proceeded smoothly. We've just begun laying concrete for the seating, and the façade of the building is taking shape," Garry Bowman, sports information director, said. "By the time the season starts, we should have all of the exterior work done, however, there will be some internal work on the office space after the season begins."

In addition to a larger complex, ticket prices will increase as well.

"Tickets prices are up slightly from last year, coming in at $215 for a north end zone season ticket," Scott said. "This is mainly due to an increase from six home games last year to eight this year. The section will also remain general admission and tickets for either individual games or the entire season will be available."

K-State-Salina dean becomes Kansas Engineer of the Year

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He was one of the people responsible for bringing GlobalFlyer to Kansas.

Now Dennis Kuhlman, dean at K-State-Salina, can add Kansas Engineer of the Year to his résumé.

KUHLMAN

Kuhlman was presented the award at the Kansas Society of Professional Engineers annual conference on June 29, in Overland Park, Kan.

The GlobalFlyer project also was awarded at the conference with Special Recognition for Engineering Achievement.

The process of getting GlobalFlyer to Salina started in early 2004 with the submission of information packets by Kuhlman; Tim Rogers, executive director of the Salina Airport Authority; and Gerald Cook, executive director of the Salina Chamber of Commerce to Virgin Atlantic in London. Kuhlman said he, Rogers, and Cook were unaware what the project was at the time.

After seeing scaled composites of GlobalFlyer on Virgin Atlantic's Web site, Kuhlman said they were able to put together information packets that emphasized K-State-Salina's strengths as an aviation center.

"We were able to convince (millionaire pilot) Steve Fossett and Sir Richard Branson (chairman of Virgin Atlantic) that they should do the project here," Kuhlman said.

In March 2005, Fossett became the first person to fly solo around the world without refueling. Fossett and GlobalFlyer set a record in February for the longest flight in history.

Kuhlman said 12 K-State-Salina students were directly involved with the first GlobalFlyer flight in March 2005, and the project grew to include more than 100 students.

"The GlobalFlyer project was about creating opportunities for students," Kuhlman said.

Kuhlman has been the dean at K-State-Salina since 1997, and he previously served as a professor of biological and agricultural engineering at K-State's Manhattan campus for more than 20 years.

Kuhlman received his bachelor's and master's degrees from K-State and his doctorate from Oklahoma State University, all in agricultural engineering.

As a licensed professional engineer and a pilot, Kuhlman said he has access to more than 40 aircrafts in K-State-Salina's training programs.

"I love technology and the latest in technology, so this college is kind of a natural fit," he said.

Kuhlman is an active member of the Kansas Society of Professional Engineers; American Society for Engineering Education; American Society of Agricultural and Biological Engineers; and Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association. He said he has more than 140 publications to his credit and has received more than $430,000 in grants.

Kuhlman also said he has a patent for a grain elevator yield monitoring device.

Police kill possible dog-wolf breed

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An animal that was possibly part wolf was shot and killed Friday, July 9, near Sunset Zoological Park, 2333 Oak Drive.

Riley County Animal Control Warden Kevin Dorritie shot the dog with a .22-caliber rifle after a failed attempt to tranquilize the animal, said Capt. John Doehling of the Riley County Police Department.

Police said they believe it may be a mix of dog and wolf.

"It was a hybrid, so they say," Doehling said.

The dog, which appeared feral, was unapproachable on foot. Dorritie hid in the back of a pick-up truck and killed the dog, Doehling said.

The animal had to be euthanized after being shot, Doehling said.

Its carcass is in the possession of animal control, said Lynn Schumacher, shelter control supervisor for the T. Russell Reitz Regional Animal Shelter, 605 Levee Drive.

The case is still under investigation because there is an individual in the area who is responsible for breeding wolf-hybrid animals, Schumacher said.

TO THE POINT

Local businesses win, lose

With Manhattan growing and becoming more industrialized, more nation-wide companies are taking over.

To the point is an editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Best Buy is the latest example of large businesses that are joining Manhattan's economy. The store, which will open in October, will make a change in the city that may put mom and pop stores out of business.

Instead of going to a locally owned store, students are more apt to go someplace where they know exactly where to find something. Instead of helping increase Manhattan's economy, they are buying into corporate America.

It's not that we're not excited about having companies like Best Buy in Manhattan, but it's time we all stop and think about the small businesses that have been here for a while. They deserve our business as much as, or even more than, the companies that get their income from all over the nation.

People are likely to shop where they know what to expect. The question is, will students make a choice to shop at businesses that have been around for a long time or will they buy into corporate America?

North Korea missile situation should not be treated lightly

ZACHARY T. ECKELS

I remember seeing the world mourn for America in the months following the fall of the Twin Towers. Videos of people grieving for us surfaced from all corners of the globe. For a brief period, it appeared that the world really was on our side.

It was very comforting to see those images, almost like a long lost friend making an appearance at a funeral.

Since then, it has really grown to disturb me that Americans never seem to be on the other side of this support system.

Sure, we hear news briefs on some train bombing in Madrid, or maybe we paid attention for a few hours when London had its subway attacked.

But as quickly as the news hits, our attention span wafts away, and we're right back to the national news.

I was again reminded of our typical response July 4, when North Korea test-fired its missiles.

I've had several discussions over the launch, and I listened and read every news report I could find.

So far, our reactions were all the same: relief that they couldn't hit our mainland, followed by a huge decrease in how important the situation is to us.

Now, it is a great feeling to know we are out of the reach of such an unpredictable country. The problem is that many countries are still in the line of fire, and the lives of thousands of innocent people, including U.S. troops, are at risk.

Even though six of the seven missiles launched were failures, the Taepodong-2 proved that North Korea has the technology to launch chemical or even nuclear weapons at South Korea or Japan.

And even if you disagree that one foreign life is equal to one American life, there are nearly 150,000 Americans in these two countries alone, according to www.globalsecurity.com.

So, now that this situation has reached such high tensions, what can we do about it?

Militarily, we have two options. We can use a preemptive strike to disable all their missile-launching sites, or we can sit patiently and wait for them to attack another country first.

The first of these two options, a preemptive strike, is most likely a horrible idea to even consider.

All missile-launching sites that we miss in North Korea would presumably fire everything they had, resulting in thousands of innocent casualties.

And since we can't find a single weapon of mass destruction in Iraq, I'm guessing there would be plenty of sites we would overlook.

The other, and more probable plan of action, involves letting a madman play the first card.

The end result of this scenario would most likely be thousands of U.S. infantry troops having to fight to stop an invasion into South Korea.

Once again, thousands of people will likely die.

We now find ourselves damned if we do and damned if we don't. There is little we can do now that we are trapped in this situation.

The best thing we can do is use this case as an example on how important foreign relations are in today's world.

If the Bush administration needs any assistance in this area, they could always ask Bill Clinton for help.

Waiting for opened doors reveals lack of confidence

LOLA SHRIMPLIN

Opening doors.

You wouldn't think it would be that hard, but from observing people on campus, it seems to be an impossibility.

I've seen people go out of their way to go in a door that has already been opened, even if they have to cut through huge throngs of people to do it.

Now, I'm not one for refusing to hold a door open for someone, nor am I one to deny someone help, but I've seen some ridiculous maneuvers just to go through an open door.

What is so hard about opening a door for yourself?

I'm not saying if you are holding a ton of books or if it's raining like mad, you should not accept an open door. But when people wait for someone else to open a door so they don't have to do it themselves, something is wrong.

It's symptomatic of a larger disease in this country: a dependence on others to care for you.

Reliance on others can be a good thing, but not when it creates a learned helplessness in which a person requires someone else to pay the bills, buy the food and assume all care of a person's well being.

I've seen instances of learned helplessness that just make me want to slap somebody.

Girls who won't go in a store without their boyfriend to hold their hand while they shop are one such instance.

We should all practice interdependence and rely on others for support when times are tough, but when helping becomes leaning, and leaning becomes carrying, it's too much.

If you aren't able to go into a store alone, aren't able to open a door by yourself and there is no physical or mental reason for that, then that's just plain laziness.

I hate to be a harbinger of doom, but if that's the direction this country is taking and no one notices, we are in real trouble.

Sitting back and waiting for someone to care for you isn't a good idea. I hesitate to sound too conservative, but taking charge of your own life is a good thing. It isn't who is going to let you, as the woman said; it's who is going to stop you.

Waiting for someone to open a door is like asking someone to let you enter. Just open the door yourself and go in. Don't ask permission. Just do it.

Learned helplessness is the phrase of the day.

Sure, we've all gone through doors others have opened, in one way or another. It makes it easier for those who follow in our path to have a guideline.

But when people actually stop and wait for someone to go before them so they won't have to forge a path themselves, there is a problem.

I see these people who go out of their way to go through a door someone else has already opened, or wait until their boyfriend will go into the store with them and they depend entirely on someone else for their care. It worries me.

If we wait on others to go before us, if we are afraid to move without someone to hold our hand, then where will we go?

How can we get there if we aren't willing to take the first step and open an unopened door?

Best Buy set to open before November in Manhattan

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students will be able to shop at Manhattan's Best Buy this October.

The store is ranked as the No. 1 specialty retailer in consumer electronics, personal computers, entertainment software and appliances, according to its Web site. The Manhattan store will be located on North Third Street, near Bluemont Avenue.

"The ground-breaking ceremony was around in the first of March," said Lyle Butler, president and chief executive officer of Manhattan area Chamber of Commerce. "They try to keep us updated with progress. They say that they plan to open the last week of October."

Butler said having a Best Buy in town will serve two main purposes.

"It will provide local shoppers with another shopping option to buy things," he said. "It will also help to continue to position Manhattan as a regional shopping center."

At other Best Buy stores in Kansas, Best Buy employees are required to ask for customers' zip codes when they make a purchase. This has helped in the decision for Manhattan as a prime location choice, because several customers are from the Manhattan and Fort Riley area, Butler said.

"Best Buy looked at the market for Manhattan and approached us about building a store," he said.

In a study completed by graduate students of K-State's College of Business Administration, students were asked what businesses they would most like to have included in the Manhattan shopping market. Butler said Best Buy was one of the top stores listed by students.

"Many students said they have to travel to Topeka or Kansas City to shop at Best Buy," Butler said. "But now they won't have to and that's more money that will be spent in Manhattan."

Justin Barber, company spokesman, said one of the considerations Best Buy takes into account before putting up a new store is how much of a convenience it would be to customers.

"We want to make sure it's easy for customers to get to," Barber said. "We want to be able to assist customers in that way."

Barber said Best Buy will give residents and students more access to electronics and many other products.

"It will be very helpful to students," he said. "They will have another place to get iPods, notebook computers, and other things."

Conner Smith, senior in architectural engineering, said he will appreciate being able to possibly get products cheaper and with greater ease at Best Buy.

"It will be nice to be able to use gift cards from Christmas in Manhattan," he said.

Smith said he also thinks the store will be of benefit especially to the college students.

"It's a college town, so there's definitely a need for it," he said. "We will have better access to technology."

More than 200 people withstood the sweltering heat Saturday, July 8, at the Larry Norvell Band Shell in City Park, to hear eight performances by local and national jazz artists including Kathy Kosins and the K-State Latin Jazz Ensemble.

Titled "Jazz at the Core," this year's festival was a continuation of annual jazz festivals sponsored by the Union Program Council.

UPC began the jazz festival six years ago as a partnership with the Midnight Blue Jazz Quintet and the International Association for Jazz Education.

Last year, UPC combined with the Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation's Arts in the Park series for the event.

"They already had a following with the Arts in the Park followers, and we had jazz lovers," said Beth Bailey, assistant director of the K-State Student Union. "The combination went over well."

Meghan Newman, sophomore in biology and UPC volunteer, said the jazz festival is for the people.

"This is something we put on for the benefit of the community," Newman said.

Kathy Kosins, Detroit, was one of the more famous performers. She previously sang and arranged background music for Don Was in the early 1980s and performed with his band, according to a press release.

Aaron Graversen, senior in music education, participated with the Latin Jazz Ensemble, playing the tenor saxophone.

A member of the ensemble for more than two years, Graversen said he enjoys being part of the ensemble.

"Getting to know the music that is in my personal culture is one of the best parts," he said.

New K-State police cars waste gas; other cars would save university cash

Dear editor,

I was dropping my wife off at work on campus recently when I noticed that the campus police drive new Dodge V8 sedans. I found this ridiculous for two reasons.

First, these cars aren't cheap to purchase or to fuel. These high-horsepower cars get very poor fuel economy, and I would think that had they spent the money on a hybrid, that K-State would have saved a bundle in gasoline.

Second, does the K-State Police Department get into so many high-speed chases that they need this kind of horsepower?

I would think that they would call in the Riley County Police Department when a situation like that arises.

I suspect that the campus police could ride bicycles and catch traffic offenders better than in a car. Or how about using an electric golf cart?

I feel that students pay enough for tuition that the least the university could do is spend it wisely by using energy-efficient vehicles.

I have a friend who has a Toyota Hybrid that gets about 70 miles per gallon in town.

According to the Dodge Web site, the Dodge Magnum gets about 14 mpg in town.

Hybrid owners get tax benefits from the government, too.

The list price on the Toyota Hybrid is about the same as a Dodge Magnum according to Web sites that I have looked at.

So, please do a story to help me understand what the logic is behind this decision of cars for the campus cops.

HOUSE APPROVES BILL AGAINST INTERNET GAMBLING

WASHINGTON D.C. – The House approved a bill Wednesday, July 5, that attempts to kill Internet gambling by cutting off the flow of money.

The bill, approved on a 317-93 vote, would ban Internet gambling outright, and would target the banks that help funnel the money from American gamblers to the Internet gambling sites. The fate of the bill in the Senate is uncertain, given the short amount of time left in the session before the lawmakers break for the campaign season.

SOUTH LOUISIANA WILTS IN SEVERE DROUGHT

CENTERVILLE, La. – After dealing with too much water, southern Louisianans must now cope with far too little: within this past century, the area has never been so dry.

The drought started in April of last year, and since then only hurricanes Katrina and Rita have overfilled rain gauges.

Despite devastating flooding, climatologists worry Louisiana is on the verge of exceptional drought conditions.

TWO COLLEGE ATHLETES ARRESTED AFTER RAPE OF 11-YEAR-OLD GIRL

FRESNO, Calif. – More arrests are likely in the rape of an 11-year-old girl by as many as 10 men, most of whom are football players at local community colleges, Fresno police said.

Two men were arrested in connection with the attack on Saturday, July 8. Police have identified eight others as possible suspects, police said.

While the girl was inside one of the apartments, she allegedly was sexually assaulted multiple times by several men.

Mackey Davis, 20, and Eddie Scott, 19, were arrested on suspicion of child molestation with a victim under 14 and oral copulation with a victim under 18. Both played wide receiver at Reedley College last season, according to a team roster.

WEATHER DECIMATES U.S. BARRIER REEF, 3RD LONGEST IN WORLD

DRY TORTUGAS NATIONAL PARK, Fla. – In the waters of Florida's Dry Tortugas National Park, corals have been damaged by hurricanes and disease and bleaching.

Eight hurricanes in two years and a plague of disease in the Caribbean have damaged the colorful, thick open-water coral reefs in the 100-square-mile park off Florida's southwest coast.

With another hurricane season under way and diseases getting an early start this year, scientists surveying the reef expressed heightened concern for the fragile corals.

Various items often left in hotels

By Jamie Smidt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It has happened to most people driving or flying home from vacation. Suddenly, with a feeling of mild panic, they realized they left something in their hotel room.

"We do get a lot of cell phone chargers left on the desks. Also swimming trunks behind bathroom doors and clothes in the drawers, as well as glasses, cameras and pillows," said Donna Epperson, executive housekeeper at the Manhattan Holiday Inn and Holidome, 530 Richards Drive.

Sometimes guests will leave more scandalous items.

"Often guests will leave dirty socks and underwear, dental retainers, used methods of birth control and dirty magazines," said Brandi Day, housekeeper at Fairfield Inn by Marriott, 300 Colorado St.

More expensive forgotten items include contact lenses that were put into cups and then thrown away and wedding rings and bands that were taken off to wash hands.

Other miscellaneous jewelry rank among the most expensive things left behind, Epperson said.

"Diamond jewelry is often forgotten by our guests," said Day,

Although some have experienced this first hand, or at least know someone else who has, only about 20 percent of guests actually call the hotel in search for lost items, Epperson said.

The Holiday Inn and the Fairfield Inn, like most hotels, have a policy for forgotten items.

"We keep them for 90 days, then discard," Epperson said.

The Fairfield Inn also holds lost items for 90 days, Day said.

Occasionally, Epperson will donate clothing or other re-usable items to shelters and allow employees to take things they might want.

When guests do call looking for belongings they've lost, Epperson will usually mail it to them, cash on delivery.

Family members of the guests who might live nearby have also come to the hotel to collect items.

In some cases, the hotel will store the items if the guest will be returning to the area soon.

Since the Holiday Inn has a large collection of various cell phone chargers, if a guest has forgotten theirs, Epperson will offer to let them use one that has been left by another guest.

Child has first probable case of West Nile

By Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Harvey County child has the state's first probable case of West Nile Virus, the Kansas Department of Health and Environment announced Friday, July 7.

The school-age child first showed symptoms June 24, but was not hospitalized.

The case is probable because all of the symptoms are consistent with the virus, but can't be confirmed until all relevant tests have been performed.

The first human case of West Nile virus in Kansas was in June 2005, when Kansas was the first state to report the virus.

However, Colorado and Mississippi have already each reported one case of human West Nile Virus. Texas has reported two.

In 2005, there were 25 confirmed cases of West Nile in Kansas, with one death.

The KDHE has found mosquito collecting and testing to be the most reliable tool for monitoring the presence of West Nile in Kansas.

This year they have collected at 15 sites. As of Thursday, July 7, all tests have been negative.

Dr. Gail Hansen, KDHE state epidemiologist, said people should use insect repellent with picaridin or DEET, wear protective clothing and drain standing water.

"With he return of West Nile Virus season in Kansas, we should all take the necessary precautions to protect ourselves against what can sometimes result in a very severe disease, even death," Hansen said.

Mild symptoms for West Nile include fever, headache, rash, general muscle aches and weakness, gastrointestinal signs and inflammation of the lymph nodes.

More serious cases include severe headache, high fever, difficulty walking and talking, a coma or even death.

TERROR STRIKES HEART OF INDIA

BOMBAY, India – Seven bombs exploded on packed commuter trains and at stations in India's financial hub, Bombay, killing more than 160 people and wounding nearly 500 more on the morning of July 11.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the blasts that took place within about 10 minutes of each other during evening rush hour.

But suspicion on July 11 was expected to center on Muslim militants fighting New Delhi's rule in disputed Kashmir, who have been blamed for several bomb attacks in India in the past.

62-YEAR-OLD BRITISH WOMAN GIVES BIRTH

LONDON – A 62-year-old child psychologist has given birth to a boy, becoming the oldest British woman to birth a child.

Patti Farrant – known professionally as Patricia Rashbrook – delivered her son, J.J., by Caesarean section Wednesday, according to the Daily Mail newspaper. The baby was conceived after fertility treatments.

Farrant has three grown children from a previous marriage. The baby is the first child of her husband, John, 60, an education management consultant.

CHINA'S PIRACY HURTS ITS OWN INDUSTRIES

BEIJING – Kingsoft Corp.'s English-Chinese dictionary program is used on most of China's 60 million PCs. That's the good news. The bad news: Kingsoft doesn't make any money from it because 90 percent of those copies are pirated.

One by one, the Beijing-based software maker has seen its sales of such popular products destroyed after black market producers flooded the market with cheap copies.

Today, Kingsoft's 600 programmers focus on making what it hopes can't be copied – online games, business and anti-virus programs that have to be linked to its own computers in order to function.

"Piracy has had a big impact on us, making it so we can't get powerful and compete with Microsoft," said Ren Jian, a former Microsoft manager and Kingsoft's chief operating officer.

Kingsoft is far from alone. Rampant Chinese piracy of music, movies and software that raises howls of protest from the United States, Europe and elsewhere is hitting China's fledgling creative industries hardest of all. Robbed of sales in their key home market, companies are short of money to develop new products to compete with foreign rivals.

Attorney encourages students to get living wills

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State Attorney Sarah Barr has a living will, and she said she ranks it among her top three most important things.

Barr said a living will and a durable power of attorney should be kept together in a place loved ones can access. A copy should also be given to a person's doctor.

Making a living will helps explain what measures should be taken to protect what a person wants if they are brain dead or in a coma. A person could decide they wanted every measure taken to protect their life or that they only want water with no food, Barr said.

Mercy Hospital offers free living wills, said Nancy Knopp, director of case management at Mercy Health Center.

Notaries are present, and all a person will need is the name of a person or persons who will be the power of attorney – the person who the will authorizes to have the power.

"Anyone who is over the age of 18 really, really should get the durable power of attorney," Knopp said.

DIALYSIS | Many patients with similar problems understand Buchwald's decision to avoid dialysis

drink a couple cups of coffee," Martinez said. "That's about it."

She said one thing she misses are certain foods she's had to remove from her diet because they contain too much potassium and phosphorus, which the dialysis machine can't control nearly as well as her kidneys could. For example, Martinez said she cannot have watermelon, potatoes, cantaloupe or tomatoes.

She, like most people in the room, hopes to get a kidney transplant sometime soon so she'll be able to live without depending on the machine. Martinez said one friend and one nephew have volunteered an organ, but hasn't learned if either are a match for her yet.

To her left, a man in his 40s is being disconnected from his tubes.

Reggie McGowan is a big man with a dark beard and a strong voice. He said he's been on dialysis for more than eight years, since a virus caused his kidneys to fail.

McGowan said the machine removes not only toxins from a patient's blood, but also excess fluid from the body. He said he lost more than 12 pounds that day from the treatment.

The most important factor in dealing with dialysis is attitude, McGowan said, adding that he didn't necessarily like the treatment, but he learned to deal with it. He said he's noticed a strong improvement in quality of life since starting treatment, remembering life when the toxic buildup in his body made everything difficult.

"Used to take me two hours to put on my damned socks," McGowan said. Now he feels really tired after the treatment, he said, but feels "like a new man" after a couple hours of rest.

McGowan said he understood Buchwald's decision to let nature run its course, especially since the writer had had a leg amputated, and because the treatment isn't very pleasant.

"I don't like the alternative situation either," he said.

Donna McBride sits farther down the line. She's had diabetes since she was 19, she said, and it caused her to lose a kidney in 1968.

McBride said the other one started going five years ago, and although it still has some function, it's not enough, so she needs the machine. Her face reads of discomfort.

"To be honest with you, I don't want to be here," she said. "I hate being tied down."

McBride said she also understood Buchwald's decision, but preferred living enough to endure dialysis.

Her husband has offered his kidney to get her off the machine, she said, but she still doesn't know if she wants the surgery. McBride said she has a lot of fears about surgery, even though the treatment frightens her as well.

"I've had some fear that these things will come apart," she said, pointing to the connections of tubing on her chest, "but they've assured me that's very unlikely."

As for Buchwald, news reports have him staying alive longer than expected. The trade publication Editor and Publisher quoted him answering a call from Tom Brokaw with the words, "Hey, I'm still here, and I don't know why."

Josephine Martinez, a dialysis patient, waits as she is connected to a dialysis machine by a nurse.

KUHLMAN | K-State Salina dean credits GlobalFlyer for his award

Each of the 10 regions in the Kansas Society of Professional Engineers has the option to choose its own engineer of the year, said Glenn Knak, state director for the Smoky Valley region of Kansas Society of Professional Engineers. The regions then submit their choices for a nominee to the state, he said.

Knak, who also is the awards chairman for the Smoky Valley chapter, said the awards chairmen from the district levels serve on the committee that chooses the state winner.

"The primary reason he (Kuhlman) was chosen and made him stand out was his work with the GlobalFlyer and how he was able to involve students in it," Knak said.

Kuhlman said the bittersweet aspect of the award was that the ceremony took place the same day GlobalFlyer was inducted into the National Air and Space Museum of the Smithsonian Institution.

Despite not being able to attend the induction ceremony, Kuhlman said he was humbled to be chosen as engineer of the year.

"There are some tremendous engineering projects that are completed around the state of Kansas," he said. Kuhlman deserves the honor, especially for his role in bringing the GlobalFlyer project to Kansas, said Pat Rinearson, May 2006 K-State-Salina graduate with a bachelor's degree in airway science-professional pilot.

"It's an honor for him, and it's an honor for our school," said Rinearson, who also assisted Fossett in mission control for GlobalFlyer. "(Kuhlman) has so much practical experience related to our campus."

Students share shopping, cooking tips for those on a tight budget

By Brendan Praeger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Being away from mom's home cooking, trying to manage a hectic schedule of a college student and not having the time, students choose their meals for a variety of reasons.

Between class and work, many students do not have much time to cook their food.

"I like something that doesn't take long to prepare" Lewis Lomax, senior in history said. "Pizza is great because you can just toss it in the oven; it doesn't require a lot of work."

Canned and frozen foods are quick for students who don't have a lot of time to spend preparing meals.

"Spaghetti-O's are definitely my favorite meal," Erika Brunson, senior in English said, "I like eating them cold, too, so they take no time to prepare."

Other meals that require little to no preparation include salads, sandwiches and cereal.

"I sometimes have cereal for lunch and dinner," Lomax said. "That's probably why we run out of milk so fast."

For students who want a quick snack on the go, there are several cheap and healthy options. Fruits like apples and oranges are easy to eat while walking between classes.

For students who have a little more time to prepare food there are many cheap options that also taste great.

"Hamburger Helper is what I eat most of the time," said Alex Blecha, senior in park management and conservation.

With many flavors, Blecha said Hamburger Helper is very fulfilling.

"It's also delicious as a leftover," Blecha said. "If you make it once, it will feed you for a couple of days."

Blecha also said he likes to change up his Hamburger Helper with different spices, giving it the specific flavor he wants.

"I especially like adding hot sauce to my meals, almost anything will taste better if hot sauce is in it," Blecha said.

Many students are limited on monitoring what they eat because of financial constraints.

"I would like to eat healthier food, but I'm usually too poor to really take that into consideration," Brunson said.

One easy way to save money on food is to shop at alternate locations or purchase non-name-brand items.

"I like to shop at Aldi to save money," Brunson said. "It's the same stuff for half the price and it's just as good."

Aldi, 140 Poyntz Ave, offers groceries at lower prices than some of the other stores in the area.

"I figured it wouldn't be as good because it's cheap, but I've never had a bad experience with anything I bought there" Brunson said.

While it's easy to save money by avoiding name-brand groceries, sometimes the difference in quality isn't worth the savings.

"I have to buy Velveeta cheese" Lomax said. "The Great Value stuff tastes like plastic. I also like most of the cheap cereal, but I have to buy the real Captain Crunch."

Sometimes the lower-priced items are actually preferred.

"The Great Value Louisiana hot sauce tastes better than anything else, and it's way cheaper," Blecha said. You just have to try the lower priced items, sometimes they actually taste better.

Name brand/ generic	Price	Taste
Kellogg's Corn Flakes/Great Value Corn Flakes	$2.92/$1.33	These products taste exactly the same, no need to pay more than twice the price for the same thing.
Kraft Macaroni & Cheese/Great Value Macaroni & Cheese	92 cents/50 cents	The Great Value brand has cheaper-tasting cheese.
Tabasco sauce/Great Value Lousiana Hot Sauce	$2.58/76 cents	The Louisiana Hot Sauce actually tastes better, and the bottle is twice as big.
Tony's Pizza/Totino's Pizza	$2/98 cents	The Totino's crust tastes like cardboard, and it's smaller.

'Dusk' more electric sounding

"Dusk and Summer"
Grade: B+
CD review by Adrianne DeWeese

Hopeless romantics look no further. Your summer album has arrived.

Dashboard Confessional is back with its fifth album, which is aptly titled "Dusk And Summer" for its lyrical overtones and melodies that seem to mimic the band members' origin city of Boca Raton, Fla.

The album's lead producer, Don Gilmore, also produced Dashboard's 2004 single and Spider-Man 2 track "Vindicated."

Since its forming in 2000, Dashboard's sound has evolved. Carrabba and his band mates might have traded their original acoustic sound for a more electric and rock-guitar sound, but his lyrics have not changed.

Each track from "Dusk" offers a story of love, heartbreak and everything in between.

The first track and single, "Don't Wait," does its job in setting the emotionally charged stage for the rest of the album.

A romantic sunset is not far from one's mind as Carrabba sexily whines the chorus: "Don't wait/The road is now/A sudden sea/And suddenly/ You're deep enough/To lay your armor down."

The album debuted at the number-two spot on the Billboard 200 list, and it peaked at No. 1 in the U.S. iTunes Music Store June 29, just two days after its release.

But Carrabba isn't going to take the plunge if he continues his success as a lyricist.

It is clear that this man pours his entire heart into every word, and his allegory by crying and choke-singing is a formula that bodes well with Dashboard fans.

Above all else, "Dusk" is a deep – yet fun – album to get lost in during a lazy summer afternoon.

Sold out show, worth waiting

"Pirates of the Caribbean 2"
Grade: A-
Movie Review by Christina Forsberg

The desire to see Pirates of the Caribbean 2 beat not only box office records for first day sales, but swamped Seth Childs Cinema in Manhattan for the weekend.

Saturday, not Friday, I tried to go see "Pirates of the Caribbean: Dead Man's Chest." With plenty of time before the 8:10 p.m. showing, my group arrived to find the show sold out at Seth Childs for the next three shows.

We bought tickets for the next day instead, and when we came back, a sign outside also indicated that the next three shows were sold out that day, too.

Gore Verbinski hit treasure again. The movie was worth a pretty matinee penny to see. Don't worry, Johnny Depp once again nailed the character of Captain Jack Sparrow. Be careful to pay attention, because the story moves fast and there's a lot of action-packed, creatively choreographed fight scenes.

This time around, there seemed to be more animated computer graphics, especially since Davy Jones and crew were each half-man, half-sea creature, but the effects were quality and the one aspect of the movie that won me over, even if plot didn't. Whatever the plot lacked it made up for with some clever twists.

The movie did leave something to be desired: with a cliffhanger and a surprise twist at the end, there's no doubt that the third movie will please.

ACCESSORIES MAKE THE FIT

ALEX PEAK

While clothing is probably the most essential part of an outfit, hair, shoes and accessories also play crucial roles in pulling off the urbane operation known as "chicness."

Taming the wild mane

Hair: You can curl it, cut it, dye it, fry it, pin it and braid it. Here are some tips to help tame the wild stallion that might be growing out of your head:

• Although it saves a few bucks and your hair might be manageable, don't buy all-in-one shampoo and conditioners. Buy shampoo and conditioners that suit your hair. For example, if you have color-treated hair, then buy shampoo and conditioner for color-treated hair.

• If you're going to use a blow dryer or flat iron, make sure you use a heat protectant. Your hair might seem like it's invincible and can endure anything, but it's not; it can suffer irreparable damage from heat.

• Trim split ends at least every other month. When your hair starts to look like a broomstick, that's a sign that you need a haircut.

• When used correctly, hairspray, gel, bobby pins and headbands can work wonders when disciplining wild mane.

Once you have your hair figured out, you can move on to other important factors like shoes and accessories.

Shoes are great

No matter what anyone says, you truly cannot have too many pairs of shoes.

Since this is summer, however, it is suggested that you stick to lighter and gentler styles. Allow clunky Doc Martens and knee-high boots to hibernate for a few months and pull out your tennis shoes, espadrilles and flip-flops.

• Tennis shoes: try for bright Pumas, Adidas or Kangaroos to add a lively bounce to your ensemble. However, be selective. An error in tennis shoes choice can give off the wrong impression. For example, when going out on the town, steer away from casual cross-trainers to avoid the I-just-came-from-the-gym-and-I-was-too-lazy-to-change-my-shoes look.

• Espadrilles and wedges: they are sexy and can be harmonized with anything from miniskirts to jeans. They can also be easier to manage than regular high heels or stilettos when walking extensive distances.

• Flip-flops and flats: Informal or dressy, these shoes are quite versatile. Stick to simple colors and patterns for work or play and sport sequins and other embellishments for fancier looks.

Now that you have the clothes, shoes and hair determined, it's time to consider accessories that will help enhance colors in the outfit and deliver a polished look.

Necklaces and bracelets

Necklaceshelp create a break between the hair, face, neck and clothes, while earrings are a dainty adornment along the way. Although matching your earrings and necklace isn't always practical, try to at least complement your jewelry with each other.

• Wear long beaded necklaces if you are wearing a plain shirt. These were made popular in the 1960s and are cute and come in all colors and sizes.

With all of the fixings in their respectable places, you should be delivering a well-established ensemble. You have earned your sigh of relief. Unlike many passé people, you have your hair, shoes, and accessories modishly in order.

Youth shares experience after being hunted by an Internet stalker

By Annette Lawless
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jessica* didn't think anything of it, really.

She thought she was talking to people she knew, teenagers she could relate to. She, after all, was just a part of an online community that many deemed safe.

She, however, was wrong.

It was four summers ago that Jessica, only 13 at the time, became a victim of an Internet stalker.

At the time, Jessica said she felt no sense of anxiety about the situation.

Now at 17, Jessica works at a women's center in her hometown and feels comfortable talking about the experience that could have cost her life.

"He just seemed so nice. From what I knew, he was young and attractive – just like me," she said. "But you just wouldn't have guessed this behavior out of him, not after all of the deep conversations we had prior to that summer."

Jessica had started to visit Web sites like www.xanga.com, Yahoo! chat rooms and other online forums. She said she wanted to be heard, and by June that summer, one teenager, Nathan*, started paying attention to her.

The two met at an Internet chat room, where Jessica said she wanted to find

Fines for parking increase

By Megan Crane
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As of July 1, parking without a valid parking permit can cost a driver $50.

The change was made to prevent people without valid permits from parking in lots and to keep illegal parking to a minimum said Gary Leitnaker, assistant vice president of human resources and parking.

Since there is a shortage of parking on the K-State campus, the parking council voted to raise the cost of parking tickets.

Although Student Governing Association voted for the increase, the change has left some students shocked.

Kelly Stewart, senior in marketing, said was running late to turn in homework when she got her ticket.

"I got back to the car, saw the ticket and thought it was $18. I looked at it the next morning and saw $50 and thought it was a mistake," Stewart said. "I just think it's crazy that it cost me $50 to hand in my homework."

If students receive a ticket and do actually have a valid permit, they can contact parking services. With proof of the valid permit the ticket cost will be reduced to a $2 ticket.

As part of SGA services, there is also a parking citations appeal board to hear students wanting to appeal a parking ticket, SGA Attorney General Joe Vossen said.

Parking without a valid parking permit isn't the only category for tickets that went up in price. If your meter expires it is now a $10 fine, and if you're parked in a wrong area the price is $20. For a full list of citation prices go to www.k-state.edu/parking/regs and click on the "2006-07 Regulations."

Hale Library to be open for 24 hours

Megan Crane
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Starting October 3, students will be able to study 24 hours a day, Monday through Friday in Hale Library.

"On average during the semester, between 10 p.m. and 2 a.m., there are more than 500 people coming in to study. The building is very crowded and we felt the need to extend hours," said Laurel Littrell, head of general information services department for Hale Library.

Summer hours will still be shorter, checkout desks will still close at 10 p.m., and weekends won't be 24-hour, but the library staff said they believe this is a step in the right direction.

"The idea is to provide a quiet place to study. At this point, our main goal is keeping the building open, materials accessible, even if not checkout," said Roberta Johnson, director of financial services and facilities.

With the extension of library hours come bigger expenses. The largest expense will be providing for security and custodial services.

So far, no estimate is available regarding how much more the library will be paying for these extended hours, but the amount paid to campus security is estimated to double.

Students can take part by helping to keep costs as low as possible.

Saturday hours will be 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. The library will be available 24 hours a day starting 1 p.m. Sundays through 8 p.m. Fridays.

Rising temperatures threaten health, environment

Lightening brightens the sky Thursday morning, July 13, over Anderson Hall. Rain this weekend, which is expected by the National Weather Service, could provide relief from the current heat wave.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With temperatures in the high 90s and low 100s, Kansas is seeing the effects of a heat wave it hadn't seen for two years. In Manhattan, the National Weather Service expects a 106-degree day Wednesday, July 19, and has issued a heat advisory valid through 5 p.m.

Darrel Smith, meteorologist for Topeka's NWS, said the heat is similar to what Kansas temperatures should be, rather than last year's mild summer.

"It isn't unusual," Smith said. "Our last couple summers haven't been the normal Kansas summers. When we get a pattern like we have now, people haven't seen it and they think it is unusual. It isn't, not many records will be broken."

Even still, the heat is influencing most of the country.

Temperatures in the East and desert Southwest are climbing and this leads to concern about possible wild fires, and lack of rain may increase the likelihood in parts of Kansas.

With the high temperatures come heat and sun related illnesses. Mercy Regional Health Center, 1823 College Ave., has seen a slight increase in the number of patients needing treatment for heat-related illnesses in the past week.

"Heat-related illnesses can build and cause problems," said Larry Couchman, director of emergency services at Mercy. "They need to take precautions up front rather than when you have symptoms. If you have symptoms, you're behind the curve."

Simple things like drinking water and limiting exposure can go a long way.

"Adequate fluids are important," Couchman said. "If they're going to consume alcohol, it needs to be in moderation. I suggest-one bottle of water per alcoholic beverage. Also wear sun block, a SPF 30 or 40. When they take a break, get into the shade and out of the sun."

NEWS HIGHLIGHTS

KSU recruitment award
K-State's recruitment and admissions Web site has been ranked among the top 237 American university sites that won the gold award in Admission Advertising Awards, according to the Admissions Marketing Report. The site, consider.k-state.edu, was top in the Internet/Web site category among colleges with 20,000 or more students.

Campus roads close
As of July 18, the Denison Avenue and Claflin Road intersection will be closed to traffic until mid-August, but the Jardine Drive and Denison Avenue intersection is reopened, said Mark Taussig of K-State facilities planning in a campus media report. For the full story, go to www.kstatecollegian.com.

Soldier investigation
The investigation continues with the Fort Riley soldier who was shot on June 29 in Salina, Kan. Sgt. 1st Class Terry Hoffpauir, 35, of Orange, Texas, died June 30 at Via Christi Regional Medical Center in Wichita from a gunshot wound to the head. Police said they are now are looking at the shooting as a possibly self-inflicted instead of homicide.

Sparing change
Overall, 55 percent of Americans say the penny is a useful coin, while 43 percent say the government should do away with them.

THIS WEEK

A look at events that occurred during this week in history, other bizarre holidays, happenings

TODAY 1993: Introduction of 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell'

President Clinton announces new military gay rights law

Under its full title, "Don't Ask, Don't Tell, Don't Pursue, Don't Harass" was introduced as a compromise measure in 1993 by President Bill Clinton, who, while campaigning for the Presidency had promised to allow all citizens, regardless of sexual orientation, to serve openly in the military. This was a departure from the contemporary complete ban on those who are not heterosexual.

The policy was crafted by Colin Powell and has been maintained by Clinton's successor, George W. Bush. The policy is opposed by some pro- and anti-gay advocates alike.

"Don't Ask, Don't Tell" has come to describe any instance in which one person must keep their sexual orientation and any related attributes, including their family, a secret, but where deliberate lying would be undesirable.

More than 8,500 sexual minorities have been discharged since the enactment of the legislation. Additionally, in February 2005, the Government Accountability Office released estimates on the cost of the policy to the U.S. government, totaling nearly $200 million since 1993.

THURSDAY 1969: 1st moon walk

Apollo 11 was the first manned mission to land on the moon. This was the fifth human spaceflight of the Apollo program, and the third human voyage to the moon.

Launched on July 16, 1969, it carried Cmdr. Neil Armstrong, Command Module Pilot Michael Collins and Lunar Module Pilot Edwin "Buzz" Aldrin. On July 21, while Colins orbited above, Armstrong and Aldrin became the first humans on the moon.

Armstrong was the first person to set foot on the moon, saying, "That's one small step for man, one giant leap for mankind."

FRIDAY 1952: Comedic actor Robin Williams born

A manic prankster and lovable loose cannon, Robin Williams became a star in the 1970s TV series "Mork and Mindy." He played Mork from Ork, a sweetly nutty space alien learning about life on Earth.

Williams moved quickly into films, often playing wise, comic oddballs in heartfelt dramas. He won an Academy Award as the sympathetic psychologist who befriends Matt Damon in "Good Will Hunting."

In a more comic vein, he voiced a wacky genie in the Disney animated feature "Aladdin," played the strong-armed title sailor in 1980's "Popeye" and a grown-up Peter Pan in the 1991 Steven Spielberg movie "Hook." In addition to his on-screen performances, Williams has also been a stand-up comedian on Broadway and has appeared on TV shows, including "Whose Line Is It Anyway?"

SATURDAY 1993: Officers discover serial killer's house, multiple dismembered bodies

Upon a news tip, Milwaukee, Wis., police officers were led to find one of the grisliest scenes in modern history — the apartment of Jeffrey Dahmer. When fully searched, a house of horrors was revealed, littered with several heads in the refrigerator, two skulls on top of the computer and a 57-gallon drum containing several bodies decomposing in chemicals in the bedroom. There was also evidence to suggest that Dahmer had been eating some of his victims. Later, Dahmer confessed to 17 murders in all, dating back to his first victim in 1978. He was sentenced to trial, where he plead insanity, though it was denied. Eventually, he was sentenced to prison. A prison inmate killed him on Nov. 28, 1994.

SUNDAY National Hot Dog and Sausage Council Day

While July is known as National Hot Dog Month, July 23 is known as the National Hot Dog and Sausage Council Day, according to the National Hot Dog and Sausage Council.

Earlier this summer, the council reported that Americans will consume the infamous little red tubes of meat in record numbers this summer. More than 7 billion hot dogs will be eaten by Americans between Memorial Day and Labor Day. And during the July 4 weekend alone (the biggest hot dog holiday of the year), 155 million will be downed the council reports.

Every year, Americans eat an average of 60 hot dogs each. The most popular condiment adults use is mustard, while children prefer ketchup. Hot dogs are clearly one of the country's most loved, but often misunderstood, comfort foods. For more information, visit www.hot-dog.org.

MONDAY Watergate ruling

On July 24, 1974, the U.S. Supreme Court unanimously ruled that President Richard Nixon had to turn over White House tapes to the Watergate special prosecutor.

The term "Watergate" refers to a series of events, spanning from 1972 to 1975, which began with Nixon's administration's abuse of power toward the goal of undermining the Democratic Party and the opposition to the Vietnam War.

By August 1974, the prospect of impeachment was likely for Nixon. He resigned four days later on August 9. He was the first, and still only, U.S. president to resign from office.

TUESDAY 1978: 1st test tube baby born in England, despite controversy, little support

Despite moral controversy, the world's first test-tube baby, Louise Joy Brown, was born July 25, 1978, in Lancashire, England. The first successful treatment — known as in-vitro — in the United States took place in 1981 in Norfolk, Va. Today, as many as 1 percent of all births conceived in-vitro, with more 115,000 born in the United States to date. Information for this section is provided by www.holidayinsights.com.

RCPD provides police camp

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With about 20 children covering their ears, the Riley County Police Department Special Weapons and Tactics Unit demonstrated a flash-bang device Tuesday, July 18, at the police camp in Pottorf Hall at CiCo Park.

"I wasn't expecting it to be that loud. I felt it right here the worst," Jordyn Moldrup, homeschooled seventh grader said as she gestured to her stomach.

Seventh through ninth graders experience several different aspects of the RCPD and law enforcement in general at the camp, which will continue through Friday, July 21.

The RCPD bomb team, crime scene investigators and K-9 officers are participating in the camp.

The SWAT team was popular with the students and Trenton Kent, seventh grader from Eisenhower Middle School, said he enjoyed it.

Steven Doll |COLLEGIAN

Kansas Highway Patrol officer J.L. Riedel helps buckle Trenton Kent, 12, into a seat-belt convincer demonstration Tuesday, July 18, outside Pottorf Hall in CiCo Park during a youth police camp.

"I'm looking forward to the K-9 one," he said.

Lt. Kurt Moldrup, tactical medic for the team, is also an emergency medical technician.

Demonstrating the various aspects of the equipment carried by the officers, Lt. Moldrup said the pepper spray was ineffective in getting his daughter out of bed.

"I've done that in a room, and she won't get up," Lt. Moldrup said.

Officers receive life saving awards

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"I'm the walking dead," said Darrell Deibler, 75, of his being resuscitated after a heart attack April 6 at his residence, 1312 Wreath Ave.

Officer Les Newey of the Riley County Police Department saved Deibler's life when he performed cardiopulmonary resuscitation on Deibler.

"Dying's no big deal. That's the easy part," Deibler said. "The hard part is coming back to life."

Newey and Officer Richard Lewis were honored with the life-saving award for their actions by the Riley County Law Board on Monday, July 17.

Newey said he was responding to an alarm at a gas station by Westloop Shopping Center when a call came through about a man having a heart attack.

Newey said he arrived at the residence in less than 60 seconds and saw Deibler sitting on the couch, slumped over and blue.

He pulled Deibler off the couch and performed cardiopulmonary resuscitation, breaking five ribs in the process.

Newey said Lt. Jay Mills was watching through the window, and when Deibler was taken out of the house by EMS, Mills asked him if he realized he had just saved the man's life.

"I still have those words ringing in my ears," Newey said.

Newey said he gave Deibler The Book of Mormon and inscribed on the first page that Deibler was a direct answer to his prayers.

"I think my belief is what saved him," Newey said referring to his morning prayer that he be able to make a difference.

Officer Richard Lewis also earned a life-saving award for his efforts on the night of March 31, 2006.

Lewis said he was driving home from his son's track meet when he noticed a woman sitting on the railing of the Kansas Highway 177 viaduct.

Engaging the woman in conversation, he determined that she was suicidal and pulled her back from the ledge.

The woman was later transported to Mercy Regional Health Center.

Lewis said the woman has since made contact with him several times.

"She and her family have expressed their thanks several times over, " Lewis said.

TO THE POINT

Parking services unpopular

K-State Parking Services definitely isn't aiming for popularity. Once again, it raised the fees for all on-campus parking violations and increased the cost for parking passes.

To the point is an editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

On some levels, we recognize the necessity for moderate increases. As the maintenance and preservation costs go up, the fees will also rise.

While some of the fee changes are small, like $10 instead of $8 for an expired meter, others are quite dramatic. With the new rules, you will be charged $50 for parking on campus without a pass.

Does no one understand that we're poor and starving and sometimes so late to class that we simply do not have time to find a spot 10 blocks off campus?

We recognize that the parking employees are just doing their jobs, and the average bright-vested ticket distributor has nothing to do with the increased costs and added annoyance. They're probably even nice people. And we are grateful that they allow you to appeal the full price of the ticket if you have a reasonable cause, but we're just wondering: will it ever end?

And in the meantime, we'll keep our tar and feathers away from the parking folks.

Or, at least, we'll try.

Grandpa's message

Relative's death marks turning point for writer

The first dream came shortly after my grandfather's death in 2003.

I've had dreams before, but few were as sharp, or lingered with me long after I woke up, as the one of my Grandpa Gibson.

I was sitting in his chair at our house, and he was standing in front of me. He wanted to sit down, and I was telling him that he didn't need to stay anymore – that we, I, would protect Grandma Gibson.

I continued to have dreams of him as the years passed. I dreamt that he and my Grandmother Shrimplin were playing cards. I dreamt that he came and was holding Momma Kitty. And I reassured him again that everyone was fine.

Yet he wouldn't go.

He did pass on to another place. I felt it when he died. But he refused, with that stubborn will of his, to leave completely.

My grandfather was a great man. His will was iron, and he performed a job he hated for years and years because it was expected of him. He was a teacher, but at heart he was a farmer.

He grew up in a time when farming wasn't profitable and there weren't many ways to support a family – a wife and three girls, whom he raised to be as stubborn, determined and intelligent as he was.

When my father bought some farmland just south of Deerfield, Kan., he asked Grandpa if he would live in the house with Grandma and farm the land.

As far as I know, those were the happiest years of Grandpa's life.

So when he wasn't leaving, and going wherever it is he was supposed to go, I knew it was because he was still trying to protect someone he cared about.

I just didn't know it was me.

LOLA SHRIMPLIN

My Grandma Shrimplin visited me regularly, so I thought nothing of it when I dreamed of Grandpa. She told me when my Grandma Gibson was going to have a heart attack, and she was in my dream of Grandpa. I don't know what card game they were playing, but they were having fun while they waited. Grandma Shrimplin wouldn't leave because of different reasons than Grandpa Gibson.

Recently I started my way into a profession I love. I'm poorer than hell, but I'm happier than I've ever been.

I started attending the College Avenue United Methodist Church, and was startled to find I actually enjoy it. I don't go every Sunday, but I go most of the time and I always feel good when I leave.

I have new friends and feel like I know what I am doing for the first time in a long time.

Then I had the final dream.

Grandpa was telling me he had to go, that he loved me, but I couldn't go with him and he wouldn't be back.

I woke up crying. I felt abandoned, and despite the fact that Grandma Shrimplin came again, I felt like I had done something wrong.

It was only last week I realized that he had been staying to protect me.

I thought he was worried about my Grandma Gibson, but he knew she was being well cared for by my Aunt Mary.

He was worried about me, and waiting until I got my life on track. He was waiting until I was doing what I was meant to do.

I'm happy for him and relieved that he finally felt able to let go.

So goodbye, Grandpa. This column was for you.

Medicinal marijuana needs to be accepted

I have long questioned why marijuana isn't legal for recreational use. Study after study has proven it to be less dangerous than many of the substances we introduce to our bodies on a daily basis.

ZACHARY T. ECKELS

I've finally come to terms with the fact that some people will remain close-minded about this plant for the rest of their lives. It's a horrible thing that many men and women have to spend time in jail for a victimless crime, but I suppose that's just how things have to be.

What I fail to understand is how a government can deny this plant to people who are using it medicinally. When all the side effects are taken into consideration, even aspirin appears to be a more dangerous drug.

Sadly, after originally welcoming the marijuana hubs, San Francisco has shown to the world that there are many people who still don't understand medicinal marijuana.

After hearing concerns from local merchants and residents, the city's planning commission rejected the green cross permit to add a dispensary to Fisherman's Wharf.

What bothers me the most about their requests, which led to an already built store remaining unused, is that they cited that it would lower their quality of life. And, if you don't find this totally absurd, you probably have the same false views of what was actually making its way onto the wharf.

You see, a marijuana dispensary is much more like a pharmacy than a local bar. Upon entering the store, patients requiring marijuana for medicinal use would have had to show their government-issued marijuana card and a doctor's note before being served.

After they made their selection from the 55 different strains of marijuana that would have been offered, they would have had to make their way out of the store. Unlike many of the San Francisco dispensaries, people would not have been smoking on the premises and security guards would have been in place.

Still uncomfortable that dying citizens might actually enjoy their final days too close to the wharf?

Well, you can at least be sure that the owners would have been suitable for the job. All owners must first pass criminal and employment background checks before they pay for their permit and business license.

But after all of this, people still feared an increase in crime in their neighborhood. It's almost like America still believes the movie "Reefer Madness" was real. That one inhalation of Satan's drug of choice will suddenly drive one insane, leading to the murders of thousands. If this were true, I'm pretty sure Woodstock would have had a much different outcome.

So, what did people really have to fear?

Honestly, after watching five minutes of commercials you are pretty likely to see an advertisement for some new drug with worse side effects.

According to www.webmd.com, marijuana is even unlikely to cause head, neck or lung cancer, as once popularly believed. It's impossible to overdose on, non-addictive and does not kill brain cells.

As I stated earlier, I've come to terms that such a harmless plant can be withheld from recreational use due to the ignorance of those in power. However, there is no reason to let that ignorance lead to the sick suffering any more than they should.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

NEW VEHICLES SERVE PURPOSE TO CAMPUS LIFE

Dear Editor,

I am writing in response to Mr. Bonella's letter titled, "New K-State police cars waste gas; other cars would save university cash," printed in your July 12 edition. There are several points in the letter that I believe need to be addressed to avoid further questions by the public we serve.

The new Dodge Charger police cars that our department recently purchased are not 8-cylinder models. We purchased the 6-cylinder models, which provide far greater fuel economy.

The letter also seems to insinuate that if an emergency situation arose on the campus, it should be handled by the Riley County Police Department.

K-State Police receive the same training as all other law enforcement officers in the state of Kansas. In emergency situations, it is not our policy to simply pass our problems on to other agencies, though it is comforting to know we have such a great resource right next door.

The author of the letter suggests bicycles would be a better form of transportation than automobiles. I would point out that we currently have one day shift and one swing-shift officer, each assigned to bicycle patrols. In all, our department has four certified bicycle officers who regularly, or on occasion, ride our police bicycles. Plans are to add even more bicycle officers in the future.

The author also suggests that hybrid cars would be cheaper. In fact, I did some checking as well and found that our vehicles, comparably equipped, would cost an individual about $5,000 more each. These vehicles have a tighter and heavier duty suspension then the standard models. As well, the police package comes with an upgraded electrical system that allows us to power the many radios, scanners, emergency lights, cameras and other equipment we must carry.

Finally, though we have a service fleet of four vehicles, we cut back to only two per shift during the summer months. Officers are encouraged to walk, ride their bicycles or double up for safety. It is our hope to save money while gasoline continuously flirts with $3 per gallon.

I hope that this letter served to clear up some of the good questions that Mr. Bonella brought forth. I thank him for caring enough to ask.

DIALYSIS PATIENTS AMONG MANY WHO SUFFER

Dear Editor,

Your story about kidney dialysis last week highlighted the tragic shortage of human organs for transplant operations.

A majority of the 92,000 Americans on the national transplant waiting list will die before they get a transplant. Most of these deaths are needless. Americans bury or cremate about 20,000 transplantable organs every year. More than 6,000 of our neighbors suffer and die needlessly every year as a result.

There is a simple solution to the organ shortage – give organs first to people who have agreed to donate their own organs when they die.

Giving organs first to organ donors will convince more people to register as organ donors. It will also make the organ allocation system fairer. About 60 percent of the organs transplanted in the United States go to people who haven't agreed to donate their own organs when they die. People who aren't willing to share the gift of life should go to the back of the waiting list as long as there is a shortage of organs.

Anyone who wants to donate their organs to others who have agreed to donate theirs can join LifeSharers. LifeSharers is a non-profit network of organ donors who agree to offer their organs first to other organ donors when they die. They do this through a form of directed donation that is legal in all 50 states and under federal law. Anyone can join for free at www.lifesharers.org or by calling (888) 674-2688. LifeSharers has 5,390 members, including 43 members in Kansas. More than 500 of our members are minor children enrolled by their parents.

Burt Pearson, a custodial specialist in Kedzie Hall, has a hobby that sets him apart from the modern man.

He is a member of the Single Action Shooting Society, which is an organization created to preserve and promote cowboy action shooting.

"It's really fun," he said.

According to the group's Web site, the members of SASS wear costumes and adopt an alias that represents a character or profession of the late 19th century.

"There's people that spend thousands of dollars on costuming," Pearson said.

He has been a member of SASS for about four years, and has gone to Missouri and Oklahoma to participate in meets.

The Capitol City Cowboys, part of the SASS organization, is having a Grand Army of the Frontier Mini-Muster on Sunday, July 23, and Pearson is excited to attend, he said.

The Frontier Mini-Musters bring people from all over the United States and Canada.

Pearson said at one meet, people from Canada brought their servants to carry their guns.

"I meet a lot of well-to-do people," Pearson said.

These shooting matches are open to anyone who wants to attend, and the Mini-Muster will take place at the Capitol City Cowboys gun range in Topeka, off of NW Fourth Street.

"Everybody's not only invited, but they're welcome to come out," Pearson said.

Athletes' homes appear on show

'Cat Cribs' brings K-State football players' homes to Internet

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For those who want to know what the bedroom of K-State wide receiver Yamon Figurs looks like, that answer is now at the click of a mouse.

A special section of the K-State Sports online now allows fans and prospective recruits to get an exclusive look at the lives of student athletes.

The Web site, www.insidekstatesports.com, a part of Inside K-State Sports, now features an inside look at the homes of K-State athletes with a series titled "Cat Cribs."

Sports Information director Garry Bowman said "Cat Cribs" is a take off on MTV's "Cribs" – a show that features different celebrity homes.

Currently there are "Cat Cribs" video clips available online that present the homes of three K-State football players: linebacker Brandon Archer and wide receiver Yamon Figurs, who are roommates, and quarterback Dylan Meier.

Bowman said the "Cat Cribs" clips are designed to help fans and potential recruits see what life in Manhattan is like and how student athletes live.

"We wanted to humanize the players by showing their homes," he said.

Bowman said the department has received a lot of positive feedback about the site. He also said there will be more "Cat Cribs" releases in the future.

Archer said he was excited about the video when the idea was brought to him.

"I thought it was an interesting concept to show people what average college-student athletes live like," Archer said.

He said he thinks the site is a good way to close the gap between the players and the fans.

"It's an interesting way to bring student athletes closer to fans," he said. "They'll be able to see that we're not really so different."

David Smoller, who designed much of the Web site, said one of the primary goals is to attract possible recruits to K-State.

"Prospective student athletes can see what practice, school, coaches and games look like," Smoller said.

The site was launched during the first week of February. Additions to the site have been made in the past month.

"It's hard to find another school that has a Web site like this, or at least one that's free," he said.

The site is a huge benefit for many reasons, Smoller said.

"In the past, fans didn't have much access to football practices or seeing coaches talk to the players," he said. "Now fans can participate in the program."

Smoller said to expect more "Cat Cribs" clips that will feature athletes of many different K-State sports.

Brandon Archer feeds the fish Tuesday, July 18, in his living room.

New Catbacker club established in Hays

By Kaley Lyon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

HAYS, Kan – Purple pride is intact – even in a western Kansas town two-and-a-half hours from Manhattan.

About 300 K-State fans gathered Thursday, July 13, in Hays, Kan., to celebrate the official beginning of the Heartland Catbackers club.

In addition to loyal fans, former football coach Bill Snyder and several student athletes were present.

"It's kind of nice to have all the people from western Kansas support K-State athletics: football, basketball, rowing team, equestrian – all that stuff," said Kyle Younger, thrower for the K-State track team.

Catbackers is a committee with different branches all across Kansas, and one in Nebraska, that helps raise funds for K-State athletics. The organizations organize multiple fundraisers each year and the proceeds benefit the Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund.

The Mike Ahearn fund provides $5.5 million to K-State each year for student athletic scholarships. Of the $5.5 million, about $250,000 is generated through Catbackers, Lon Floyd, assistant athletic director, said.

"The neat thing about Catbackers is we try very hard to make it fit the community, to make it fit into the area that we're going in to," Floyd said. "We want the people there to enjoy it and have fun, and yet still be able to raise some funds."

At each Catbackers event, at least one K-State coach makes an appearance, which helps a great deal with recruiting efforts, he said.

"They're the reason why, in my opinion, why kids come to Kansas State University from an athletic standpoint – we're not talking from an academic standpoint," Floyd said. "They like to go with people who know how to win, people who care about them as people, and I think Bill Snyder is the epitome of that."

About 30 Catbacker groups already exist and K-State officials are reluctant to add more, Floyd said.

"We have tried to hold it pretty constant from the standpoint that we want to be able to provide service for those clubs," he said. "If we get many more, we can't provide that service."

Hays is the 29th town Catbacker representatives have visited this summer, and every single event has set record attendance, he said.

"I think it's the anticipation of the new coaches – everyone wanting to see the new coaches, the anticipation of the new era at K-State, the turnover," Floyd said. "Everyone is excited about getting back in the win column."

However, it is not only the excitement of meeting new coaches that attracts a large crowd, Floyd said.

"I think it was the combination of it being new and getting to see Coach Snyder was the reason for the tremendous turnout," Floyd said of Thursday's event. "Everybody loves having him come ... he will always be a K-State legend, I think."

Snyder will be a great resource person for football coach Ron Prince, and has indicated that as his role, if Prince wants it to be, Floyd said.

"He is a very knowledgeable resource person," he said. "Prince is very pleased to have him around and to seek advice from him."

Test-drives increase in summer

Heidi Paulson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With supposedly more free time in the summer, college students might consider test-driving a few cars.

Automobile salesmen have a 12-step guide they follow when selling a vehicle. Letting the customer take it for a spin is number six on that list.

Before the salesman will allow a test-drive, they need to find out what it is the customer is looking for in a vehicle, how much money they're looking to spend and how serious the customer is about buying a vehicle.

Nathan Dyke, 26, is a salesman at the Briggs Nissan Dealership, 2500 Stagg Hill Road. He has been working with Briggs since October, and has had more than 10 people test drive cars every week since, including summertime customers.

Dyke said no one-stereotypical person comes in and buys that stereotypical vehicle. There is, however, an unwritten guide for salesmen to follow on certain vehicles.

"We do pre-qualify test-drives for the specialty high-performance cars," Dyke said. "For those customers, we'll run a credit report. If we let just anyone test drive the Z, then it'd have a million miles on it and nothing else would get test-driven."

The car Dyke is referring to is the Nissan 350Z. It represents Nissan's sporty top-of-the-line option. He said the car boasts race-inspired engineering, a mixture of performance and technology and a design that shatters all the rules.

Many students and young people assume there is an age requirement for test driving a vehicle.

Bryan Little, 21, senior in construction science management, said he thought someone had to be at least 18 to test drive a car.

"It wouldn't surprise me if it were even 21," Little said. "A minimum age of 25 would be a stretch, but not impossible to believe since you have to be 25 to rent a car."

Little said he understands test driving to be a privilege, not a right.

"It's not your freaking car," he said. "The dealers do it as an advertising thing to help their customers make decisions."

Dyke said age is not the important factor in who gets to test-drive a vehicle.

"Anyone with a valid license can come in and test drive a car," he said. "I've had 16 year olds come in with their parents. Now, their parents have to accompany them on the drive, but it makes sense since they are the ones most likely paying for the car."

However, Dyke stressed the motives necessary to have before the salesman will allow a car to be test-driven.

"Anyone that is serious about buying a vehicle is welcome to test-drive it." Dyke said. "What matters is setting the stage for the buyer to get interested in a specific model. If they need to test drive four or five cars, then have at it. We want to be able to show the customer a vehicle that will work for them. Our goal is to see our customers walk away satisfied and happy with their new car."

As a member of the college crowd, Ash Smith, 20, said he used to think that he was too young.

"But when I was 18 and looking to buy a new car, the dealerships proved very helpful," Smith said. "I got to drive four different vehicles and, though I didn't buy anything, I walked away with a better idea of what kind of vehicle was best for me."

Casey Combs, 21, Manhattan resident, said she has never test driven a car.

"I never thought I could," she said. "It just seems like a parent's job to do the test driving."

Combs said now she'll feel less intimidated when she goes in to buy a car.

"I know they're worried about kids lying to them about their motives," Combs said. "But after hearing that what they really care about is getting you a car that you'll love, I'll definitely feel more confident walking through those dealership doors."

Gas cardholders receive rebates at pump

Heidi Paulson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the rising gas prices, pricing and rebates can be competitive at gas stations around Manhattan.

Several of these stations offer credit cards partnered with companies like Visa and MasterCard, said Rachel McKinney, clerk at the Westside BP gas station, 3001 Anderson Ave. She said BP's current credit card promotion includes receiving free gas.

"A lot of people come in and ask how to get $75 worth of free gas," McKinney said. "We hand them the different applications and ask them to look them over and decide what's best for them."

McKinney said there are cards that are only accepted at participating gas stations, like the BP gasoline card. Others may be used any place credit cards are accepted.

Potential cardholders can receive varying amounts of rebates and can apply for the gasoline card, the MultiCard or the new BP Visa.

"They send you gift cards in the mail for like $25 to $50, and you can use it at any BP station.

At the Wildcat BP, 1701 Anderson Ave., cashier Michael Kohout, fifth year in accounting and finance, said a lot of people have come into his store to ask about the BP credit cards since gas prices have gone up.

The card is good for 10 percent off of all purchases for the first two months at all BPs. After that, it's five percent off, Kohout said.

"If you spend 200 bucks a month on gas anyway, 10 percent off is still $20 you get back," Kohout said.

Linda Lewellen, cook at the Derby Dining Center, said she would recommend having a gas-station credit card.

"We've had the BP MultiCard since 1989," Lewellen said. "We use it especially when we get car repairs."

Kathy Hull, assistant manager at Dara's Fast Lane No. 6, 2707 Anderson Ave., said she would recommend the gas-station credit cards to those looking to build credit.

"I see a lot of college kids come in with their parents' card, but most people I see with the card are older, like in their 40s," Hull said.

Tyler Scherr, cashier at Kwik Shop, 1337 Anderson Ave., and junior in pastoral ministry at Manhattan Christian College, said although his store doesn't offer a credit card, it does have a special discount available through Kroger.

"Kroger owns both this Kwik Shop and Dillons," Scherr said. "It's four cents off right now with your Dillons plus card. If you use the key chain card, you have to pay inside."

WOMAN CALLS 911 TO GET 'THE CUTEST COP'

ALOHA, Ore. – A woman who called 911 to get "the cutest cop I've seen" sent back to her home got a date all right – a court date.

Washington County Sheriff's Sgt. David Thompson told KGW-TV of Portland it all started with a noise complaint called in last month by neighbors of Lorna Jeanne Dudash. Thompson said Dudash then called 911, asking that the "cutie pie" deputy return.

"He's the cutest cop I've seen in a long time. I just want to know his name," Dudash told the dispatcher. "Heck, it doesn't come very often a good man comes to your doorstep."

After listening to some more, the dispatcher asked again why Dudash needed the deputy to return. "Honey, I'm just going to be honest with you, OK? I just thought he was cute. I'm 45 years old and I'd just like to meet him again, but I don't know how to go about doing that without calling 911," she said.

CHILD DRIVES CAR, SEARCHES FOR MOM

YPSILANTI TOWNSHIP, Mich. – A 5-year-old boy hopped behind the wheel of a sport utility vehicle and drove several blocks looking for his mother, authorities said.

The child was not injured in his short drive Wednesday, July 12, and his grandmother's 2004 Cadillac Escalade was stopped without incident.

The boy, whose full name wasn't released, started the truck, cranked up the stereo and stood on the driver's seat to see over the steering wheel, Washtenaw County Sheriff's Cmdr. Dave Egeler told the Ann Arbor News.

WIN A DATE WITH '7TH HEAVEN' STAR BIEL

DENVER – A date with Jessica Biel will be up for bid next week to help raise money for a teenager who lost her leg in a prom night limousine accident, Denver newspapers reported this week.

The event dubbed "Mollypalooza" to help Molly Bloom's family with medical expenses is scheduled for Tuesday at the Rock Island Club, organizers told the Denver Post and Rocky Mountain News. The News described the event as a lunch date.

DOCTOR, 2 NURSES ARRESTED ON MURDER CHARGES

NEW ORLEANS – A doctor and two nurses who worked through the chaos that followed Hurricane Katrina were arrested overnight, accused of giving four patients stranded at their hospital lethal doses of morphine and a sedative, authorities said Tuesday.

"We're not calling this euthanasia. We're not calling this mercy killings. This is second-degree murder," said Kris Wartelle, a spokeswoman for Attorney General Charles C. Foti.

The arrest warrants say Dr. Anna Pou and the two nurses intentionally killed four patients at Memorial Medical Center "by administering or causing to be administered lethal doses of morphine sulphate (morphine) and midazolam (Versed)."

other teens. With all her teenage troubles – puberty, peer pressure and the fear of not being accepted – the Internet was her outlet for fitting in.

"No matter where you went, it seemed you could find people exactly like you. And that's how I found Nathan," Jessica said. "We shared the same troubles. We listened to the same music. We were the same people. I felt safe knowing that there was someone else just like me, that I was normal."

More than 19 million teenagers like Jessica confide in the Internet, befriending strangers from one end of the country to the next. While in some cases, these friendships are harmless encounters between teens, other cases have led to more serious consequences.

According to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, nearly 15 million children in the United States received unwanted sexual material online in 2005. Of those, about 2.5 million received a sexual solicitation beyond simple conversation.

Jessica is one teenager who had to learn this fact the hard way.

"He insisted on meeting me, but I was pretty hesitant," she said. "My parents raised me to be a rather cautious girl."

After she refused to meet with Nathan, Jessica said he became pretty persistent, trying to guilt her into meeting him.

She still refused.

And before she knew it, she said Nathan continued harassing her on the Internet and had found her home address. She said she often received letters in the mail, with Nathan threatening to abduct her. Nathan also e-mailed Jessica sexually explicit photographs of himself – from which she first discovered Nathan's true age: a man in his mid-40s.

At this point, Jessica started to confide in her mother for help. She said her mother, who refused to comment on the subject, was the resource she needed to help track down Nathan and prosecute him.

For months they tried to track Nathan down, but at that point, he had moved on and has not been heard from since.

Jessica said she hopes that, of all things, she was the last person Nathan had stalked.

From here on, Jessica said she plans to go to college and get a career in psychology so she can apply this experience toward helping others in life.

Until then, she will continue to finish high school and work at the women's center.

"My family just wishes to move on, to grow stronger from this experience," Jessica said. "I have so much to look forward to in life, to enriching the lives of others. I know that my experience, while terrible, will somehow help me connect to another victim out there. And it might just give me a chance toward saving someone else's life.

Red Cross at critical level blood shortage

By Megan Crane
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Once again K-State students and Manhattan residents have the opportunity to help save lives.

The Flint Hills Red Cross will hold a blood drive from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. today, July 19, and Thursday, July 20, in the K-State Student Union ballroom.

"This summer we're looking at being short 2,000 units of blood. We really, really, really need people to come in and donate," said communications manager Norma Dixon.

According to a press release for the American Red Cross, there is currently less than a one-day supply of certain blood types in the system.

All eligible donors are encouraged to donate now.

Students and faculty help make K-State one of the biggest donors in Kansas, so they are looked to in hopes of reaching the 100-pint goal for the two-day drive.

"We go into each month trying to be booked 300-500 pints over what we've promised the hospitals, and we're currently 252 below our goal for the month, in the first half of the month," said Kristi Ingalls, donor recruitment representative.

To help combat the shortage, on July 1, the Kansas legislature passed a bill allowing 16-year-olds to donate blood with written permission from parents.

The hope in Manhattan is that college students with younger brothers or sisters will bring them in and walk them through the experience.

"There are thousands of 16-year-olds in Kansas; it could really help over the summer months," Dixon said.

As a thank-you to anyone who comes in to donate, the Red Cross will give free "Bleed Purple" T-shirts or KSU mugs. Even if the attempt to give blood fails, the donor will still receive a shirt or mug.

Nationally, as noted in the press release, the Red Cross is rationing some blood types including O-negative, which is the universal type used for trauma victims.

A single accident victim could require more than 50 pints of blood to be stabilized.

"Hospital patients could be in jeopardy and, if blood collections don't increase, we could be facing a national emergency," said Red Cross Central Plains CEO Pam Head in a recent press release.

"We ask all residents to donate, and hope parents will support and encourage their child's decision to donate blood," Head said. "He or she is showing a civic responsibility, maturity and a sense of community pride, which should be commended."

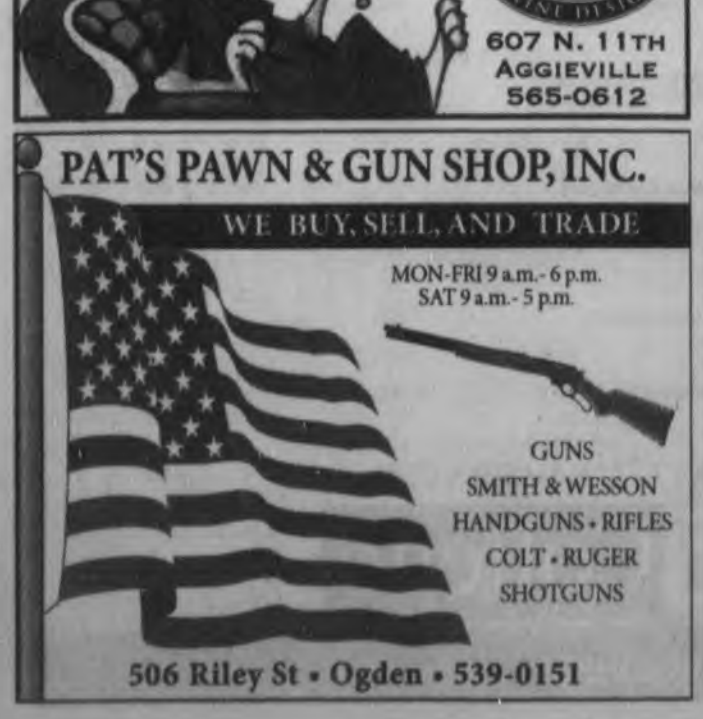
Those 17 and older can donate without parental consent.

At the time of the interview, there were fewer than 15 scheduled donations. To schedule a donation, call 1-800-GIVE-LIFE. Walk-ins are also welcome. Donors must be in general good health and weigh at least 100 pounds. Also, one form of identification is required, so bring either a Red Cross donor card or a driver's license.



"It's a small drive, so this is a great time for first time donors. There are short lines, it's more laid back and we encourage people who have never given before to try it out," Ingalls said.

Short term energy boosts may have long term effects on students

By Sheila Ellis
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Red Bull, Rocket Star, Monstor, Full Throttle and Mountain Dew Amp are a few examples of energy drinks on the market.

These are some of the energy drinks targeted toward college students.

According to Beverage Digest, the energy-drink market racked in $3.5 million in sales last year.

"Energy drinks are very similar to coffee, or any caffeine products like Coke or Pepsi. They just have more sugar and caffeine," said Mark Haub, associate professor of nutrition. "If you actually look at the product, it's not much different between drinking a few cups of coffee."

Students' responsibilities seem to require more and more energy, yet their daily schedules do not allow them sufficient time to rest and recharge.

K-State Cheerleader James Bowen said, "I have an energy drink in the morning that usually helps wake me up. It's like my coffee, since coffee is nasty."

Bowen said he sometimes gets overwhelmed with class, practice and homework.

"Students feel they need more energy especially in the summer because classes are at a much faster pace," Haub said.

However, at some point a person's body is going to give in and make the rest of their immune system break down and get ill, Haub said.

"Energy drinks will give you a boost for a minimum amount of time and then you will have a problem. It's a good idea to plan rest and leisure instead of body telling you by getting a cold," Haub said.

"When I drank Red Bull and vodka the difference was being a little more alert than I usually am while drinking," said Amanda Smith, senior in elementary education.

Several local bars serve energy drink and alcohol drink mixes.

"It's a pretty popular drink," when referring to Red Bull and vodka, said Kris Smith, general manager at Kite's Bar and Grill in Aggieville.

Mixing alcohol and energy drinks might be the popular thing to do, said Amber Long, assistant director at the Peters Recreational Complex. But it does, however, pose some dangers, she said.

"Since an energy drink is a stimulant and alcohol is a depressant, the two mixed together can be hazardous because the energy drink can mask how intoxicated a person may actually be," Long said.

This can be very dangerous because a person may not know that they are impaired and not fit to drive or make decisions, she said.

"You're drinking an energy drink so you feel more energized, but the effect of alcohol is not taking on as quickly as it usually would, which can make you impaired," Long said.

Another improper time to drink energy drinks is while exercising.

"I don't recommend energy drinks to be used while exercising because of two things: dehydration, and abnormal increase of heart rate, which may be bad for people who are older or have heart problems," Long said.

For those who drink caffeine before working out, the health risks can be smaller, she said.

"A little caffeine before you work out is not a bad thing, but energy drinks are chalked full of caffeine and sugar," Long said. "You may not need that much, drinking water while your working out to alter effect of dehydration that results from energy drink."

Knowing when it's time to pull the plug on relationships

LAUREN ROHRER

My phone beeps at me when it is running out of battery power.

It's really a nice feature. It would be nice if some things in life gave you little reminders when they needed help or were dying out.

Like, for instance, if a relationship is going badly. A lot of times we don't take notice until things are too far gone to repair. Which begs the question, if we knew what to look for, how can you tell when it's time to pull the plug?

Well first let's address the cynics who would say that we should spend more time thinking about our personal relationships, talking about our feelings and discussing the special moments in our lives.

Seriously, that doesn't happen. We're students, which makes us like half-functioning adults. It's an accomplishment to get out of bed before eight in the morning for most of us. And, if you're anything like I am, you work at least one or two crappy jobs just to survive the summer when the financial aid stops and reality starts.

Finding the time to have those deep and meaningful talks with the person you're seeing can be exhausting. And it just gets easier to put it off, roll over and go to sleep.

So if we're crazy busy, what do we look for?

Most people trying to help would begin by asking you everything about your relationship and the other person in it. I personally think that you should look inward.

For example, if you're not excited to pick up the phone at the end of the day when you know who it is, or if you find yourself forgetting details that can seem like nothing, then I think, at that point, you need to pull the plug.

If you are feeling this at all, odds are that you have been labeled the "bad guy" a few times. It's OK, I'm always the "bad guy".

The aforementioned "feelings" have about a million self-help books dedicated to them, so I really don't feel badly.

Those people would say that I cut people out too soon; that I am unfeeling and we should give these relationships a fair shot; that we should ignore these signs and really try to work things out; that we should talk our little issues to death and drag the relationship out for months, giving other opportunities a chance to pass us by while we talking about our feelings ... again.

Pulling the plug before something completely dies is not heartless, it's considerate and smart.

It may sting a little, but it's the right thing to do. Just something to keep in mind if you feel like you and yours might be running out of battery power.

Computers stolen from ID Center

By Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At about 8 p.m. Wednesday, July 19, two men stole approximately $25,000 worth of computers, cameras and other electronic equipment from the K-State Student Union Campus ID Center.

The men entered the K-State Student Union and spoke with the on-duty manager, according to a Kansas State Media Relations and Marketing report. The men showed the manager what appears to have been a forged document, and told the manager they were from a local computer-repair company.

This investigation is ongoing, with estimated loss at $25,000.

Both suspects were described as white males in their early 20s, with blonde hair. One was described as medium build, between 5 feet 5 inches and 5 feet 8 inches; the other as slender build, between 5 feet 8 inches and 5 feet 11 inches.

Both were said to be wearing blue jumpsuits with "Fox Business Systems" logos embroidered on them.

Anyone with information about the crime is asked to call Detective Donald Stubbings at the K-State Police Department, 532-6412.

Gas prices top $3 per gallon

By Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The average retail price of a gallon of gasoline exceeded $3 in the United States last week, marking its highest price in 25 years, according to the latest nationwide Lundberg survey released Sunday, July 23.

Last week's national average exceeds by one-third cent a high set last year after Hurricane Katrina caused a gasoline shortage, but was still short of an inflation-adjusted peak of $3.16 set in March 1981, survey author Trilby Lundberg stated in the Reuters report.

Prices were unlikely to go higher because demand is not growing and probability is shrinking with gas prices higher than $3 a gallon, she said.

"This price increase does not predict more price increases, unless there is a deepened threat to world oil supplies or (another major) event," she said.

Dancing at Club Tub

Tubby's Sports Bar extension to be open Wednesday to Sunday nights

By Megan Crane
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new location for college students to dance has opened in Aggiville.

As part of the expansion of Tubby's Sports Bar, the loosely named "Club Tub" is now open for dancing for those 21 and older Wednesday through Sunday nights.

Club Tub opened last week and features calmer music from 9 p.m. to 11 p.m. Music from 11 p.m. to close will be more standard dance club music, owner Ryan Bramhall said.

Themes for the evenings include Long Island, easy listening Wednesdays, retro Thursdays, more of a club mix on Friday and Saturday nights and random music on Sunday nights.

In addition to the sports bar and dance club, Tubby's owner will be opening a cabana-type bar tentatively named "Tubbieville." It will be located behind Club Tub with an open-patio setup. Opening next week, Tubbieville will feature festive lights and occasional live music.

Since Tubby's is a restaurant in addition to a bar, customers of any age are welcome during dining hours. Club Tub and Tubbieville will be for those 21 and over. To keep underage patrons of the sports bar from slipping into the dance club, there will be doors dividing the sports bar from the dance club and Tubbieville. Although there will not be a cover charge for Club Tub, a bouncer at the front door will check IDs. He will also check for dress-code violations.

Due to the difficulty in keeping underage people from drinking, the decision was made to keep Club Tub and Tubbieville to patrons only 21 and older. This decision may be slightly disappointing to underage students wanting a place to dance.

"I don't see why it shouldn't be 18 and over. There isn't really a place for kids our age, under 21, to go to dance, but I think it's a good addition," said Cole Galyon, sophomore in business administration.

As one of Manhattan's first dance clubs, a change could be expected in the trends of patronage in Aggieville. P.J.'s Bar, however, is confident that they still have something to offer.

"We have a good atmosphere and good live music. We're one of the only places in town that has live music at least four times a week," said bartender Tony Richey.

"I don't think we're going to be affected too much. I DJ for Latino nights on Thursdays, and on that night specifically there's not other clubs doing the same thing," Sainz said. "It's a unique night, (so) we don't feel threatened by anybody."

Fort Riley has picnic to show appreciation for military

Steven Doll | COLLEGIAN

By Ericka Brunson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

FORT RILEY, Kan. – Families, friends and neighbors gathered together to celebrate the "Thank You Fort Riley" picnic on the grounds of the Fort Riley Middle School.

The Saturday picnic was in honor of the military as an appreciation and family day.

"This event started as just a suggestion from one of our committees to meet at the Junction City 'Sit Down Saloon' to show our appreciation, and from there the idea just snowballed," he said. "The dedication and commitment that our volunteers have put in is simply just amazing."

More than 100 people of all ages volunteered their time to make the day a success. The event, which ran from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m., offered free food and drinks, moon-walks for children and special attractions such as an Apache Helicopter and car show.

Pat Powers and his son, residents of Topeka, were two people who had cars on display in the show.

"The purpose of this event was to join together all the new people in Fort Riley. They often do these events for the GIs, but this time they came up with something that is for the families as well," Powers said.

Powers said he and his son arrived two hours before opening and were surprised to find, even at 9 a.m., that the turnout was spectacular.

Lewis Thomas, a soldier stationed at Fort Riley, said he was surprised to see how much the picnic had to offer.

"My wife lured me down here by saying there was free food, and I get here and there's this huge thing going on," he said.

The event was not only a time to spend with family, but also a time to meet with friends.

"It's great that we have a chance to get together on a Saturday and see our friends and neighbors," Thomas said. "I have seen people I haven't seen in months and wouldn't have seen otherwise."

Thomas's three children, ages 2, 4 and 6, said they were most intrigued with the Treasure Dig attraction.

A sand box was set up at the edge of the picnic and was filled with "treasures" for the kids to dig and find every half hour.

"I don't think we've all moved half an inch from this box for hours," Thomas said.

The atmosphere offered the community a chance to interweave and have a great time, Powers said.

"It is a good, friendly event that helps mix military populations with the local population," he said. "The more intermixed Fort Riley, Junction City and Manhattan become, the better. They should do this every year."

THE PITHY QUOTES

Dating back to at least 1992, the Collegian pithy quotes are a humorous quotations from staff members, mostly taken out of context, that we collect throughout the semester. Here are a sample of our best summer quotations.

"I left last night pretty satisfied," Annette talking about the quality of the paper after leaving production.

"So who do we have to sleep with to get Zach off?" Lola talking about Zach's birthday present ... time off from work at Coco Bolos.

"He slapped my bum ... I got a bum slap," Carla reminiscing during a photo shoot of the editors.

"I bet Chuck Norris would think he's kickass if he read the Fourum," said page designer Brendan.

"Hah, our Fourum is bigger than yours," said the production staff in regard to Pithy Quotes verses Fourum, July 25.

Phi Beta Sigma symposium

Oldest national black fraternity to visit to KSU

By Logan Adams
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State will be the host to a national event for one of the nation's oldest historically black fraternities next month.

The Charles I. Brown Historical Symposium, on Aug. 18 and 19, will draw members of Phi Beta Sigma to K-State, said Pat Patton, a research specialist in Hale Library. Patton said she has been researching members of the fraternity for the past decade.

Kevin Christian, a Phi Beta Sigma member to attend the event, said 12 to 15 members will attend, and among them will be key brothers who have a vested interest in the history of the fraternity.

K-State was home to the fraternity's Delta Chapter, which started in 1914 but ended in the early 1930s after the Great Depression forced many members out of school. It was the first chapter of the fraternity to start at a mixed-race university west of the Mississippi River, Patton said.

The chapter's house still stands at 1020 Colorado St. in Manhattan.

"When I listen to the stories that these men of Delta Chapter endured and how their lives and careers were shaped, it just goes to show me, that you can overcome obstacles, odds, and persevere, if you believe," he said. "It is obvious that they believed, and in doing so, paved the way for countless men to become members of this great organization."

The fraternity is considering several universities to be its repository of the papers and records of its members, Patton said. She said K-State is one of the schools likely to be chosen.

"Howard is a likely site. K-State is a likely site, and a few others are also likely," said Gerald Smith, former national executive director of PBS.

Smith said he will be giving a presentation at the event focusing on the history of the fraternity. He said the goal of PBS was not to turn its members into leaders as other fraternities did, but something different.

"They did not intend us to be leaders," Smith said. "They intended us to be public servants." He said that now, with eight years until the fraternity turns 100, is the time for the fraternity to consider its past and decide if it is going in the right direction.

The symposium is named for Charles Ignatius Brown, one of three men who founded the fraternity at Howard University in 1914. After graduating that year, he moved to Kansas and worked as a teacher in Topeka and founded the Delta fraternity chapter at K-State in 1917.

Smith said he doesn't have any proof, but believes Brown was a part of the family involved in the Brown v. Board of Education Supreme Court case that ruled segregation as unconstitutional.

After that, he seemingly disappeared. Patton said she and other researchers have gone through countless records looking for mention of Brown, but nothing definitive has surfaced. She said she'd heard many stories as to what happened from living fraternity members, but never found anything concrete.

"Different members would call and had heard that he'd been murdered," Patton said.

The fraternity is back at K-State, she said, but doesn't have a chapter house. None of Phi Beta Sigma members could be reached at press time.

Riley County Fair begins Thursday

Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This year's Riley County Fair will be July 27-31 at the Riley County Fairgrounds, in CiCo Park, at the intersection of Kimball and Avery Avenues.

The Riley County Fair parade will start the events at 6 p.m. on July 27. The route runs down Poyntz Avenue from the Manhattan Town Center to City Park, according to the fair's Web site.

The Ottaway Amusements Carnival will be open in Manhattan from 6 to 11 p.m. from July 27 to 31. Pepsi Wristbands, good for unlimited rides, can be purchased for $16. It must be purchased each night.

The Riley County Farm Bureau/Ed Schram Dodge Entertainment Tent on the fairgrounds will have entertainment for each night from July 27 to July 30, beginning at 8 p.m. on Thursday, July 27, with a karaoke contest.

Events at the entertainment tent also include a corn-shucking contest at 5 p.m. on Saturday, July 29 and a watermelon seed-spitting contest at 5 p.m. on Sunday, July 30.

For those with speedy turtles, a turtle race will be at 3 p.m. on Sunday, July 30 in Hurlburt Hall at CiCo Park. Registration begins at 2 p.m.

Vet hospital teaches students

By Jamie Smidt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Just across from the Mercy Regional Health Center lies another emergency room – this one serving animals.

As part of the K-State College of Veterinary Medicine Teaching Hospital, the animal emergency room is open seven days a week, 24 hours a day. It has been on campus since at least 1905, or since the college has existed, said Dr. Rose McMurphy, a professor of clinical science.

The emergency department is staffed by veterinarians, technicians and veterinary students.

The emergency room has facilities to care for small animal, equine and large animal patients. Most of the cases are dogs and cats that have often been traumatized by cars or have digestive problems, McMurphy said.

The College of Veterinary Medicine recently built a new intensive-care unit, which opened two weeks ago. It is larger, able to house more animals and has the latest in new equipment and technology.

"The number of cases we have each day is highly variable, anywhere from one to two per night or seven to eight," McMurphy said.

People bring animals to the Veterinary Medicine Center Emergency Room for various reasons.

For some, it's the closest facility to the site the accident occurred. Many local-practicing veterinarians refer their patients to the College of Veterinary Medicine when accidents and emergencies occur after hours or on the weekends.

This is the case with Manhattan resident Katie Jackson when she discovered a nest of baby blue jays on her front walk on a Sunday afternoon. She said the birds had fallen from a tree and were distressed.

"It was clear they'd been abandoned," Jackson said. "I was afraid they'd be eaten by neighborhood cats."

Jackson and her husband collected the birds in a shoebox lined with a kitchen towel, and drove the birds to the emergency room.

The staff then took the birds and told Jackson they would nurse them back to health. One of the birds had a broken wing. If they lived, they would be released into the wild.

"We strive to do our best for the animals that are brought to us," McMurphy said.

CLASH OF THE COLUMNISTS

Israel vs. Lebanon

Hezbollah not terrorists

ZACHARY T. ECKELS

In biblical times, the land of the Middle East was divided between Hebrew and Arab kingdoms. Since then, the land has switched hands almost continuously, with Muslim rulers usually on top. It wasn't until 1917 that the British captured the area from Turkey.

With the Balfour Declaration, the British decided to use the land for a Jewish homeland. Although it started slowly, World War II led to thousands of Jewish refugees making their way into the area.

The trouble began in 1947, when the British withdrew from the land. The Jews and Arabs immediately started a war. With the creation of Israel in 1948, the Jews won and doubled their territory. The Arabs of the region were driven off their land and into their own refugee camps.

In 1982, understandably still upset over this land dispute, Hezbollah was formed. Inspired by the Iranian revolution, the "Party of God" was determined to get southern Lebanon back from the Israelis.

With what most of the world considered a full retreat from Lebanon by Israelis in 2000, Hezbollah was praised in its victory. While a few countries in the world, including America, may call its members terrorists, its people saw it as a resistance movement, and the answer to their prayers.

Since that point, Lebanon has had only two solid complaints against Israel. These complaints are the occupation of the Sheeba Farms and prisoners still held by Israeli forces. The assassination of senior Hezbollah official, Ghaleb Awwali, could be seen as a third, but there is no real proof that Israel was involved.

According to the U.N., Lebanon has no argument for Sheeba Farms, a section of land about 9 miles in length by 2 miles in width. It says, in agreement with Israel, that the land belongs to Syria. However, in a BBC article on this conflict, Syria agreed that the land belonged to Lebanon.

In October of 2000, Hezbollah raided this disputed territory, abducting three Israeli Defense Forces soldiers. It then used these soldiers for its second argument: prisoners. The exchange took place and was another victory for Hezbollah.

On July 12, Hezbollah decided that a similar raid would free more prisoners. In its mind there wasn't much else, if anything, that would free its prisoners. This time it was met with the terms "terrorist group." Its participation in the Lebanese government was ignored, and Lebanon itself was criticized for not being able to control the "terrorists."

Israel, using the United States' help, became the victim of this war. It pointed out to the world that it had returned all the land that the U.N. said belonged to Lebanon. It questioned how this country could be so ungrateful to its liberators.

President Bush immediately declared support for Israel, and Hezbollah was quickly confirmed as a terrorist organization in a type of global McCarthyism.

With the smell of war in the air people soon forgot that even if the land should belong to Syria, and not Lebanon, it still doesn't belong to Israel. Also, nobody questioned why Israel was still holding prisoners in a time when these countries need to be making peace.

War is for Syria and Iran

LOLA SHRIMPLIN

Former Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir said, "We can forgive you for killing our sons, but we will never forgive you for making us kill yours."

From the time of Golda Meir, Israel has always been at the forefront of defense, usually with a little offense thrown in.

When Black September, a Palestinian terrorist group, attacked the Israeli team at the 1972 Munich Olympics, Meir said she felt the world community did not respond adequately to the slaughter.

"Save our citizens and condemn the unspeakable criminal acts committed," she said.

When the world didn't respond quickly enough, she authorized the Mossad to kill Black September members wherever they could be found.

Israel has been under attack since its creation in the 1940s after World War II.

Now with the fall of Iraq in the Middle East, Iran, via Syria, has been able to fund Hezbollah, a fundamentalist Shi'ite Muslim militant group, creating a social network in Lebanon for the Shi'ites, and is bent on the destruction of Israel.

Hezbollah emerged as a force in 1982 in Beirut, the Bekaa Valley and southern Lebanon. Sponsored by Iran, modeled after Iran's Revolutionary Guards and supported by Syria, Hezbollah aims to establish a Shi'ite Islamic state in Lebanon and force Western interests like Israel and the United States out of the region, according to CNN.com.

Along with Hamas, a leader in Palestine, Iran and Syria are a threat to the peace process in the region, and Israel has responded to that threat.

With the abduction of two Israeli soldiers, Hezbollah and Hamas have instigated a war that knows no bounds, and Israel won't stop unless and until its people stop feeling threatened.

The battle isn't with Palestine, or even Lebanon, but with Syria and Iran.

Israeli soldiers have been abducted before in order to gain the release of Lebanese prisoners, and Hezbollah, through German negotiators, succeeded in that exchange.

But with the fall of Iraq and the Baathist regime, which was the only thing standing in the way of the Shi'ite's in Iran and Syria, a new dimension has been added to the world community.

Shi'ites in Iraq have changed the balance of power between Shia and Sunna, and have created what King Abdallah of Jordan calls "the Shi'ite crescent, which stretches from Tehran and Baghdad (via Syria) to Hezbollah," according to www.bitterlemons.org, a Palestinian-Israeli Web site.

According to www.bitterlemons.org, Hezbollah is "a state within a state," in Lebanon. It has its own military structure, as well as a network of social services for the Shi'ites of Lebanon. The Web site reported this is due to Iranian patronage and their funding of this war machine, via Syria.

Former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was questioned on Saturday, July 22, in the Wall Street Journal, as to why Israel bombed not only Hezbollah targets, but civilian. He said it was a part of the war on terror.

This is the same war on terror we as a country are fighting in Iraq, which has destabilized the region and has created a place for groups such as Hezbollah and people such as Hamas.

Israel responded to that threat, as Israel always has, with full firepower.

And it has that right.

If we have the right to overthrow a government that had nothing to do with the destruction of the World Trade Center, Israel certainly has the right to defend itself and its people.

The current battle in the Middle East is the responsibility of the United States – not Israel who has been embroiled in conflicts since its current inception.

To say that Israel has gone too far in its efforts to defend itself, and that it should accept a peace treaty that will reward the aggressors in this war, namely Iran and Syria, is a travesty.

If Hezbollah is meant to spread Shi'ite revolution by the destruction of Israel, we should be defending Israel with everything we have.

Aggieville lacks entertainment for minors

A new dance club has graced Manhattan for those of the "legal" age.

Club Tub is needed for all students to let loose from the stresses during the week. However, there is currently an age restriction for the club. Those 20 and younger are not allowed in.

The average freshman college student is 18 or 19 years old. What is there for them in Manhattan, especially in the Aggieville district?

Some bars have cover charges for those under age, but only when there is a concert or other event going on. Others let the younger patrons in during the day, but not in the evening.

Why can't Club Tub have a night strictly for those under age? Some students don't want to spend their nights going to the movies or risk being caught at a house party. They want to dance, even if it's without the alcohol.

Just think, the more people you have, the more income you get. That would be a great beginning for the club. In retrospect, people wouldn't have to drive all the way to Lawrence to be able to dance at a club.

To reduce the risk of underage patrons drinking at the club on a normal night, they can have a certain stamp or marker on their hand. Sure, a younger person could take a drink from their older friend, but it would be like a regular restaurant or establishment that allows the younger crowd in. It wouldn't be Club Tub's fault.

So give it a thought. We encourage Club Tub to think about the younger crowd and open their doors to minors.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

KSU PARKING FEE INCREASES NEEDED FOR NEW GARAGE

Dear editor,

In regard to the article "Fines for parking increase" and the related editorial in the July 19 Collegian, I have only one bit of advice: get a clue.

In case you didn't notice, the fees for a parking permit also were substantially increased this year.

They are slated to continue to go up substantially for the next several years. Bonds to pay for the parking garage construction must be paid off by parking fines and fees.

The parking fines and fees of the past were used to pay for the lots of bureaucracy that we already have; there was no money to build the much-desired parking garage.

So where does the university get that money? Increased user fees, also known as tax increases. By the time this thing is built, parking fines and fees will be sky-high, gas will be $5 a gallon, and hopefully lots more of us will be biking or walking to campus because of those realities.

The student leaders who pushed this thing through will be long gone. Perhaps you can ask your current student government leaders exactly why they thought that this garage was a necessity.

And you might thank Faculty Senate for its disapproval of this notion; most faculty members have been around here long enough to recognize a white elephant when it marches in the door.

David A. Rintoul | ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR OF BIOLOGY

LEGALIZING CANNIBUS BIBLICALLY CORRECT

Dear editor,

As a Christian who helped pass Colorado's medical cannabis law, I was pleased to read Zachary T. Eckels' article, "Medicinal Marijuana Needs To Be Accepted," and wanted to point out re-legalizing cannabis is also biblically correct since God indicated all the seed-bearing plants are good on literally the very first page of the Bible (see Genesis 1:11-12 and 29-30).

People who would cage a sick citizen for using a plant are the same people who would stick a knife in the side of Christ.

The very last page of the Bible (Revelation 22) indicates the leaves of the tree of life are for the healing of the nations; thus cannabis was, and is created to, end war and ease pain.

Prohibitionists don't want cannabis/the tree of life free because it exposes them and their holy war for what it is; which is sick.

Student Body President Lucas Maddy and Vice President Katie Maddy ran their campaign based on three C's: campus, community and career. They won the general election March 9 with 3,019 votes and were sworn into office April 6.

They has made plans with KSDB-FM 91.9 for a radio show as part of the campus platform-prong, said Lucas, senior in agricultural economics and agricultural technology management. The show will feature university faculty members and student leaders.

Casey Berner, talk show director for Wildcat 91.9, said the show might have its own special air-time on Sundays.

For the Maddys' community platform, Lucas attended a city and university relations conference earlier this summer in Colorado. Leaders from the United States and Canada were at the conference, and he was the only student representative there. Lucas said he has already shared his ideas from the conference with Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce members.

Katie, along with K-State representatives from the Women's Center, residence halls and greek system, also attended a conference this summer. At "Violence Goes to College 2006" in Boulder, Colo., Katie said she gathered ideas for safety and diversity programs to start at K-State.

"We (K-State students) need to make sure we are putting on a positive image at all times," Katie said. "It's one more step that we can take to make sure we are going about representing K-State in the best way possible."

For their final C, career, Lucas said he met with Amy Button Renz, president of the K-State Alumni Association, and Kerri Day Keller, director of Career and Employment Services, to discuss ways to further connect K-State students in the workplace. He said they have looked into possibilities with the Wildcat Connection program on the Alumni Association Web site.

While the Maddys have started work on their platform promises, Lucas said there are other items that he and his cabinet members are working to accomplish, like restructuring the general-education requirements at K-State.

K-State's current general-education requirements were approved by Faculty Senate on May 10, 1994, according to the University General Education Web site.

Personalizing home

Decor gives living spaces warmth

By Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As the school year slowly emerges, many students will find themselves in new living spaces. Decorating with accessories and furniture can help reflect personality and create a feeling of home.

"Decorating my home at college makes me feel more at home," said Shaniel Johnson junior in family and human services.

Stores like Rockstars and Rogers, 715 N. 12th St.; Acme Gifts, 612 N. 12th St.; and Pier 1 Imports, 320 Southwind Place, feature furniture and other decorations and accessories that can help liven up living areas.

Rockstars and Rogers co-owner Rebecca Craig said they offer tapestries, throw pillows, candles, incense, doormats, door beads, reproduced concert posters, dart boards and printed hemp-bag wall hangings.

"We have a huge selection of posters, from rock bands to art prints that range in price from $8.95 to $12.95," Craig said. "We also have tapestries that are twin or full size and can be hung on walls or used as a bed spread."

"It's good to have lots of colorful stuff to throw up on your walls and to make your place unique to you," she said.

Brent Schultz, local manager of Pier 1 Imports, said the store offers a selection of storage containers and chairs, as well as many other bits and pieces that can be used in residence halls or houses.

"We have hampers, baskets and other organizers with fun patterns that can brighten up a room," Schultz said.

Pier 1 also offers chairs in different sizes and for different uses, he said.

"We have some smaller chairs that would go great in a bedroom and we also have papasan chairs that are good for lounging or studying in," he said. "There are also a lot of chairs that are well-made and can carry over to your next apartment or house after college, too."

Schultz said Pier 1 Imports offers a 15-percent discount for college students with a valid ID through Sept. 17.

"We're always here to help people pick stuff out," he said. "It's a great time to get a new look for your new room or to make your old room look better."

Acme Gift is the best store for coffee-table books, said employee Jenny Yankey.

"We have 'Worst Case Scenario' books and books with life lessons," she said.

Acme Gifts also offers a variety of accessories.

"We have a bunch of crazy, goofy stuff people can have for their house or dorm," Yankey said.

Statues and figurines are some items that Rockstars and Rogers sells that a person could use to help personalize a room.

Tips to make the most of your space

- Don't forget about vertical storage. Use bookcases to hold everything from books and towels to even your favorite coffee mugs. By giving each item a place you will have accomplished a No. 1 challenge for hall residents.
- Invest in hanging-shoe pockets for your closet door. Don't limit its use to just shoes; store whatever will fit from soda cans and pencils or socks.
- Install shelves. Most shelves can be moved up or down a notch. Plastic, multiple level shelves are wonderful for kitchen cabinets. Corner shelves are great for picture frames, knick knacks and other small treasures.
- Keep your apartment simple and clean. If you don't need it throw it out.
  Clutter free equals stress free. Less is more.
- Put fabric on your walls. Whether you choose to cover your entire wall or only a portion, you will enjoy the look of a professionally decorated room, without the permanence of paint or wallpaper.

Original 'Clerks' return for Kevin Smith's best film

"Clerks 2"

Grade: A+

Movie review by Brendan Praeger

COURTESY PHOTO

Unless you're offended by profanity, blasphemy and bestiality, Kevin Smith's "Clerks II" is the funniest, and at times, the most sincere comedy to hit theaters in recent memory.

I love Smith's movies. I've watched every commentary, special feature and cameo Smith has done. I even liked "Jersey Girl" (I have the poster hanging in my room). So, while this review might seem a bit too optimistic, I assure you, "Clerks II" is not only one of Smith's best films, but it is one the most enjoyable films I've seen the past few years.

While most of Smith's films have been tied together with recurring characters and locations, this is his first true sequel. Ten years after the original, Dante and Randal, the unmotivated Quick Stop employees, have aged, but they haven't matured. After the Quick Stop burns down, they find a job at a fast-food restaurant. Jay and Silent Bob return too, although they are sober after a few months of rehab. Dante is preparing to leave with his fiance for a job in Florida, but his affection for his boss (Rosario Dawson), and his friendship with Randal make his departure more difficult than anticipated.

After "Jersey Girl," Smith's only PG-13 effort, some worried that Smith had lost his edge. Luckily, his dialogue is sharper than ever. While it often seems unnatural, almost like an R-rated sitcom, it's always entertaining and never seems forced.

Their perfect chemistry makes it hard to believe that they're not best friends in real life. Rosario Dawson is equally perfect as their charming boss, and newcomer Trever Fehrman provides a perfect foil for Randall's jaded criticisms.

Smith has finally become a good visual director as well. While the original "Clerks" looked like it was shot in black and white by an amateur porn director, the sequel is colorful and cinematic.

It's great to see a film that's touching without taking itself too seriously. The choreographed dance scene and numerous homages to "Silence of the Lambs" would seem out of place in most films. Even during the most lighthearted and farfetched scenes, the film never loses sight of its message. The last twenty minutes provide a touching example of love and friendship that will take any Smith critic by surprise.

"Clerks II" isn't for everyone. Smith himself was surprised the film didn't receive an NC-17 rating, and ABC film critic Joel Seigal was so offended by a scene involving a bachelor party and a donkey that he actually walked out – and he was being paid to see it.

Smith proves that sequels can do more than simply cash in on established characters. They can take the characters in new directions bring new fans to a deserving franchise.

"Clerks II" not only provides closure for fans who have grown up wondering what happened to the slackers from New Jersey, but it also proves that Kevin Smith doesn't need to leave his origins behind to make a great film.

He simply needs to embrace them.

HOROSCOPES

For Wednesday, July 26, through Sunday, July 30

Aquarius

You will get bonus points for being detail-oriented remembering to do that errand for your honey, or doing a favor for a potential one. This weekend, your conscious efforts to project warmth, ask questions and generally engage, get you some sweet feedback.

Aries

Your love challenge on Thursday or Friday is to keep your natural quality of openness in place. This weekend, getting what you're after is less about an aggressive approach and more about being sensitive to what works in a given situation. How about trying old-fashioned charm?

Cancer

Thursdays and Fridays are good days to extract foot from mouth. If it goes well, those days are perfect for following up with some calmer communication and making fun plans. Speaking of plans, stick with yours this weekend. Veering off into unknown territory, particularly of the romantic variety, isn't favored now.

Capricorn

Concentrate on learning about a certain someone to solidify a connection. The more you know, the more love can grow. If you have a date this weekend, take the initiative and get tickets to a cultural event rather than doing the same old dinner and a movie you'll impress them.

Gemini

Know when to say when in terms of communicating; a silence can be far sexier than talking on and on. The weekend looks custom-made for romance, with lots of angles for your curious heart and mind to explore. You have plenty of opportunities for learning more when it comes to love.

Libra

Around Thursday and Friday, socializing is favored, and everyone wants to talk to you maybe because you combine charm with genuine interest in those around you. By the time the weekend comes, you're getting even more attention, very likely of the romantic variety.

Pisces

it's time for some action of your own. The stars favor making a move. You can only think things through so much, and you never know what the reaction will be until you give it a whirl. Give them all their due.

Leo

You're undeniably hot, and everybody's bound to notice. Thursday or Friday, rather than taking a romantic gamble, think about your situation and what you hope to get out of it. This weekend, the pleasure's all yours and those who have the pleasure of your company love you.

Scorpio

You probably have something sweet up your sleeve, and now your romantic instinct and your timing are just right. As far as the weekend, you could bluff, but does that really get your heart where it wants to be?

Sagittarius

A challenge may present itself around Thursday or Friday, when you want to think big and a certain someone seems hopelessly small-minded. Be sweet about it, rather than sour, for your karma's sake. This weekend, your romantic ideals and aspirations are favored.

Taurus

The stars shine their light on your ample sensuality and appeal Thursday through Saturday what fabulous timing for dates, parties and just enjoying life. Take some time to recover on Sunday. Think of it as charging your batteries, rather than lazing about.

Virgo

That quality of veiled sensuality you have isn't so veiled from Thursday through sometime Saturday in fact, you're pretty much burning hot. Plan your social calendar and make dates accordingly. The remainder of the weekend might find you indecisive about a certain situation. Try examining the deeper values at the heart of the matter a conversation with a friend can help your thinking evolve.

Tau Beta Pi continues to maintain K-Hill letters

By Heidi Paulson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They could stand for a postal abbreviation or simply K-State, but the original plan for the letters on Prospect Point, more fondly known as K-Hill, was to spell out the agricultural college's then initials: KSAC.

Built almost entirely by student and faculty volunteers in 1921, the K, 80 feet by 60 feet, cost $350 to construct. Students inset a bronze star in the center to honor K-State students killed in World War I, though it is no longer visible. The S, slightly larger at 90 feet by 60 feet, was built in 1930 at an estimated cost of $500.

The concrete letters, facing west over Manhattan just south of U.S. Highway 177, serve as a high-visibility connection between students at K-State and residents of Manhattan, said Dick Hayter, associate dean for the College of Engineering and adviser of the engineering honor society Tau Beta Pi.

"For most people, the letters have always been there," Hayter said. "Because of the hill's location, you can see it from every angle of the town and they notice it as a monument representing the connection between the university and the community."

Tau Beta Pi performs an annual clean up and whitewashing on the letters as a service to the community and as an initiation for pledges.

The three-hour project is completed by 25 to 30 pledges each fall. Brush and trash are cleared away, and the letters receive a whitewashed facelift applied by members tethered to the top of the hill with students providing additional security by holding the ropes.

Hayter said at times, odd items like a couch and motor block have found their way to K-Hill and have required moving, though it's mostly bottles, paper sacks and other trash.

"It's always a surprise what we find," he said.

Students of the early KSAC planned for future letters to complete the university's initials on the hill. Yet, even with the evolution of the university's name, the U has not been constructed.

Hayter said there have been various plans along the years for a U. However, he said he doubts the construction will ever gain enough support to be completed.

"Not so much that alums don't want a U, or don't want to pay for it – quite the contrary, we've had alums come forward and offer to pay for it," Hayter said. "But the hill requires too much earth work and it's not conducive to construction, and it's not really on the students' wish list right now."

Kate Gorton, 2005 K-State alum in communication sciences and disorders, said she agrees that there are higher priorities.

"It's good how it is – there are much better things that alumni can focus their attention on than putting up the U on K-Hill."

MAN STILL ON QUEST FOR 9/11 PHOTOGRAPH OF LOST FIANCEE

NEW YORK – Since Sept. 11, 2001, Richard Pecorella has been searching the Internet and elsewhere for a single image, a photograph he believes will show him what happened to his fiancee when the World Trade Center was destroyed.

Pecorella spent hours at his computer, scouring the Web for whatever photographs he could find of the aftermath of the terrorists' attack.

About two years ago, he spotted an Associated Press photograph that he said made him believe Karen Juday, a 52-year-old administrative assistant for the Cantor Fitzgerald brokerage, did jump from the 101st floor of the Trade Center's north tower.

Although Pecorella said he saw her in the picture, he wants to be 100 percent sure he knows how she died.

"She was wearing a blue bandanna, like she did at work to hold her hair back, and it was her shape," he said. "She had on a blue sweater and cream-colored pants that day."

SWAMP CAPTURES ALLEGED SHOPLIFTER

RUTLAND, Vt. – As a woman fled from three Kmart employees with a bag of allegedly stolen items, she ran into some woods and got stuck in a swamp, where a sheriff's deputy caught up with her Tuesday, July 18.

When Jennifer L. White, 24, of Brandon, Vt., got to court, Judge Patricia Zimmerman released her on conditions including that she get drug screening and counseling as of Monday, July 24.

"If you do have a substance abuse issue, which it certainly seems like you do," the judge told White, "you need to get help."

PUERTO RICO WOMAN BECOMES MISS UNIVERSE

LOS ANGELES – An 18-year-old from Puerto Rico was crowned Sunday, July 23, as Miss Universe 2006.

Zuleyka Rivera Mendoza shared a nervous, emotional hug with first runner-up, Kurara Chibana of Japan, moments before the winner was announced, then clasped her hands to her mouth in amazement as her name was called. She beamed as the crown was placed on her head.

"I always had faith and confidence in myself, but I never knew I was going to win," Rivera, speaking in Spanish from the stage, said in her first remarks as Miss Universe.

Miss USA Tara Conner was the contest's fourth runner-up. Also finishing in the top five were second runner-up Lauriane Gillieron of Switzerland and third runner-up Lourdes Arevalos of Paraguay.

SCHOOL BANS SNACKS BASED ON FEDERAL LAW

ST. PAUL, Minn. – Public schools are promising to keep closer tabs on student lunch trays, pull sugary treats from vending machines and classroom celebrations and encourage more pulse-raising activities during the day.

They are under orders to adopt nutrition and exercise goals before classes resume in the fall. The wellness policies are required by a federal law that took effect July 1.

Overweight children miss more school than their average-weight counterparts, according to the National School Boards Association. Backers argue reducing sugar in students' diets leads to more focus in the classroom.

Agriterrorism a concern

Jamie Smidt
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the nationwide increase in concern of terrorist attacks, there are also concerns of attacks on pastures, feedlots and farms.

Agriterrorism is a subset of the larger issue of terrorism, said Jerry Jaax, associate vice provost for Research Compliance and University Veterinarian at K-State.

"In Kansas, where the agriculture economy and infrastructure are very important to the welfare of the state, we are more venerable to an agriterrorism attack," Jaax said.

This attack could be anything from a disease brought in to harm the state's crops, to the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in cattle.

To combat this threat, K-State has a multi-disciplinary program, with work in both research and development to response, Jaax said.

The research and development sector covers countermeasures, treatments and containment of the problem if an attack should occur. The response sector concentrates more on education, training and coordination.

The Kansas State University Food Science Institute has also created a curriculum to inform and educate interested parties about the threat of agriterrorism on food safety and security, said Curtis Kastner, director of the Food Science Institute.

"We've worked for the past few years to identify various facets of food safety and security that need to be considered," Kastner said.

Kastner said he and his team identified 20 topic areas and have developed different models to address each topic area. The modules are one to two hours each and cover topics such as an overview of Agriterrorism and physical site security.

The modules have been arranged in packets and are available for those interested in the information.

"One of the most important things we can do relative to the area of agriterrorism is education and training," Kastner said.

The Biosecurity Research Institute that is under construction on campus will also aid in education and training.

"The new facility will raise the bar to work in both research and development as well as response," Jaax said.

Building to open in October

Biosecurity research will require precautions

By Lola Shrimplin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The new Biosecurity Research Institute building will be ready for occupancy in October, said James Guikema, associate and research vice provost.

The building will be a bio-safety level three building, which means it will secure microorganisms and will be able to protect those working with the organisms.

With thick concrete walls and the air entering and leaving the building being filtered, the building is unique among bio-safety buildings, James Stack, director of BRI, said.

The building will contain veterinary medical, food safety and plant pathology laboratories, Stack said.

"It's a pretty exciting opportunity for K-State," Stack said.

Workers in the building will be required to enter a room, remove their clothes, enter another room, take a shower, then in another room put on scrubs.

The building will also require the use of smart cards, which will regulate the parts of the facility workers are cleared to enter.

Security for the facility is still being worked out, as is the support staff.

So far the building has an operations manager and a bio-safety officer, but security may only be partially run by K-State.

Workers will be required to have a criminal background check, and scientists in the building will have additional scrutiny in respect to their backgrounds, Stack said.

As far as custodial and support staff, the building may go with a select agent to provide those services.

Lecture series waiting for replies

By Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Plans are underway for the upcoming season of the Alfred M. Landon Lecture Series on Public Issues at K-State.

Charles Reagan, chair of the Landon Lecture Series, said the first speaker for the 2006-07 academic year will be announced by the start of the fall semester.

"By mid-August, some of it will become clear," said Reagan, who has been chair of the series for 22 years.

Reagan said this year's number of Landon Lecture speakers will depend on how many invitations are accepted.

"We have invitations accepted by three people, and we're pretty sure that one more is going to happen," he said. "We're having conversations with their office right now."

Reagan said it is possible that one of the speaker's lectures would take place at Bramlage Coliseum. The smallest crowd Bramlage can be set up for is 5,500 people, according to an Oct. 31, 2005, article in the Collegian.

When the time and date of a lecture is finalized, the lecturer is announced by a press release through K-State Media Relations and Marketing.

"Sometimes we don't know what the time is going to be," he said. "We don't like to put (the lecturer's name) out until the time is for sure known."

This year will mark the 40th anniversary of the Landon Lecture Series at K-State. The series was founded by late Kansas Governor Alfred M. Landon, and Landon gave the series' first lecture on Dec. 13, 1966.

Landon Lecture Series' speakers last year included Ryozo Kato, Japanese ambassador to the United States; Mikhail Gorbachev, former president of the former Soviet Union; Ted Turner, co-founder of CNN; U.S. President George W. Bush; Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan.; and Lech Walesa, trade-union activist.

Reagan said the upcoming season's speakers will follow up the success of last year's lecturers.

Youth use area gyms for tournament

Mark Nelson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When it comes to basketball, Kansas State hired men's basketball coach Bob Huggins and the 2006 WNIT championship.

But as K-State aims to build its basketball reputation, the Manhattan community has worked to shape the basketball skills of youth.

Last weekend, Manhattan was the host of the Mid America Youth Basketball Tournament open to boys and girls from grades seven to 12. The tournament took place at five locations: Manhattan High School, Anthony Middle School, Eisenhower Middle School, and the Peters Recreation Complex.

More than 170 Mid America Youth Basketball Tournaments took place nationwide this year. The Manhattan tournament drew in more participants than in previous years.

"This year, we have about 109 teams participating, which is an increase of about 20 teams from last year," said Matt Vogel, an area supervisor for the Manhattan Basketball Association. "We have teams from all over Kansas as well as Nebraska and Missouri," Tim Brooks, coordinator of Manhattan's tournament, said.

Students learned about basketball technique, and others were taught about officiating at the Kansas Collegiate Athletics Conference's basketball officiating clinic. These participants were critiqued to become better officials from university and other athletic professionals.

Sororities prepare for hundreds

Alex Peak
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

During the week of Aug. 12-17, hundreds of women will come to K-State for the annual sorority recruitment.

"We're hoping for roughly 500-570 women to go through the recruitment process," said Jennifer Little, the director of logistics for sorority recruitment. "That includes mostly incoming freshman but also a few sophomores and juniors."

The women will stay in Goodnow and Marlatt halls and will visit each of the 11 chapters during the week, Little said.

"There is a mutual selection process, so both the women and the sororities will narrow down to one selection," she said.

Participants pay $247 for their stay in the residence halls and meals provided by dining services. Applications for recruitment are due July 28 and can be completed online.

Erin Allerheiligen, senior in kinesiology and member of Alpha Chi Omega, said sororities do a lot of planning and preparation before recruitment week each year.

"We do conversation workshops that teach us how to go about talking to lots of different girls," Allerheiligen said. The workshops also teach members how to get to know the women in a short amount of time and how to remember them, she said.

"Preparing for recruitment, for us, is kinda like a big reunion," Allerheiligen said.

Little said a majority of the women who go through recruitment will end up joining sororities.

"Those who don't join are usually doing it because of their personal choice or they have extraordinarily low GPAs," Little said.

Students pair gardening, database

Adrianne DeWeese
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Software and databases are the new gardening tools for some Johnson County Master Gardeners.

Four K-State students worked during the last school year to develop software for the Overland Park Arboretum and Botanical Gardens in Overland Park, Kan.

The students involved with the project were Joseph Lutz, senior in computer science and Tim Burkhart, Brandi Kendrick and Matthew Carlson who are all May 2006 graduates with bachelor's degrees in computer science.

But the project actually got its start more than two years ago.

Christie Cochran, who has been a Johnson County Master Gardener for five years, said she was asked in Feb. 2004 to do the documentation for the Monet Garden at the Overland Park Arboretum and Botanical Gardens. Christie said she asked her son, Cory Cochran, May 2001 K-State graduate in computer science, for help.

Cory said he developed a simple database on his mom's personal computer that kept track of the flowers' bloom times. He said he also opened the database to other Master Gardeners, who were able to determine what other characteristics they wanted to track.

When the list of items the gardeners wanted to keep track of became too long, Cory said he remembered a class he took his senior year at K-State. He said he then contacted David Gustafson, professor of computing and information sciences, with the project idea for his Software Engineering Project I and II courses.

"They had this need of having a tool to maintain the maintenance records for work in the arboretum," Gustafson said. "They also had ideas on how to make information on the plants and the garden more accessible to the public."

The software contains different databases about the plants in the arboretum including plant characteristics, maintaining procedures and bloom times, Gustafson said.

"If you are one of the Master Gardeners, you can go into the software and update the information that is being done about that garden," he said.

Christie said the database allows her and other gardeners to see when plants are doing better in one section of the garden than another section. She said the database also allows her to document maintenance for the whole garden and individual plants.

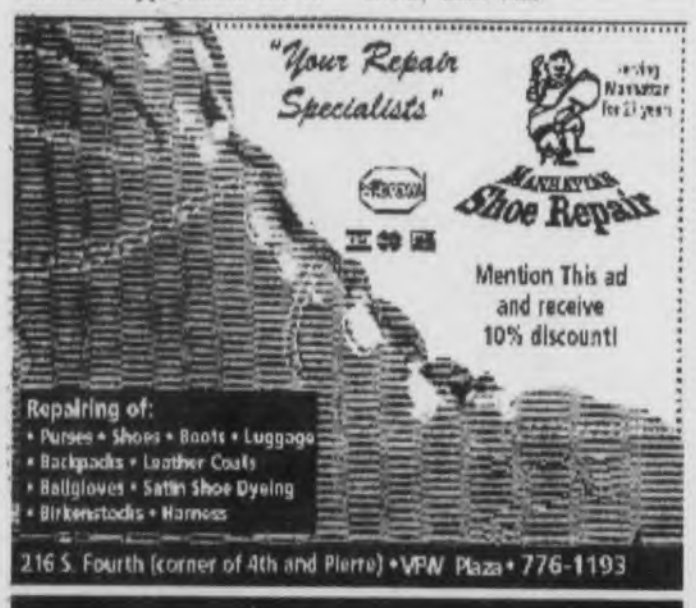
Gustafson said the arboretum was given the latest version of the software in May, and the group plans to update the database in the next year.

"It's an ongoing project," Gustafson said. "We're hoping to get a kiosk in the arboretum for visitors to do searches on sometime in the future."

The software also will include a uniform resource locator that the general public can access to search the different plants at the arboretum, Gustafson said.

He said the gardeners used text files on a computer to record data prior to the databases. The gardeners were unable to maintain the current state of plant maintenance, and they weren't able to see other gardeners' maintenance logs, Gustafson said.

"Before, individual Master Gardeners were just doing all of the updating," he said. "It was not a very efficient way of doing it."



While the project ultimately benefits the arboretum and its gardeners, the students involved also learn from it.

Carlson, who was one of the main programmers for the project, said he learned from the project that database requirements will always change, especially when working with real-life clients.

"I learned what real work would be like rather than academic work," he said. "It gave me a little more insight on what it would be like working outside the academic environment."

Lutz said he learned how to do Web programming with fellow team members as a main programmer on the project.

"It was a new opportunity," said Lutz. "It helped me try out my new ideas that I had to communicate to someone else."

WORLD NEWS

2 DIE, 13 INJURED FROM INFLATABLE SCULPTURE

LONDON (Reuters) – Two women died and 13 people were injured when they fell from a huge inflatable sculpture after it broke its moorings and flew into the air in a park in northeastern England, police said Monday, July 24.

Up to 30 people were inside the walk-in exhibit, which has been shown around the world, when a gust of wind blew it nine meters above the park in Chester-le-Street on Sunday.

The victims, aged 68 and 38, had been walking through the artwork with children when it took off. A three-year-old girl was seriously injured in the freak accident.

Designed by artist Maurice Agis, the exhibit, called Dreamspace, is 5 meters high and made out of plastic sheeting. It has walls that change color as visitors walk through its corridors.

WOMAN SENDS 5-FOOT SNAKE IN MAIL

BERLIN (Reuters) – A German woman sparked panic at her local post office when a 5-foot albino python escaped from a packet she had mailed, police said on Tuesday, July 25.

The 28-year-old woman, who had sold the snake over the Internet, stuffed it in a package labeled "attention – glass."

"Staff accepted the package and put it in the back of the office – they had no idea what it was," said police spokesman Andreas Blum. "All of a sudden, they noticed that it started moving around and then saw a big snake wriggling out of it."

One of the postal workers wrestled with it and locked it into another container, while her colleagues ran away.

While it is not a crime to send snakes by post, the woman is being investigated for the improper treatment of animals.

Nike Combined Events Challege at K-State

By Staff reports
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A world-class competition is coming to K-State, Aug. 5 and 6.

The Nike Combined Events Challenge, an annual exhibition meet between the United States and German national track teams, will take place at the R.V. Christian Track Complex.

"We are honored to have some of the world's top athletes competing on the K-State campus," Jim Epps, senior associate athletic director, said in a May 2006 interview with K-State Sports, www.kstatesports.com.

The Nike Combined Events Challenge began in Aachen, Germany, in 1993. It has alternated between sites throughout the two countries, with men competing in the decathlon, which consists of 10 events. Women were added to the competition this year with the heptathlon, a seven-event race. Each country has seven decathletes and four heptathletes.

The United States decathlon team will be led by 2004 Olympic silver medalist and 2005 World Champion Bryan Clay. Joining Clay will be Chris Boyles, Joe Cebulkski, Travis Geopfert, Ryan Olkowski, Chris Randolph and Will Thomas.

Team USA has a 9-3 lead in the history throughout the history of the series, including three consecutive victories in the last three competitions.

The United States heptathletes will include Tacita Bas, Danielle McNaney, Lela Nelson and Reidun Wallin.

American competitor Nelson, 23, finished fourth at the 2006 United States Track Championships, with a personal best score of 5,903 points. She is considered to be the strongest of the American lineup.

Prices for the competition are set at $10 for an adult weekend-pass, $7 for a child weekend-pass, $7 for an adult day-pass, and $5 for a child day-pass.
